The possible demise of the Gemeyal government, the redeployment of our troops offshore, and the more active involvement of U.S. naval and air firepower in the region, have marked a change in direction for the United States, Lebanon, and Syria. One thing is for certain, the United States and its allies must not relinquish to Syria and its Soviet patron any greater or more threatening role in the Middle East than they have already achieved.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to share with my colleagues an insightful article published in the Arizona Republic last Sunday, which addresses the problem and offers some ideas to check the expanionist policies of Syrian President Hafez Assad in the Middle East.

Mr. Darrow Tully, the author of this piece, is also the publisher of this daily newspaper, which is the largest in the State of Arizona. He originally presented these ideas in a speech before the Jewish Federation of Greater Phoenix.

The article follows:

[From the Arizona Republic, Feb. 5, 1984.]

HOLDING ASSAD IN CHECK: JORDAN MAY BE KEY TO CURBING SYRIA'S EXPANSIONIST AMBITIONS

(By Darrow Tully)

The tomb of Saladin, the 12th century sultan who ruled an empire constituting most of the Middle East, is located in the heart of Damascus. Saladin conquered Jerusalem, crushed the crusaders and united the Arab world. President Hafez Assad, dictator of Syria, has visions of achieving hegemony in the Middle East with Syria as the preeminent power. He would be a modern Saladin.

That objective has been most evident in Assad's deliberate and systematic destruction of Yasser Arafat as leader of the Palestine Liberation Organization Assad's objective is a Syrian solution to the Arab-Israeli conflict.

In September 1982, President Reagan articulated his Middle East policy, the basic points being a Palestinian self-government in conjunction with Jordan and evacuation by all foreign forces from Lebanon, including those of Syria.

Negotiations started by Ambassador Philip Habib and continued by Secretary of State George Shultz resulted in a Lebanese-Israeli withdrawal agreement in May 1983. Syria was not included in the negotiations and Assad steadfastly refused to negotiate a withdrawal, calling the May 1983 agreement "a Zionist-American hegemonistic plan worse than the Camp David accords."

The Arizona Republic recently carried a frontpage story headlined "Syria, Israel OK Plan to Separate Lebanese Factions." However, the basis of the Israeli-Syrian agreement is to establish disengagement zones in the battered southern suburbs of the capital and in the nearby Shouf Mountains with the eventual help of 800 observers from Italy and Greece.

Lebanese officials stressed that the plan is not seen as a basis for any reduction in the multinational force but that this might come later at their request. They said, in fact, that President Amin Gemayel will seek assurances from the United States, France, Italy and Britain that they will keep their forces in Lebanon as an expression of faith in the plan.

"The Syrians were very positive," one official close to the negotiations said.

The following is from the Jan. 16 Newsweek: "The latest best hope to calm the violence lies with an initiative drafted by Donald Rumsfeld, Reagan's Mideast trouble-shooter. . . .

"The plan's design is relatively modest. It acknowledges that, for the present, Israeli and Syrian occupiers will remain in Lebanon. It aims merely to extend the Lebanese army's authority outward from Beirut into parts of the country now carved into the turf of warring Lebanese factions.

"The plan implicitly recognizes Syria's occupation of eastern Lebanon's Bekaa Balley at a time when Assad's Israeli enemies to the south, racked by the enormous economic and human costs of their occupation, are considering a near-total, unilateral withdrawal from Lebanon. The Syrians calculate that a pullout of U.S. Marines and other multinational peacekeepers might eventually fuel the Lebanese civil war to greater intensity—but they are banking on their own forces to stabilize the country much as they have in the past. . . .

"No Western leader would pick Syria for a negotiating partner by choice. Assad's ruling clique has shown itself to be both fanatical and profoundly cruel. And it relies more heavily than ever on Soviet arms. But, along with Israel, Syria exercises the only real power in the region. It has a clear aim: to maintain its historically strong influence over Lebanese territory. . ."

I'm not surprised the Syrians are positive. They maintain more than 60,000 troops in Lebanon and continually fuel internal struggles within Lebanon proper.

When Egyptian President Anwar Sadat ejected the Soviets in 1972, Syria became the apple of the Russian eye. Syria's relationship with Russia was further enhanced with the onset of the Iran-Iraq war. Assad provided the only viable Mideast ally and, in October 1980, the Soviet-Syrian treaty of friendship and cooperation was signed, specifically calling for "cooperation in the military field" and, perhaps more ominously, "mutual consultations on threats to each other or peace and security in the whole world."

The original concept of a "Greater Syria" which Assad embraces was a Jordanian idea when Emir Abdulla, Transjordan's first ruler, aspired to establish his throne in Damascus. Although Syria, Lebanon and Iraq were the specific areas encompassed in the "Greater Syria" concept, many Arabs considered Palestine to be within the framework.

The massive immigration of Palestinians into Lebanon during successive Arab-Israeli wars further exacerbated the situation as the PLO established a state within a state. This became intolerable to Syria and over time led to the Syrian-PLO conflict.

As Time magazine pointed out in the Dec. 19, 1983 issue:

"The two countries share more than a millenium of history . . . Both Lebanon and Syria achieved independence in the 1940s but cultural and family ties still bind their populations, the Sunnis and the Druse . . ."

American Marines were originally dispatched to Lebanon to give protection to the evacuation of PLO forces and bolster the potential for Lebanese unity under the Gamayel government.

But as the winter 1983-1984 issue of Foreign Affairs points out:

"America has slid incrementally into a most awkward predicament. The more it becomes identified with the Phalange and takes military action against the Druze and Shi'ites, the more it becomes a partisan and the more Assad's leadership is strengthened. The more America views the Lebanese conflict and Syria's position there in a primarily East-West context, the more Assad and his Lebanese allies need a close relationship with Moscow, thus making America's conception a self-fulfilling prophecy.

"In U.S. government circles, some argue for greater American-Israeli coordination in order to achieve a balance of power with Damascus and Moscow. As of mid-November 1983, it appears that the United States has moved down this road at least to a limited extent, seeking to strengthen the Israeli position and role with the sweetening of significant new forms of U.S. aid. If this view prevails, the result would most likely be the very opposite of what its proponents desire. Temporarily and militarily, the Syrians and their Soviet backers may become more cautious. But politically, they would gain not only in Lebanon but throughout the Middle East, as even moderate Arab states would feel obliged to move closer to Syria, because their internal stability would be undercut if they appear ready to cooperate with a perceived U.S.-Israeli combination.

"Consequently it has to be accepted that, for the foreseeable future, Assad will remain a dominant force in Lebanon. . . ."

Some Israelis feel the northern border might be safer if Syria dominated. They point out Syria has scrupulously observed the armistice on its own borders and by firm control over the PLO has demonstrated its ability to dominate the area bordering Israel.

There is a growing minority which feels it would be better strategy to cut a deal with a strong Syria than a weak Jordan.

There is no such thing as a cheap war or a cheap occupation. Israel has suffered tremendously as a result of its disproportionate but necessary commitment of national resources to national defense.

However, Syria is feeling the pinch, also. According to Time:

"Plummeting oil revenues and bad harvests have drained foreign reserves. According to an international monetary fund report, Syria's total reserves (excluding gold) dropped from $927 million in mid-1981 to $40 million by early 1982. Electricity is now rationed nationwide. Though unemployment figures are not released by the government, more people are out of work than a year ago and inflation is on the rise. . . ."

As friends of Israel have assisted, so has been the case with Syria. Foreign Affairs points out: "Saudi Arabia, conscious of its great wealth and physical vulnerability, has always preferred efforts at getting along with radical neighbors over confrontation. Even when it finally subsidizes a radical state like Syria, it prefers persuasion to threats of withholding funds—not unlike America's attitude toward Israel. Its increasingly active diplomacy has been apprehensive over Syria's close involvement with the Soviet Union but has attempted to deal with Syria on a case-by-case basis, not as an adversary. . . ."

Crown Prince Abdullah of Saudi Arabia has given Syria an estimated $6 billion over the past five years. This dramatic shift of power to Syria has made a Jordanian peace initiative more difficult. King Hussein has taken steps toward improving relations with both Syria and Moscow.

On the positive side, Hussein has acknowledged that if the PLO comes completely under Syrian control, he would no longer feel obligated to abide by the 1974 Rabat summit resolution which declared the PLO the sole legitimate representative of the Palestinian people. Although Hussein is in no position to negotiate for the Palestinians, I personally believe West Bank Arabs would welcome him as their negotiator, if they are convinced Arafat is a goner.

Foreign Affairs suggests:

"Another approach could be the long-rumored Jordanian return to a parliamentary form of government, in which West Bank Palestinians would obtain sizable representation. Both these alternatives would require Israeli acquiescence, of which there is no evidence . . ."

El Hassan Bin Talal, crown prince of Jordan, has said: "We believe it is in America's best interest, as we know it is in ours, to move toward a settlement. . . .

"Over the past few years, the United States, Israel and frankly, many Arab countries, have tended to overlook or take for granted our country. Yet, Jordan is critical to a settlement, to our settlement, of the Middle East problem."

The inescapable fact is that with the demise of the PLO, the Jordanians are, for all intents and purposes, now one people. Virtually all Palestinians now residing in Jordan have taken up Jordanian citizenship. Residents of the West Bank cannot and should not be looked upon as enemy aliens because of the technicality of a state of war. Crown Prince Talal points out that Jordan pays the salaries and pensions of West Bank officials and bears development costs of some of the territory.

The U.S. and Israel certainly don't agree about the ultimate autonomy of the area, with the U.S. asserting the Palestinians should have full autonomy "giving the inhabitants real authority over themselves, the land and its resources subject to fair safeguards on water." The Israeli position is ". . . autonomy does not concern territory but inhabitants."

Ruth Lapidoth, David Ben-Gurion visiting professor of law at the University of Southern California, articulates the schism as follows:

"Autonomy means limited self-government, and the meaning of the concept autonomous region lies somewhere between the concept of a non-self-governing territory and that of an independent state."

The only lasting peace on the West Bank must come from agreements between King Hussein of Jordan and the state of Israel. The question is under what form of government can Israelis and Arabs live together in peace and equanimity while protecting the security of the border and maintaining the demographic balance?

Switzerland became a nation when three forest cantons (small territorial areas) formed a confederation to revolt against external authority. It may be that the Israeli settlements on the West Bank may be in a position to form such an alliance. The Arab villages and towns could at least consider the same idea. It is not a perfect solution, but it might provide relief from martial law and supply King Hussein the face-saving device he desires to get the Jordanians to the table without totally alienating the rest of the Arab world.

A recent wire service story stated: "In a move that could lead to a breakthrough in Middle east peace negotiations, Jordan's parliament approved constitutional amendments that permit the election of representatives for the occupied West Bank.

"Meeting for the first time in nearly a decade, the upper and lower houses voted unanimously to amend the constitution to allow election of a new parliament with West Bank representation.

"Western diplomats said the move could foreshadow an attempt by King Hussein to represent the West Bank's 1 million Palestinians in a new peace initiative—with or without the badly divided Palestine Liberation Organization. . . ."

It is imperative for long-term peace prospects that at least one other Arab nation sign a peace treaty with Israel. Jordan seems the most logical candidate. Syria's power would be measurably weakened and some accommodation might be worked out on Lebanon's future.

After the signing of the Camp David accords, the rest of the Arab world solemnly cast Egypt into outer darkness, in effect declaring it, like Israel, a non-nation.

That was five years ago. Today, Egypt is emerging from the shadows.

All this has brought a glimmer of life back to Reagan's plan for peace in the Middle East.

Assad may very well find himself in the position of a modern Saladin. However, the Russian bear will want to manipulate the empire more than Assad himself. History in the Middle East has a way of repeating itself.●

SISTER CELESTE BONINA OF ST. LUCY'S CHURCH HONORED

HON. PETER W. RODINO, JR.

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 8, 1984

● Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, last December I had the honor of attending a solemn mass of thanksgiving commemorating the 50th anniversary of the religious reception of Sister Celeste Bonina of St. Lucy's Church in Newark.

Since she first came to St. Lucy's in 1938, Sister Celeste Bonina has made enormous contributions to the church as well as the greater community. A warm, devoted, and loving person, she has given selflessly to those in need. Whether it is assisting the sick, visiting the imprisoned, or offering comfort to those in grief, Sister Celeste Bonina has been there for us.

She helped to organize the St. John's Guild in 1945, which still exists under her leadership, and which has played an important role in assisting the orphanage, the school, and the convent in spiritual, social and fundraising activities. Her talents also extend into music and the arts.

Sister Celeste Bonina has given so much to so many—especially to the members of St. Lucy's Church, among whom I proudly count myself as one. As a long time member of St. Lucy's, I speak from personal experience in recognizing this extraordinary person today.●

SCOUTING COINAGE LEGISLATION

HON. WILLIAM E. DANNEMEYER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 8, 1984

● Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Speaker, in the next few years, two organizations that have made a tremendous contribution to the healthy development of generations of American boys and girls will celebrate their 75th anniversaries. Over the years, both of these organizations have relied on the volunteer efforts of thousands upon thousands of adult Americans, each of whom has shared his or her time and experience so that American youth could be better prepared to face the challenges of adult life. Without their efforts, which cannot be recognized enough, millions of boys and girls would not have had the opportunity to develop personal skills and to learn to work with others in a structured and supervised setting.

The two organizations to which I refer are the Boy Scouts of America and the Girl Scouts, U.S.A. While totally separate entities, these two fine groups will celebrate their 75th anniversaries in 1985 and 1987 respectively. In the process, the Boy Scouts will pay tribute to approximately 88 million boys who, over the years, have participated in Cub Scout, Boy Scout, Eagle Scout, and Explorer programs plus the millions of adult volunteers who have made those programs possible. Likewise, the Girl Scouts will be honoring over 45 million young girls who have participated in Girl Scouts programs over the years as well as the millions of volunteers who have assisted in their good works. The anniversaries will also focus attention on the 3.4 million boys and 3 million girls who are currently involved in the Boy and Girl Scout programs respectively and will provide needed recognition for the 1.1 million Boy Scout and 607,000 Girl Scout volunteers.

In addition to recognizing the people involved, the two anniversaries will also serve as excellent reminders that benefits of scouting go far beyond just the direct participants. For instance, the Boy Scouts worked nationwide during the 1980 census distributing informational material at an estimated savings to Federal taxpayers of some $5 million. Likewise, in my State of California in 1982, some 15,000 scouts worked as volunteers helping to build trails and maintain campsights. And these are but two examples; there are many more instances where Girl Scouts and Boy Scouts have made a contribution to their community or surrounding area by helping people in it.

As one who participated in Boy Scout programs—especially Eagle Scouts—when I was young, I only wish that more young people could have been involved in scouting in the past and could be involved in the future. As for the past, there is not too much that can be done about that but there are ways to encourage participation in the future. One is to make more young people aware of scouting and its benefits, and to that end, I am today introducing legislation calling for commemorative coins to honor the 75th anniversaries of the Boy Scouts and the Girl Scouts. The bill I have "dropped in the hopper" calls for two coins, one for each organization, both to be minted in 1986. Both coins would be 50-cent pieces, much like the Kennedy 50-cent pieces, rather than precious metal coins. That way, the cost of the coins to the public—which would be either/or the total cost of minting and distributing the coins, whichever is higher—would be low enough so that Boy Scouts and Girl Scouts, not to mention their parents and others, would be able to afford them.

With respect to the minting of the coins, my legislation provides that both coins be produced and dated in 1986 and that both organizations have input into the design of their respective coins. The Secretary of the Treasury would, however, retain the final say on the design of the coins which would be legal tender. The reason for the 1986 date is fairly simple; it is late enough not to interfere with the sale of the Olympic coins and it is early enough not to come into conflict with a possible coin commemorating the 200th anniversary of the U.S. Constitution. Also, it should be noted that there is precedent for issuing commemorative coins both before and after the commemorative year in question; a coin commemorating the 75th anniversary of the Battle of Gettysburg was issued 2 years in advance—in 1936—while a coin commemorating the 100th anniversary of Alabama statehood was issued 2 years after the centennial celebration—in 1921.

Ample precedent also exists not only for honoring the Boy Scouts and the Girl Scouts but to do so with commemorative coins. Stamps honoring both organizations have been issued at the time of previous anniversaries and commemorative coins honoring other organizations have been issued in the past. In fact, no less than 68 commemorative coins were issued from 1892 to 1954, 49 of which were commemorative 50-cent pieces. Furthermore, in the past few years, four more commemorative coins have been issued, three of which are of the Olympic variety and one honors George Washington on the 250th anniversary of his birth. Granted, none of these previous coins have honored service organizations but since both the Boy Scouts and the Girl Scouts have Federal charters in addition to a proven record of accomplishment, I see no reason why such an organization should not be recognized. Certainly, the Boy Scouts and the Girl Scouts are worthy of such recognition not to mention the fact that six nations honored the 75th anniversary of British scouting with either a stamp or a coin.

Mr. Speaker, I realize that, to date, the Olympic coins have not sold quite so well as people had hoped. However, there is still time yet and it is important to note that these coins are far more expensive than the proposed Boy Scout and Girl Scout coins would be. Indeed, there is every reason to believe—given the attention that will be focused on the 75th anniversaries of these two fine organizations—that there will be a great deal of interest in the coins my bill proposes. Thus, I would expect that sales would be considerable and that these coins would not be a money loser. Moreover, an additional safeguard against financial loss has been written into the legislation I am proposing; instead of requiring a fixed number of coins to be minted, the bill provides up to 10 million of each. Just how many would actually be produced could, therefore, be adjusted according to demand.

In recognition of the contributions both the Boy Scouts and the Girl Scouts have made, in view of the continuing need for constructive self-help programs for American youth, and in light of past precedents, I believe Congress should enact this legislation and hope that it will do so at the earliest opportunity. American youth, and all those interested in America's future, would be the beneficiaries.●

GET THE FREMONT LINE ROLLING

HON. DON EDWARDS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 8, 1984

● Mr. EDWARDS of California. Mr. Speaker, I support the tentative approval of the proposed GM-Toyota joint venture for Fremont, Calif., by the Federal Trade Commission. Although there have been many newspaper editorials supporting that decision, I submit for the record just one, that which appeared in the San Jose Mercury on December 26, 1983. It contains the information we all need to consider when contemplating the proposed joint venture. The editorial follows:

[From the San Jose Mercury-News, Dec. 25, 1983]

GET THE FREMONT LINE ROLLING

The Federal Trade Commission has all but approved the joint General Motors-Toyota agreement to reopen the Fremont plant, but the one-vote decision is an open invitation to Chrysler and Ford to challenge the plan in court.

We hope the invitation is refused. The reopened plant will provide jobs in East Bay and South Bay communities. More important, it could open a new era in U.S. auto manufacturing, one that benefits consumers and the U.S. economy alike.

It's difficult to understand what Chrysler chairman Lee Iacocca meant when he said that the pact would limit competition. How will 250,000 cars deflate competition in a market approaching 10 million sales a year? Another model should broaden consumers' choices and hold down prices.

Availability of small cars of the sort that will be built in Fremont is, in fact, down. It began to fall when Japanese auto makers shifted their exports to larger, more expensive models in order to protect their balance sheets under the self-imposed limits on exports.

Should GM and Toyota desert the small-car market to their hybrid firm, Chrysler and Ford can march in and capture a bigger share on the strength of their established products. If GM and Toyota try to manipulate the market or fix prices, the FTC can enforce the provisions of the consent decree.

Iacocca hammers at the fact that the pact unites the world's largest and third largest auto manufacturers. It's a lame complaint. Ford, second in U.S. sales in 1982, owns 25 percent of the ninth-ranked firm that makes Mazdas. Sixth-ranking Renault, which is owned by the French government, holds 46 percent of American Motors. And GM, whose projected share of U.S.-sales has actually fallen, has owned a third of Isuzu for years.

Closer to home, Iacocca's 12th-ranked Chrysler owns 15 percent of 11th-ranked Mitsubishi Motors. Yet that doesn't seem to have quashed competition between Chrysler's Mitsubishi-made import and Mitsubishi's own logo. Moreover, there was talk in the auto industry earlier this year of Chrysler and 5th-ranked Volkswagen jointly building cars in Pennsylvania.

The number that may have disturbed Iacocca most were the the headlines-grabbing sales report from the first 10 days of December. Sales of U.S.-made autos were up 21 percent over the same period a year before. Ford captured 29 percent of the rise, GM grabed 19 percent, and Chrysler got 6 percent.

Iacocca is running on empty. It's time to drop the green flag on the Fremont line. Gentlemen, start your engines.●

ST. URHO'S DAY

HON. DANTE B. FASCELL

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 8, 1984

● Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of our colleagues an annual event celebrated by Finnish Americans across the country commemorating St. Urho. According to legend, St. Urho preserved the Finnish wine harvest when he drove all the grasshoppers from Finland, saving the grape crop.

Every year, on March 16, Finnish Americans come together to honor the great feat of St. Urho. The descendants of our Finnish immigrants have adopted St. Urho as the patron saint of the Finnish people in commemoration of his achievement. They celebrate this event by dressing in royal purple and nile green, representative of wild grapes and grasshoppers. Banquets and parades are two of the festivities involved with the St. Urho celebration.

The legend of St. Urho, which first emerged more than a quarter of a century ago in Virginia, Minn., has evolved into an annual festival among Finnish Americans. The legend has continued to spread and today St. Urho's Day is widely recognized. Many States, including Florida, have issued proclamations officially declaring March 16 as St. Urho Day. Several years ago the city of Menahga, Minn., erected a statue in tribute to St. Urho.

What started out as a tale in 1956 has grown to be a proud holiday for Finnish Americans in this country as they remember their heritage—a holiday not only commemorating St. Urho, but the combined legacy of the United States and Finland.●

CENTENNIAL OF THE BIRTH OF HARRY S. TRUMAN

HON. IKE SKELTON

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 8, 1984

● Mr. SKELTON. Mr. Speaker, on January 25, President Reagan issued a proclamation declaring May 8, 1984, to be the "Centennial of the Birth of Harry S. Truman." President Truman set high standards for all who followed him into the Oval Office, and his numerous accomplishments as President merit the many honors which are now being bestowed upon him in this, the centennial year of his birth. I would like to share the President's proclamation on the Truman centennial with my colleagues.

CENTENNIAL OF THE BIRTH OF HARRY S. TRUMAN

(By the President of the United States of America)

A PROCLAMATION

May 8, 1984, marks the one hundredth anniversary of the birth of Harry S. Truman, the thirty-third President of the United States and one of this Nation's most respected statesmen.

First elected to the United States Senate from Missouri in 1934, Mr. Truman gained national recognition during World War II, when his investigating committee saved the taxpayers large amounts of money by exposing waste and extravagance in the procurement process. In November 1944, the voters elected Mr. Truman Vice President. He served only 83 days in that office and succeeded to the Presidency in April 1945, upon the death of President Roosevelt.

In his first months in office, President Truman guided the country through the end of World War II and made the difficult decisions that ushered in the nuclear age. In the postwar years, he oversaw America's transition from a wartime to a peacetime economy and began an era of growth and stability. In foreign affairs, President Truman established the cornerstones of the policy of containment in dealing with the communist threat to Europe. Through the Truman Doctrine and the Marshall Plan he stalwartly assisted free peoples in their efforts to stem the tide of totalitarian subversion. In applying the principles of collective security, President Truman assisted in the formation of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization to help European nations respond to this threat.

In 1948, Mr. Truman was elected to the Presidency, battling from behind to overtake Governor Thomas Dewey. President Truman responded to the invasion of South Korea by utilizing United Nations as well as American forces in dealing with that crisis.

Although confronted with a series of major challenges throughout his tenure, President Truman responded with courage, humanity, decisiveness, and a wit which have secured his place in the Nation's history as one of our most respected Presidents.

Now, therefore, I, Ronald Reagan, President of the United States of America, do hereby proclaim May 8, 1984 to be the "Centennial of the Birth of Harry S. Truman." I call upon the people of the United States to observe that day with appropriate ceremonies and activities in remembrance of his many accomplishments and dedication to freedom and democracy.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand this 25th day of January, in the year of our Lord nineteen hundred and eighty-four, and of the Independence of the United States of America the two hundred and eighth.

THE HIGHER EDUCATION SAVINGS INCENTIVE ACT OF 1984

HON. JACK FIELDS

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 8, 1984

● Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker, concern for the education of our Nation's children has become an issue of growing concern across the United States. And, well it should be. The future of our Nation rests upon a well-educated citizenry, Not only does our ability to compete technologically in the world market depend upon excellent education, but our existence as a democratic Republic depends upon an educated electorate.

Unfortunately, the rising cost of higher education over the past two decades placed a tremendous economic burden upon our Nation's families. While the Federal Government responded with ever-increasing student aid programs, recognition is widespread in Congress that middle- and upper middle-income students have come to rely too heavily on student loans and assistance to finance their higher education.

In fact, the Federal Government's role in higher education has increased from $40 million in 1960 for direct student aid to $7.3 billion in 1983 for education grants, guaranteed student loans, college work study, and related assistance programs. While Government student assistance has grown, family contributions to higher education have decreased. For instance, total family income increased by 30 percent between 1978 and 1981 while family contributions to their children's higher educations actually declined by more than 6 percent.

Mr. Speaker, I believe the time has come for the Federal Government to shift its emphasis from increasing governmental assistance for higher education to increasing the incentive for families to resume primary responsibility for financing the education of their children. For this reason, I am introducing, today, legislation to provide those financial incentives to encourage long-term family savings for the education of their children. This legislation would provide tax benefits for educational savings while, at the same time, increasing the savings rate of our Nation which is now 4.7 percent, the lowest of any industrialized nation in the world.

With the average cost of higher education projected to exceed $25,000 by 1990, and with Government subsidization of middle- and upper middle-income students' higher educations likely to decrease, the enactment of educational savings incentives is not merely important, it is imperative.

My legislation, the Higher Education Savings Incentive Act, would provide a tax deduction of up to $2,000 per year, per student for contributions made to an education savings account. More specifically, this legislation would allow the principal contributed to an education savings account to be tax deferred and allow the interest accured in education savings accounts to be tax free.

Tax deferral of the principal contributed to education savings accounts is achieved by deeming any principal used to pay qualified educational expenses as taxable income only to the student beneficiary. The student beneficiary would be required to add 10 percent of the total principal expended for educational purposes to his taxable income for each of 10 succeeding years. The student beneficiary may elect to begin the tax repayment as early as age 25 or as late as age 30.

Similar to provisions governing an individual retirement account, there would be a 10-percent penalty for early withdrawal of these educational funds.

Mr. Speaker, I believe both individual students and families are better served by creating an environment favorable to educational savings than by continued reliance on direct Government assistance or indirect Government loan subsidization.

Although the primary purpose of the Higher Education Savings Incentive Act is to promote savings for higher education, the corresponding benefit to the economic strength of our Nation is substantial. To sustain the economic recovery which our Nation is experiencing, we must do all that we can to increase the amount of available capital. Capital is the lifeblood of our economy, and, without it, we are destined to return to high interest rates, high unemployment, astronomical trade imbalances, and sagging levels of productivity.

I believe that, if enacted, this legislation will greatly increase savings for higher education, will unlock important sources of capital which will allow American industries to expand their facilities, to create thousands of jobs, to more effectively compete abroad, and to more efficiently produce those products we depend upon in our daily lives.

I urge my colleagues to join me in strengthening opportunities for higher education and increasing our Nation's savings rate by cosponsoring the Higher Education Savings Incentive Act of 1984. Education is truly the key to a free and prosperous society.●

NATIONAL SALUTE TO HOSPITALIZED VETERANS

HON. BRUCE A. MORRISON

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 8, 1984

● Mr. MORRISON of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take a few moments to remember the tremendous sacrifices veterans have made in the service of our country. On February 14, 1984, the Nation will be observing a very important day, the National Salute to Hospitalized Veterans. I would like to share with my colleagues a proclamation declaring our commitment to the health and well-being of America's veterans. Mr. Speaker and fellow Members of Congress, join with me now in pledging support for responsible health care for our veterans.

PROCLAMATION

Whereas, many thousands of veterans of America's armed forces have served this nation in times of both peace and war, and in doing so have thereby assured the safety and prosperity of all her people as this nation enters its third century of independence: and

Whereas, more than a million veterans enter Veterans Administration medical facilities nationwide for medical attention annually: and

Whereas, the Veterans Administration, for the eleventh consecutive year, has organized a national day of tribute honoring all hospitalized veterans, with the purpose of urging all Americans to remember these men and women especially on this day and throughout the year: and

Whereas, we wish to express to the patients in the West Haven Veterans Administration Medical Center our concern and sincere appreciation, Now, therefore, I, Bruce A. Morrison, do hereby proclaim February 14, 1984, for the "National Salute to Hospitalized Veterans" and do therefore call upon all our citizens to observe the occasion in fitting ways and to pay tribute to hospitalized veterans on this day and each day of the year.

MEDICARE COPAYMENT PROPOSAL

HON. MAJOR R. OWENS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 8, 1984

● Mr. OWENS. Mr. Speaker, it has long been obvious to many of us that the administration's proposal to impose additional copayments on medicare beneficiaries is just one more way to shift costs to those who are least able to pay. This has been well expressed by Prof. Anne Somers in a letter to the New York Times on February 6, 1984.

[From the New York Times, Feb. 6, 1984]

MEDICARE: THE NEW 60-DAY PROPOSAL'S INEQUITY

PISCATAWAY, N.J., January 24, 1984.

To the Editor:

The Administration's proposal to require Medicare patients to make significant copayments for the second through the 60th day of hospital care in return for "unlimited coverage" after 60 days (news story Jan. 5) is deeply flawed.

The official rationale stresses greater protection of patients against the costs of long illnesses. This would be highly desirable, if true, since chronic disease and the often catastrophic costs of long-term care are now the major health problem of the elderly. In fact, however, the new protection applies only to hospital costs, not to nursing homes or home care, where most long-term care is provided.

Moreover, the average hospital stay of a Medicare patient is only 10 days, and less than one percent of patients exceed 60 days. Encouraging the elderly to think they would be gaining significant protection against the costs of long-term illness is highly misleading.

For many of the 99 percent whose hospital stays are less than 60 days, the additional costs could be an unreasonable burden. At the proposed copayment rates—8 percent of the deductible (now $356) for days 2 through 15, and 5 percent for days 16 through 60—the average patient with a 10-day stay would have to pay $245 in addition to $356, or a total of about $600.

This may not seem disastrous until one recalls that the median annual income of the over-65 population is about $6,600. So the average patient would have to pay nearly 10 percent of an entire year's income just for the hospital stay (this does not include doctors' bills and other associated costs).

For the very poor, many of these costs would be transferred to Medicaid, the Veterans Administration or other public programs which, unlike Medicare, are financed entirely through general revenues. The Medicare program would save some money but only at the expense of other portions of the Federal budget.

Also, those who could afford to do so would simply buy additional supplemental private insurance to cover the new co-payment. Hospitals would be tempted to give preference to such fully insured patients, thus exacerbating the trend toward two-tier health care.

The emphasis placed on increased coverage for long-stay hospital patients is also incompatible with current Administration efforts to further reduce the Medicare length of stay through the D.R.G. method of hospital reimbursement. Under this system hospitals are paid a fixed predetermined rate for a given diagnosis or procedure regardless of length of stay. The whole point is to encourage early discharge.

For short-stay patients, the proposed copayment will perhaps reinforce the D.R.G. push to get them out of the hospital as fast as possible. But for those who require longer stays, there is incentive to try to make it to the 60th day, after which they will be eligible for unlimited hospital care—a particularly valuable benefit in the absence of long-term nursing home or home-care benefits. The strain on hospital administrators and doctors, caught in the 'middle of these conflicting incentives, would be intense.

Without question, Medicare is faced with a financial crisis. Lack of meaningful financial controls is one, but only one, cause of that crisis. The aging of the population, the absence of cost-effective programs for the care of long-term patients and the expensive pro-technology bias in the Medicare program today are all parts of the problem and must be considered in the solution. The crisis will not be solved by ill-considered unidimensional approaches.

ANNE R. SOMERS,
Professor of Community and Family Medicine, Rutgers Medical School.

Professor Somers' view of this additional burden proposed for the elderly should be considered carefully before we contemplate imposing additional hardships on our senior citizens.●

CONGRESS 1984 AGENDA

HON. LEE H. HAMILTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 8, 1984

● Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to insert my Washington report for Wednesday, February 8, 1984 into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

The report follows:

As legislators come back for the second session of the 98th Congress, the two most contentious issues on the legislative calendar are the presence of U.S. Marines in Lebanon and a budget deficit that may exceed $200 billion next year. Congress also faces a long and growing agenda of other important but unfinished business. There is a pervasive attitude among my colleagues that hard work needs to be done, but that we will not get to it. While I deplore such an attitude, I find it difficult to counter.

The presence of our Marines in Lebanon is bound to be one of the first orders of legislative business. Pressure for disengagement from Lebanon has been building steadily in Congress and across the nation for many weeks. Heavy casualties among our Marines and official reports criticizing our involvement in Lebanon have added weight to the arguments of those who want the troops to come home. Consequently, early in the session there will be a vote on whether to keep the troops in Beirut until March of 1985.

The situation with regard to the budget deficit is similar, though the outcome is a bit harder to predict. Almost everyone acknowledges that the deficit is dangerous, and that something must be done about it. People worry that the deficit soon may drive interest rates up and bring on another recession. They want to know what the federal government is doing to get its fiscal affairs in order. Because of this concern, Congress should produce the deficit-reduction plan that most observers think it will not produce. Congress's hope seems to be that people do not fear the deficit enough to protest inaction.

The volume of uncompleted and urgent work should push Congress to act on many measures. Pending environment and energy legislation would tighten controls on the disposal of toxic wastes, reauthorize clean air and clean water statutes, start new water projects, extend regulation of pesticides, slow leasing of offshore oil and natural gas properties, lift controls on natural gas prices, and address the worst aspects of the problem of acid rain. In the area of trade, there are bills reauthorizing export controls, compelling the use of domestic content in foreign automobiles, giving the President greater power to respond to unfair trade practices, and providing more credit to foreign customers so that they can purchase more of our farm goods. Civil rights advocates are pressing hard for passage of the Equal Rights Amendment, reorganization of the President's Civil Rights Commission, and legislation to end sex-based discrimination in insurance and pensions. Those interested in law enforcement await a sweeping revision of the federal criminal code, including rewrites of provisions on bail, sentencing, penalties for drug trafficking, and the insanity defense. Congress may try to figure out what to do about the Supreme Court decision which invalidated the "legislative veto" that Congress had used for fifty years to control rules coming out of the executive branch.

The list of things left undone is longer yet. Action on social and educational issues may encompass reform of social security disability, attention to nutrition programs, and enactment of health insurance for the jobless, incentives for states to enforce court-ordered child support, and expanded financing for mathematics and science in schools. A big fight is expected when the required debt ceiling increase comes up. Important economic initiatives include a move for lower telephone rates, a plan to create tax-free enterprise zones in inner cities, an effort to make the Federal Reserve more accountable to political authority, and a reorganization of the nation's bankruptcy courts. General deregulation of banks and other financial institutions could begin. Debates on defense will center on the size of the military budget, and more clashes on chemical weapons and the MX missile are likely. The breakdown of the nuclear arms control dialogue, the unchecked flow of illegal aliens across our borders, and the military aid being granted to repressive anti-communist forces in Central America (the latter is as controversial as ever despite the pro-aid tone of the Kissinger Commission's recent report) will round out the international relations agenda.

The prospect of a meaningful advance on this formidable agenda is made even more remote by the session's bad start. Irritability and intemperance have marked the first week. Hot words have been exchanged on Lebanon, and parliamentary "guerrilla warfare" has all but broken out. Members' frustration is high.

There are compelling reasons for Congress to make significant progress on these and other matters, but I doubt that it will do so. I often wonder why Congress is not more effective in dealing with its agenda. Is it the quality of the membership or the leadership? Is it the way Congress is set up? Is it the intractable, uncompromising nature of the issues which legislative proposals address? Is it the extreme difficulty of building a consensus in support of these proposals? Is it election-year politics? I suspect that these factors, and probably others, too, are part of the problem. In any case, I have the strong (and depressing) feeling that Congress is not dealing effectively with the matters of greatest concern to most Americans.

The optimists say that this session will be remembered for its helpful focus on a few carefully chosen issues. I hope that they are right. I expect the session to be short and unproductive, one dominated by image an rhetoric. Avoiding legislative mistakes, not seeking the grand consensus, will be the order of the day. I expect much debate, but not much action, on Lebanon, a small step toward deficit-reduction, and some action on a few other major issues. However, Congress is not in the mood to tackle its long agenda aggressively, nor will it do much of anything far-reaching. In the end, we probably will settle for one or two pieces of substantive legislation, plus several appropriations bills. I am not optimistic about the chances of reaching an accord on the entire budget, but of this I am sure: the more Congress marks time in 1984, the more it sets the stage for major moves in 1985.●

AUTO THEFTS REACH EPIDEMIC PROPORTIONS

HON. JAMES H. SCHEUER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 8, 1984

● Mr. SCHEUER. Mr. Speaker, there is little doubt that professional auto theft constitutes one of the most serious and costly criminal problems facing our Nation today.

The American Automobile Association, with more than 23 million members nationwide, states that auto theft in the United States "has reached epidemic proportions." This is not mere hyperbole: When 25 cents of every auto insurance dollar goes to cover the costs of auto theft, all carowners share the $4 billion price tag for theft through higher insurance premiums. When our Nation spends an estimated $1 billion each year in law enforcement costs related to auto theft, all American taxpayers share the burden. When a car is stolen every 32 seconds somewhere in the United States, we have a problem of epidemic proportions indeed.

A recent article in the New York Times highlights the problem of auto theft in New York City. I commend this article to the attention of my colleagues and urge them to give careful consideration to supporting H.R. 3999, the Motor Vehicle Theft Law Enforcement Act.

The article follows:

[From the New York Times, Dec. 13, 1983]

NEW YORK CAR THEFT: NOT FOR AMATEURS

(By M.A. Farber)

On the afternoon of Oct. 18, police officers on a routine inspection of automobile body shops dropped by Juan Aponte's business in the Crotona Park section of the Bronx.

In the shop, as it turned out, were 13 late-model cars that had recently been stolen, a 1976 automobile stolen in 1977 and covered by dust in the shop's basement, and the rear ends or engines of four other cars that had been stolen and then dismantled. One of the whole cars, a 1982 Pontiac, had been reported stolen only two weeks earlier, in Chicago.

Four men, including Mr. Aponte, and the van had been re-registered under the new number to a Bronx woman.

Every year, tens of thousands of cars are stolen off New York City's streets, and perhaps half of the cars are taken or received by people connected to an organized crime enterprise, according to police. In 1982 alone, the value of the 104,056 cars reported stolen in the city was $427 million, nearly half the value of all stolen property.

In the last decade the picture of auto crime in New York has changed dramatically. Before 1970, most of the cars stolen were for "joy rides," and of the 80 percent normally recovered a relatively high percentage were in good shape.

Now, however, the cars stolen in New York, most often from middle-income residential sections of Brooklyn and Queens, usually pass through several hands and wind up in parks and on piers, or in garages and repair shops like Mr. Aponte's, most of which are engaged in legitimate business.

Among large cities, New York's rate of car theft is surpassed by Detroit, Houston and Los Angeles, on a per capita basis. But the number of cars reported stolen here—perhaps a third of which really are failed theft attempts or are false reports by owners to collect insurance—is more than twice as high as in Los Angeles, which last year had the country's second highest total, 48,000.

Many of the cars are stripped for parts, which can be worth three times the value of the car intact. Some are "torched"—burned apart at the bolts—welded onto the better half of a wreck bought at salvage, and sold under the title and identification number of the wreck.

Others are "tagged" with new or counterfeit titles and identification numbers and sold locally. Still others are exported, through ruses, to Latin America, the Middle East and elsewhere, and sold for two or three times their domestic value.

In one week, Maryland Port Administration police found nine cars on the docks in Dundalk, Md., being prepared for shipment to different receivers in Ecuador and Colombia. All had been stolen in the New York area and driven to Maryland by couriers for $500 apiece.

Other cars, including BMW's and Mercedes-Benzes, were being spirited through Elizbeth, N.J., and Miami. So quickly were they being disposed of that some of the owners did now know they were gone.

Equally brazen was the theft of cars this year from the parking lot adjacent to the Queens Criminal Court. At least 20 of the cars were dumped in Forest Park, stripped of such generally untraceable parts as doors, front ends and trunk lids.

THE TRAIL OVERSEAS AND "STEALING TO ORDER"

The Federal Bureau of Investigation and the police are now investigating the export of dozens of stolen cars from the metropolitan area to the Caribbean and to an Arab country. Proof of ownership is not required to export a car.

Another investigation centers on stolen trucks that are dismantled here, shipped abroad and reassembled.

In the Maryland case, the police were unable to recover two Datsuns and a BMW that were already en route to Ecuador. The cars, according to a subsequent examination of their shipping documents, bore VIN plates stolen in New York from cars of the same model and year. A routine police check of these plates, which the owners had not noticed were missing, would not have shown that the cars en route to Ecuador had been stolen.

The machinations of car theft are further illustrated by the case of Michail Koliskor, who operated an auto repair in the Flatbush section of Brooklyn.

Making one car from two

When police raided the shop on May 19, they found at least half a dozen stolen cars, including the rear half of a 1978 Volkswagen Scirocco that had been stolen from Kelvin Salzman in Bensonhurst two days earlier. At that moment, the rear part of Mr. Salzman's car was being welded to the front half of a Scirocco that, according to the police, had a good title and had probably been bought at salvage. Police speculated that the front of Mr. Salzman's car, whose "VIN number was hot," had been "crunched into scrap metal."

The police said that last January Mr. Koliskor reported the theft of his own Cadillac, and collected on his insurance claim, with most of the payment going to the finance company. But that Cadillac, like a Buick a relative of Mr. Koliskor had reported stolen, was found in the shop.

Stealing to order is another aspect of car theft, sometimes resulting from requests for parts over the "teletype," or open telephone line that links some junkyards.

"Someone on the line will say 'I need an '82 Cadillac front and someone else will answer, 'Call me tomorrow,'" said Sgt. Michael Bosak of the auto division. "That night, an '82 Cadillac will be stolen."

Getting in: 10 seconds and a "Slim Jim"

Ordinarily, a thief will insert a "slim jim"—a long, flat piece of steel about 60 1,000ths of an inch thick—between the exterior of a car window and a door, reaching downward to disengage the lock. The thief, often inside a car within 10 seconds, will then pull out the ignition lock with a "slap hammer" and use a screwdriver to start the engine.

The deterrent value of car alarms and special locking devices has been much debated. But, according to Deputy Inspector Joseph R. Harding, commander of the police department's auto crime division: "Anything you can do to slow down a thief, and make him wonder whether this car is worth the trouble, is helpful. He may well go on to the next car."

Car thieves are paid as much as $300 or even more for a late-model automobile. They are often thought to be in their teens and addicted to drugs, and some are.

But a State Department of Correctional Services profile of those in prison for grand larceny, automobile, in 1981 and 1982 shows that only 10 of the 61 were 20 years old or younger. Sixteen were between the ages of 21 and 24, and the largest number, 19, were 25 to 29 years old.

The addict as a business liability

Moreover, said Sgt. Tom Pepe of the auto division, fences do not "want to deal with a junkie."

"A junkie takes cheap," he said, "maybe $50 to $80 for a car, but if he's arrested the first thing he does is give you up."

There are other risks, too, in the world of stolen cars—not from the police or the courts but from the nature of an illicit business that Alfred P. Vigorito, a Bronx prosecutor, described as "second only to narcotics and right up there with gambling."

One of those risks is fatal. A dozen murders of auto thieves or fences are now under investigation, authorities said, and the prime suspects are competitors of the victims.

MANY ARE ARRESTED, BUT FEW GO TO PRISON

About 9,000 people are arrested each year in connection with automobile theft in the city. Many of them are the same people, and only a tiny percentage of them go to prison and fewer still for long terms.

"We arrest virtually every professional car thief, and many amateurs, each year," said Inspector Harding. "For the most part, they're right back on the street. Let's face it. Who does time for auto crime?"

Detective Bruce Milau of the auto unit said some stolen car fences seemed unable to stop, whatever the penalty. "They have transmission fluid in their veins," he said. "They can't give it up."

In the Bronx, Stephen Callinan is regarded by detectives with a mixture of scorn and awe. At the age of 43, Mr. Callinan has been arrested 20 times, at least 12 of them for auto crime offenses. On three occasions, the last in 1974, he was convicted of felonies. He is under indictment on three counts of criminal possession of stolen cars, one count of criminal possession of a mobile telephone stolen from a 1979 Lincoln, and 12 counts of illegal possession of stolen VIN plates.

A freshly stolen coupe de ville

Two of several stolen cars found last May 13 behind his home in the well-to-do Country Club section of the Bronx were Cadillacs—one a 1983 Coupe de Ville that had been stolen earlier that day from La Guardia Airport.

On Oct. 13, five months later, Mr. Callinan was re-arrested and charged with possession of parts from a 1983 Cadillac stolen Oct. 5 in Hackensack, N.J.

Of the 30,500 inmates now serving more than a year's sentence in the state's prison system, 55 were imprisoned on the top felony charge of grand larceny, automobile, according to Louis J. Ganim, a correction department spokesman. Thirty-four of the 55 were convicted in New York City, Mr. Ganim's statistics, however, do not match the figures provided by various district attorneys.

For example, Robert M. Morgenthau, the Manhattan District Attorney, said prison officials may have classified defendants differently than he had. In 1982 in Manhattan alone, Mr. Morgenthau said, 44 defendants were convicted of grand larceny, automobile, and sentenced to state prison.

Breaking downs the State's count

By Mr. Ganim's count, the prison system received, in 1982, six such defendants from Manhattan, as well as four from Queens, three from Brooklyn, and one from the Bronx.

"I can only tell you what we've got," Mr. Ganim said. "Some defendants might have had their sentences adjusted or be free on appeal."

Mr. Ganim said that of the 61 inmates who were committed in 1981 and 1982 for car theft—including 35 from the city—only 16 were sentenced to maximum terms longer than three years.

The city jail system, where prisoners generally serve sentences of up to a year, does not classify its inmates by type of crime.

In general, little or no time

"In the overwhelming majority of cases," Inspector Harding said, "the defendants do little time, if they do time at all."

In general, Mr. Morgenthau challenged Inspector Harding bleak view of car theft prosecutions.

In 1982, according to Mr. Morgenthau, there were 1,941 arrests in Manhattan in which the top charge was grand larceny, automobile. But he stressed that only 198 defendants had been indicted on felony charges of car theft in 1982, in cases where the evidence was strongest.

By the end of the year, he said, 134 had been convicted, 110 sentenced and 89 had received a year or more imprisonment. "That's not bad," he said. "Is it enough? No. But it shows there are sanctions out there."

Inspector Harding was unimpressed. "You have to look at what happened to all arrests," he said. "That's what counts."

THE "CHOP SHOPS" AND THEIR OPERATORS

Paul Schiavo defended himself the way many others do when accused of possessing stolen cars or parts.

Mr. Schiavo, who is 42 years old, ran the Discount Auto Corporation at 56-01 Foster Avenue in the Flatbush section of Brooklyn. During an inspection of the junk yard on March 1, 1982, the police saw an employee dismantling a 1980 Chevrolet engine and transmission. The body of the car, which had been reported stolen the previous fall, was found crushed under a stack of other vehicles.

The police also found a 42 Cadillac, BMW, Mazda, Audi and other make engines or transmissions whose serial numbers had been altered or ground off, as well as an electric grinder and grinding stones. Mr. Schiavo was quoted by the police as saying that the auto parts without numbers had "come with the place" when he bought it.

During a second inspection of the yard six weeks later, the police found 138 transmissions, 25 engines and 71 doors whose serial numbers had been removed.

Defendant charged with 2 felonies

Mr. Schiavo was charged with and convicted of criminal possession of the Chevrolet engine and transmission and with failing to register as a dismantler. Both charges are felonies punishable by maximum sentences of four years.

At Mr. Schiavo's sentencing, Douglas Kallen, an assistant district attorney in Brooklyn, strongly recommended a prison term of one to three years.

"Chop shops like the defendant's are large producers and they make a lot of money and without them, perhaps more importantly, the street thieves wouldn't have a source to sell their cars," Mr. Kallen said. "If the court were to fine the defendant, that would be merely a cost of his doing business as a corporation, such as an attorney's fee or as an insurance fee."

Robert Sgarlatto, Mr. Schiavo's attorney, argued that his client had no knowledge of any stolen parts at his yard, was not responsible for any illegal dismantling and had been convicted on "innuendo and insinuation."

The lawyer described Mr. Schiavo as "a family man, a businessman" and said that to imprison him "would be a waste of the People's money."

Joseph J. Lombardo, the State Supreme Court Justice presiding, noted that the defendant had served six months in jail a decade earlier and had been arrested a dozen times, mostly for possession of stolen property in cases that were dismissed. He sentenced Mr. Schiavo to five years probation and levied a $10,000 fine.

"Now, it's easy enough to perhaps get the impression that this is a victimless crime in the sense that no one was assaulted, no one was raped," the judge said. "But actually it is a crime which strikes at every person who owns an automobile and who has it stolen."

Justice Lombardo said he agreed with the prosecutor "that the purpose of these statutes is to cut down—impossible to eliminate thievery—but at least cut down on it and to make those who make thievery possible responsible to the community and responsible to the criminal justice system."

Probation recommendation accepted

But he said he would go along with the sentencing recommendation of the Probation Department.

The decision not to imprison Mr. Schiavo still rankles Elizabeth Holtzman, the Brooklyn District Attorney, who has made a concerted effort to punish auto criminals. So far this year, she said, 47 car thieves have been sent to prison, compared with 7 in 1982.

"No longer will there be a free ride in Brooklyn for stealing a car," Miss Holtzman said. "Not for the thieves, and not for the chop shops."

FROM JOY RIDES TO SYSTEMATIC THEFT

In significant measure, the story of automobile theft in New York has become a story of organized crime.

"Organized crime people spanning all ethnic groups have come to recognize the tremendous profits to be realized from stolen cars, and have become deeply involved," Inspector Harding said. "Often we can't prove that in court, but that's what our intelligence tells us."

In 1980, the uniformed auto crime unit was replaced by a plainclothes division and put under the command of the Police Department's Organized Crime Control Bureau.

The inspector said the recovery rate of stolen cars now was about 64 percent, with cars found in 1982 valued at a total of $76.5 million. But he was unable to generalize about the conditions of those cars. Some officers said the chance a stolen car would be recovered in good shape was no better than even.●

UKRAINIAN INDEPENDENCE DAY

HON. ROBERT J. LAGOMARSINO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 8, 1984

● Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, It is a great honor and pleasure for me to join in commemorating the 66th anniversary of Ukrainian Independence Day. The occasion is both a joyful and a solemn one. Joyful because it marks the first recognition of the fully sovereign state of the Ukraine. Solemn because that independence proved to be short-lived as invading forces swept in to battle for control of the territory.

The United Ukrainian Republic fought against the Russian armies who attacked them from the east and the Polish forces who attacked them from the west. The battle dragged on for 3 years and ended with Soviet domination of the Ukraine in 1921.

Though conquered militarily, the Soviets have not been able to conquer the spirit of the Ukrainian people. The Ukrainians are a proud race who have continued to struggle against Soviet oppression to maintain their identify and preserve their rich heritage. Theirs is a heritage which dates back over 1,000 years to a time when Kiev-Rus, as the Ukraine was then known, was a major power in Europe and a rich commercial center. Their determination and drive to sustain their distinct culture, language, and traditions serve as an inspiration to all the peoples of the world who seek escape from domination and persecution so that they might have power over their own destiny.

Ukrainian Independence Day is also the time to commemorate another solemn occasion—the Ukraine famine of 1932-33. This famine which was deliberately engineered by the Communist Party in Moscow resulted in the death of 7 million Ukrainians, 20 percent of the population of that Republic. I have cosponsored H.R. 3993 to establish a commission to study this famine so that the full extent of Soviet inhumanity can be exposed. There is no doubt in my mind that the Soviet Union has a long record of human rights violations and the Ukraine famine of 1932-33 is a prime example.

Let me close with the hope that support will grow so that the Ukrainian people may once again be fully sovereign and independent.●

AMERICAN HEART MONTH

HON. WILLIAM O. LIPINSKI

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 8, 1984

● Mr. LIPINSKI. Mr. Speaker, heart disease is our Nation's No. 1 health enemy. One in six Americans suffer from heart disease or 750,000 people die annually. Heart disease, the vulture that kills more people than accidents, chronic obstructive pulmonary disease, pneumonia, influenza, and all other cases combined.

As February is American Heart Month, I would like to take this opportunity to discuss some of the factors that contribute to heart disease and what is being done to reverse the trend.

According to the American Heart Association, extensive clinical and statistical studies have identified several factors as contributing to an increased risk of heart attack and stroke. The more risk factors present, the greater the risk. Some of these factors can be changed under the direction of a doctor. Still, other risk factors can be controlled by the individual. The uncontrollable factors include heredity, sex, age, race. The controllable factors risk factors include smoking, high blood pressure, elevated blood cholestoral, diabetes, and lack of exercise.

Major advances in finding the causes, cures, and prevention for heart disease are occurring on a daily basis. Just last month a study was completed tying high cholesterol intake to heart disease. Also, published in January was the 1984 Surgeon General report, "The Consequences of Smoking, Cardiovascular Diseases," is a volume of information addressing the adverse effects of smoking on heart disease. The National Heart Lung and Blood Institute has ongoing research taking place on stroke, heart attacks, and high blood pressure.

While the national campaign against heart disease is moving full speed ahead, the States are intensifying programing and fundraising. In Chicago, the local affiliate of the American Heart Association sponsors cardiopulmonary resuscitation (CPR) training sessions almost daily, health fairs, referral services, and hypertention clinics—people can actually walk into City Hall and have their blood pressure checked.

I urge the public to take advantage of these programs because the life you save may be your own.●

THE ECONOMIC CONVERSION ACT

HON. NICHOLAS MAVROULES

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 8, 1984

● Mr. MAVROULES. Mr. Speaker, virtually every Member of this body has at least one community that depends on defense contract dollars for its economic well-being. Thanks to the largest arms buildup in the Nation's history, these communities are enjoying the view from the top of a historically up-and-down, rollercoaster, defense-spending ride.

When defense spending is up, these communities enjoy job opportunities, an expanded tax base, and the ability to offer their citizens a wide range of services. Their children are properly educated, the elderly are cared for, public safety requirements are met, the streets are cleaned, and the garbage is collected. In short, these communities are not bad places in which to live.

But when defense spending is down, such communities stand an excellent chance of suffering severe economic dislocation. We have only to recall recent history, when we cut defense spending at the tail-end of the Vietnam war. In New England, where I reside, 44 percent of the region's aerospace work force either ended up in unemployment lines, or moved out in search of new jobs. I am sure that every one of my colleagues has a similar horror story.

On the surface, things appear rosy today. But there are a number of reasons why we can expect this trend not to continue. Paramount among these are economic, budgetary, and national security considerations.

Bloated defense budgets drain money and brains away from the civilian sector—away from the critical need to bring America's industry into the modern age so it can compete on equal footing with its international sparring partners.

Bloated defense budgets are a significant and noticeably harmful addition to the Federal deficit problem. The bigger the deficit, of course, the less money around to invest in the private sector and new jobs, and the higher the interest rates, which themselves cause so much economic havoc among our small businessmen and farmers, our homebuilders and buyers.

Bloated defense budgets, finally, compel us in Congress to look over our shoulders back home to gage how our districts and States can benefit economically from the Pentagon's largesse, and not at our legitimate national security needs. How can we promote a sane, sensible defense policy when we are compelled to choose between peace and jobs, between a solid arms control agreement with the Soviets whereby the entire world benefits and a fancy, new state-of-the-art nuclear weapons system that will put our people to work?

The Reagan administration's $1.9 trillion rearmament program, and its fiscal 1985 request for $313.4 billion in budget authority, up 18 percent in current dollars from last year, certainly qualifies as bloated. The indications in this and the other body are that the administration will have to settle for much less.

We would therefore be foolhardy, to put it mildly, not to prepare for a future of lower defense spending levels and lost contract work. Moreover, such preparation would be salutory, freeing us as voting Members in the Nation's Legislature from the onus of viewing the defense budget as one big jobs bill.

Today, I am introducing, along with 13 of my colleagues, the Economic Conversion Act, which would lay the groundwork to prevent the severe economic dislocation some of our communities would suffer when they lose defense dollars. We must take care not to imperil those communities that rely on defense work as we strive to cut the deficit and meet our legitimate defense needs, and it is this problem that the Economic Conversion Act addresses.

The bill also has the laudatory purpose of giving heretofore defense-dependent communities viable and productive economic ways to keep their plants open and people employed in the civilian sector. It is a widely accepted fact that dollars spent in the civilian sector are economically more valuable than if they were spent in the defense sector, and they employ many more people than defense dollar do. Thus, this bill promises more than to save jobs; it promises a boost to national economic growth. And no new Federal spending would be required.

What is the Economic Conversion Act?

The bill, which would sound an economic declaration of independence for communities uncomfortably tied to defense dollars, has three major provisions:

First, it calls for the Secretary of Defense to give an advance warning to communities and workers affected by any defense spending rollback. Whenever possible, they will be given 1-year advance notification of any defense contract reduction or cancellation. Communities would thus have time to prepare for and avoid the loss of business, higher unemployment, and the reduced tax revenues arising from lost defense work.

Second, communities affected by a contract reduction or cancellation of $10 million or more would be eligible for an alternative production and job retraining planning grant. The grant would not exceed $250,000, and is aimed at encouraging workers who lost their jobs to stay rooted in the community and retrain themselves. It would also help finance the planning for finding new uses for idle plant and equipment, caused by the defense contract rollback.

The $10 million contract threshold assures that the program covers solely instances of severe economic dislocation.

Third, the Economic Conversion Act would provide a temporary income guarantee for the unemployed defense worker—also designed to insure that the worker does not abandon his community in search of greener pastures, and that he has time to find new local work and remain a productive member of his community.

Each eligible worker would receive benefits totaling 90 percent of the first $20,000 earned under the canceled contract, and 50 percent of the next $5,000, for a period as long as he worked on the contract up to a maximum of 2 years. Other forms of income assistance, including any outside income, would first be deducted from these benefits.

The Economic Conversion Act, mindful of the deficit problem, requires no new Federal spending, no new appropriations, no new additions to the Federal deficit, no more red ink. The money saved from the canceled defense contract would be funneled back into the economic conversion program.

According to the CBO, the cost of the program for one lost contract would be about $1 million, planning grant and income aid included. Compared to the compensation Rockwell received in 1977 for the lost B-1 bomber contract ($750 million), $1 million is not much at all to ask for the defense worker and his community. The $9 million excess, saved from the canceled contract and not used by the economic conversion program, could be used to trim the deficit or in other economically productive programs.

The Economic Conversion Act represents good, hardnosed economics, of the kind practiced in the private sector. It also represents a cost-conscious approach to solving a chronic and difficult problem caused by defense cutbacks.

Perhaps most important, it shows us, as Members of Congress, the way to vote on the various and sundry items in the defense budget strictly on their merits.

The choice need not be between peace and jobs. Economic conversion means jobs and peace.

For myself and the other cosponsors, I ask for your support of this bill.●

TRIBUTE TO NICHOLAS JOHN LOUNTZIS

HON. GUS YATRON

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 8, 1984

● Mr. YATRON. Mr. Speaker, it is my honor today to recognize the accomplishments of my good friend, Nicholas John Lountzis, who will celebrate his 90th birthday on February 17, 1984. Mr. Lountzis has distinguished himself through the years as an outstanding restauranteur. His achievements are truly remarkable and I welcome this opportunity to bring Nicholas J. Lountzis to the attention of my colleagues in the U.S. Congress.

Mr. Lountzis was born in Vousdre, Greece. He has 1 brother and 4 sisters and he spent his early years as a shepherd, tending a flock of 350 sheep and 150 goats. When he was 17, with $25 in his pocket and knowing only one English word, "Boston," Nick sailed for the United States. Arriving at Ellis Island, he traveled directly to Boston where, with the help of friends, he obtained employment as a dishwasher. In 1911, he was earning $5 a week. After 3 months he began to shine shoes.

In 1912, Nick moved to Maine where he later opened his own shoeshine-hat cleaning shop. In 1915 he moved to Detroit with intentions of working with Henry Ford. However, when he arrived he changed his mind and put his efforts instead into a hot dog stand directly across from the automobile plant. He then worked at a soda fountain, where he served without pay for 3 months and earned the trust and respect of the owner. He stayed at this job for 2 years. Moving to Chicago in 1917, Nick began working for a Mr. Demetes who operated the finest soda fountain-luncheonette in the city. In 1918, Nick was to join the U.S. Infantry, nearly arriving for the armistice in France. The war ended in November, however, and he was stationed in Texas. He earned the rank of corporal and returned to Chicago for another year.

The year 1920 was a year of hardship. Nick lost his savings to a con-artist in a faulty business venture and after working 3 months in a concession stand at one of the most extravagant theaters in Hammond, Ind., the stand was bombed. In 1923, Nick returned to New York and subsequently went into a partnership on a luncheonette at 59th and Madison Avenue called the "Alps." After a year he bought out his partner and for the first time since 1914 Nick owned his own business. In 1927, Nick returned to Chicago, where he met his future wife, Anna Allushuski, a coal miners daughter from Girardville, Pa. They married in 1930 and had a son, Nickolas, Jr., in 1932. In 1934, Nick and his family came to Reading, Pa., where they made their permanent home.

Nick's first job in Reading was at the historic Crystal Restaurant, which was the starting place for many Greeks who branched off into their own businesses. To this day, many of the finest restaurants in Berks County are operated by those who had their original training by the owner of the Crystal, Mr. Mantis, or by Nick himself. In 1935, Nick and Anna had another son, William J. His proficiency in the restaurant business grew and he was instrumental in establishing many innovations in the Crystal restaurant that increased business. He worked there for 12 years and became known as a famous mixmaster. He saved, invested, and also helped to manage the Mount Penn Tavern. By 1947, he was ready to begin his own restaurant. He purchased the "Chat-a-While Inn," opening it on his wedding anniversary on February 19, 2 days following his 53d birthday. He had accomplished his dream. In future years he expanded the restaurant, remodeled it and established it as one of the finest eating places in the area. He also arranged passage for more than a half-dozen family members and friends to come from Greece. In later years, he owned two other restaurants, the Valley Inn and the Riveredge which he later sold. In 1970 he began a 5-year term as president of St. Matthews Greek Orthodox Church. The year 1977 was a sad time, as he lost his beloved wife.

Today, Nick still greets his guests at Nick's Chat-a-While Inn with warm congeniality, making certain everything is more than satisfactory. His two sons and his one grandson work at the restaurant. Nick has also been involved with the Blue Lodge, the Shriners, the American Legion, the National Restaurant Association, the Greek Democratic Club and was the treasurer of AHEPA.

This detailed account of Nick's life, I feel, serves to underline the experience of many immigrants who have come to our great Nation in search of a better life for themselves and their families. Nick Lountzis has made a significant contribution to our country through his years of hard work and perseverance. He has shown what can be accomplished through determination in a free society. I know that my colleagues will join me in wishing Nick a very happy 90th birthday and will wish him continued success in the years to come.●

UNIFORM CRIME REPORTS

HON. BARBARA B. KENNELLY

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 8, 1984

● Mrs. KENNELLY. Mr. Speaker, the bill I am introducing today requires the Attorney General to include in the FBI's Uniform Crime Reports information concerning the incidence of crimes where it appears that to crimes were committed to express racial, religious, or ethnic prejudice. The idea of developing a nationwide system of reporting to produce an accurate measurement of this type of crime was first advanced by the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights in July of 1983, and it is my hope that this bill will turn that recommendation into a reality.

A series of arsons of synagogues in my congressional district last fall drew my attention to this problem. Each year, hundreds of acts of violence and intimidation are committed against specific groups in every region of the country because of their race, religion, or ethnic background. Every time they occur, they threaten the basic precepts of a peaceful and pluralistic society. Cross burnings, swastikas sprayed across the walls of a temple or school, desecrations, arson, or intimidation of people because of their skin color, religion, or ethnic heritage, is a threat to us all.

Unfortunately, it is impossible to measure the extent of the problem. We do not know the amount, location, or type of crime that is motivated by racial, religious, or ethnic hatred. We do not know if it is on the rise or on the ebb. There is simply a shortage of hard data about this problem, with the exception of information collected by the Anti-Defamation League. Their efforts, while very useful, only cover anti-Semitic incidents in selected areas throughout the country. This is not enough.

Although annual crime statistics are collected and published by the Federal Bureau of Investigation in the Uniform Crime Reports, the slaying of a spouse in a domestic quarrel and the murder of a black person because of his color are both recorded as homocide.

There is a clear and demonstrable need for reliable statistical information on the subject of crime motivated by racial, religious, or ethnic hatred. Communities presently cannot respond to the problem because there is not enough information on criminal violence motivated by bigotry. This makes it very difficult for law enforcement officials to measure trends in such crimes, to develop enforcement strategies, and to allocate personnel in areas of greatest need. The lack of data impairs the ability of policymakers to assess the extent of the problem and develop adequate measures of prevention. Such data is also needed to highlight and determine national, local, and regional trends in this type of crime, and to evaluate the effectiveness of particular efforts employed to combat it. In addtion, such statistics would insure that Federal, State, and local governments are aware of the dimension of this threat. It would help reinforce the fact that the problem does exist across the Nation and that must be addressed.

Finally, on a symbolic but nonetheless important level, the systematic gathering of information about these crimes would represent society's statement that it is important to know the dimension of the problem, and that we as a people are willing to commit time and resources to eradicating bigotry, racism, and its violent byproducts.●

THE STATUS OF BLACKS IN MEDICINE

HON. WYCHE FOWLER, JR.

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 8, 1984

● Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Speaker, recently there have been a number of articles in the national news media concerning what some authorities perceive to be a looming surplus of doctors in this country. A "doctor glut" is a phrase frequently used in these articles.

However, forcasts of an oversupply of physicians—even if accurate as to the overall doctor force—certainly do not apply to blacks and other minorities. The harsh fact is that we historically have suffered from a severe and chronic shortage of black and other minority doctors in this country. I, for one, am convinced that this is a major reason why health problems among black Americans are greater than among our white citizens. This disparity has been confirmed by the Department of Health and Human Services' Health Report for 1983 released last month. The report showed that black Americans have an average life expectancy 6 years less than white Americans, are almost twice as likely to suffer from high blood pressure, and have an infant mortality rate twice that for white infants.

Mr. Speaker, the status of blacks in medicine is the subject of a special report published recently in the prestigious New England Journal of Medicine. It was written by Louis W. Sullivan, M.D., president and dean of Morehouse School of Medicine, which is located in my district in Atlanta and is the first predominantly black medical school to be established in the United States in this century. Dr. Sullivan is a distinguished physician and medical educator and an acknowledged authority on black health conditions.

In his report, Dr. Sullivan documents the shortage of black doctors in the United States and presents some of the tragic evidence of the health disparity among black Americans. Among other sources, Dr. Sullivan cites a far-reaching study conducted by the Association of Minority Health Professions Schools under a grant from the Robert Wood Johnson Foundation entitled: "Blacks and the Health Professions in the 80's: A National Crisis and a Time for Action." The study was released last June and is itself required reading for anyone concerned about black health problems and the status of black health professions in this country.

Mr. Speaker, I commend Dr. Sullivan's perceptive report to the Members of the House and include it in the RECORD at this point in my remarks:

THE STATUS OF BLACKS IN MEDICINE—PHILOSOPHICAL AND ETHICAL DILEMMAS FOR THE 1980'S

(By Louis W. Sullivan, M.D.)

Of interest to those in medicine and the other health professions is a study recently completed by the Association of Minority Health Professions Schools.[1] The members of this association are from eight predominantly black health-professions schools: Morehouse School of Medicine (Atlanta), Charles R. Drew Medical School (Los Angeles), Meharry Medical College, Meharry Dental School (Nashville), Tuskegee Institute School of Veterinary Medicine (Tuskegee, Ala.), the College of Pharmacy at Texas Southern University (Houston), Xavier University (New Orleans), and Florida Agricultural and Mechanical University (Tallahassee).

The study provides a current perspective on the poor health status of blacks in the United States. For example, it points out that the present average life expectancy of black American males is five years shorter than that for white American males (65.3 vs. 70.5 years) and that the infant mortality rate for black Americans is twice as high as that for white Americans (21.8 vs. 11.4 deaths per 1000 live births).

However, these averages obscure some appalling figures in some rural areas and inner cities of our country. For example, in Georgia today the average life expectancy of blacks is 8.4 years shorter than that for whites. In six rural counties in Georgia, the life expectancy for black males is only 49.6 to 51.5 years, whereas the average life expectancy for white males in the same counties is from 59.5 to 69.5 years.[2] In Kenya, one of the less-developed and poorer countries of the world, the average life expectancy of the male population is 51.3 years, exceeding that in some rural counties in Georgia.[3] In 1980, in 50 rural counties among Georgia's 159 counties, the infant mortality rate for blacks was higher than 30 per 1000 live births, and in 16 counties the rate was higher than 43 per 1000. Similar rates are found in many rural areas and inner cities all over the United States.

The Association's study documents the continuing shortages of black physicians and other black health professionals. In 1950, only 2.1 per cent of all the physicians in the United States were black. Despite the efforts of the past two decades, in 1980 black physicians represented only 2.6 per cent of all physicians in the United States. In 1981, less than 2 per cent of the faculties of our medical schools were black.

In 1983, the scarcity of black role models among practicing physicians and medical-school faculties in the United States suggests to black young people that it is not realistic to aspire to be a physician. This negative message to black youngsters is reinforced by poor counseling in high school and college, where black students are often steered into vocational courses and less rigorous academic subjects, leaving many of them poorly prepared for the study of medicine.

Compounding this longstanding problem in medicine is the recent advent of a severe shortage of funds for student financial aid, which was documented a few months ago in the Journal.[4] Because most black medical students come from families with annual incomes of below $20,000, the Association's study suggests that unless more funds are made available for scholarships and low-interest loans for low-income students, there is a very real possibility that the number of blacks enrolling in medical schools in the future will drop precipitously. Furthermore, the medical students who do graduate in future years will be less likely to practice as primary-care physicians in poorer communities, since they will need to earn high incomes as specialists in affluent communities, so that they can repay their large debts. Because millions of Americans still reside in rural areas and inner cities without physicians, this projected distribution of new physicians would be just the opposite of what is needed.

Also addressed in the study is the contribution of the predominantly black medical schools to the education of black physicians. Despite considerable expansion in medical education in the United States during the past 25 years, in 1981-1982, the four predominantly black medical schools (Morehouse, Meharry, Drew, and Howard) had almost 25 percent of the black students in the nation's 127 medical schools. Six of the nation's medical schools had no black students, and 75 (61 percent) had a black student enrollment of less than 5 percent, whereas blacks comprise almost 12 percent of the U.S. population. These figures reflect a need for predominantly black medical schools in the United States. In addition, other studies have shown that more than 60 percent of the graduates of Meharry and Howard medical schools practice in medically underserved inner cities and rural areas[5] (and Elam L: person communication).

The predominantly black medical schools adhere to the same high standards of medical education, and are measured by the same yardsticks for accreditation of their programs, as are applied to all other medical schools. However, black medical schools have operated with inadequate financial resources and without access to the clinical facilities available to other medical schools.

These problems and a number of others described in the Association's study have served to deter our black young people from pursuing medicine as a career. Predominantly black health-professions schools have also been rendered financially vulnerable because of severe retrenchment in federal support for medical education and research, as well as the ravages of inflation and recession in our nation's economy.

Because black physicians and predominantly black medical schools are needed to address the severe unmet health-care needs of our poor and minority citizens, our nation and our profession face a philosphical and ethical dilemma: Either we provide the financial and other resources needed to implement our country's creed of equal opportunity, or we abandon a large segment of our population to a high infant mortality, a shortened life expectancy, debilitating poverty, a crushing burden of illness and disability, and increasing disillusionment, frustration, and loss of hope. As the most affluent of nations and the leader of the free world, we should not allow this to happen.

Education has always provided the chance for upward mobility in our society, and it still can today—for blacks and other minorities as well as for poor whites. Medical education is an important part of this opportunity for self-improvement, and the existence of this opportunity is a symbol of hope for minorities and an affirmation of the American dream.

The contribution of black institutions to the vitality and the advancement of the United States has never been fully appreciated. For example, more than half the black physicians practicing in the United States today are graduates of Meharry or Howard medical schools, each more than 100 years old. Our current deficits in the number of black physicians would be much greater if these two schools not exist.

The Association's report suggests that black health-professions schools should be strengthened by increased financial support for their programs from governmental sources (federal, state, county, and municipal) and from the private sector (foundations, corporations, associations, and individuals). Black health-professions schools should have equal access to tax-based municipal and veterans administration hospitals and other clinical facilities for their teaching and service programs and for the opportunities to contribute to the nation's biomedical-research enterprise. The National Institutes of Health, the National Science Foundation, and other public and private research agencies should work with these schools to strengthen their research capabilities, drawing on their unique perspectives and their ability to focus on the health problems of blacks and other minority groups.

Adequate scholarships, work—study funds, and low-interest loans should be made available to medical students from low-income and minority groups, so that the best candidates available can become our future physicians and the possibility of becoming a physician will not be foreclosed to bright young people who happen to be from minority and low-income families. In association with the dramatic curtailment of federal programs for student financial aid, during the past two years at the Morehouse School of Medicine we have observed a decrease in the number of entering freshman students from families with annual incomes below $20,000 and a concomitant increase in the number from families with incomes of $30,000 or more.

All medical schools should expand and reinforce their commitment to recruiting and educating more black students. In 1978, there were only 793 black students among 14,393 medical-school graduates (5.5 per cent); by 1982, the number of blacks had decreased to 763 (4.8 per cent) among 15,985 medical-school graduates.

Governors, state legislatures, boards of regents, and other leaders should urge the publicly supported medical schools in their states to increase the number of black students enrolled. A recent report from the Southern Regional Education Board, a 14-state cooperative educational agency, has urged the training of more black physicians, noting that whereas blacks comprise 19 per cent of the population of the South, less than 3 per cent of the physicians in the South are black.[6] This report, like the 1980 report of the Graduate Medical Education National Advisory Committee,[7] pointed out the need for more black physicians, even while recommending reductions in the overall production of physicians in the United States.[6 7]

Many factors other than the availability of physicians affect the health status of blacks, but it is necessary to have an adequate number of physicians. It is helpful to have black physicians who understand and respect the culture, history, and social status of their black patients. It is also helpful to have physicians who live in the communities they serve and who contribute to solving community problems.

A coordinated effort is needed to respond to the crisis described in the Association's report. We need vigorous leadership from the President, the Congress, federal agencies, governors, state legislatures, and county and city governments. We also need leadership from the private sector, for it too is affected by these problems, and it has a stake in finding solutions to them.●

THE STATE OF UNITED STATES-SOVIET RELATIONS MANDATES CRISIS COMMUNICATIONS

HON. FORTNEY H. (PETE) STARK

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 8, 1984

● Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, arms control and national security issues have assumed a high political profile. Much of the congressional debate has focused on the merits, or lack thereof, of various technical arms control proposals and weapons systems. This debate has been constructive, and will undoubtedly continue throughout the current session.

Discussion of these technical issues, however, has obscured perhaps the most important factor in our efforts to avoid nuclear war. I refer to the ability of the superpowers to manage crises which could unintentionally escalate to a nuclear exchange.

Various imaginable force structures on both sides can affect the stability of the nuclear balance in any given hypothetical situation. But it will be our "in-place" crisis management capability that determines whether the weapons deployed become the weapons fired.

My colleague, Mr. DREIER, and I have introduced a bill, H.R. 408, which addresses this question. I am inserting the text of this bill in the RECORD, along with a list of the current cosponsors, which I feel demonstrate the bipartisan nature of our support.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) the Congress finds that—

(1) the threat of nuclear war is of increasing concern to the citizenry of both the United States and the Soviet Union;

(2) the need has long been recognized for assuring quick and reliable communications directly between the leaders of the United States and the Soviet Union in order to reduce the danger of nuclear war arising from accident or miscalculation;

(3) the "hot line" established in 1963 is currently the only such means for direct and immediate communications between the leaders of the United States and the Soviet Union; and

(4) increased communications and consultation between the Governments of these two countries may substantially decrease the threat of war.

(b) Therefore, the President shall seek to negotiate an agreement with the Soviet Union for the establishment of a permanent joint United States-Soviet Communications Center to provide an additional channel for communications between the United States and the Soviet Union in order to reduce the threat of an accidental nuclear war. The agreement negotiated pursuant to this Act should provide that—

(1) the function of the Communications Center would be to serve as a direct and secure means of communications between the United States and the Soviet Union;

(2) the Center would have no intelligence-gathering capabilities of its own and would not be used for the purposes of espionage;

(3) the Center would be located in a third country agreed upon by the United States and the Soviet Union, with the costs of operating the Center to be shared equally by the United States and the Soviet Union; and

(4) the Center would be staffed by an equal number of personnel (including all technical, military, and diplomatic personnel) from each country, with the head of each country's delegation being an individual with the rank of ambassador.

SEC. 2. the agreement negotiated pursuant to this Act shall be either a treaty or an executive agreement which will enter into force only upon its approval by both Houses of the Congress.

TRIBUTE TO DR. STANFORD ROSEN

HON. RICHARD C. SHELBY

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 8, 1984

● Mr. SHELBY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to pay tribute to and recognize Dr. Stanford Rosen, an outstanding citizen and fine podiatric surgeon who lives in my hometown of Tuscaloosa, Ala.

Dr. Rosen has recently been elected president of the academy of Ambulatory Foot Surgery, an international organization of specialists who use surgical techniques to remedy foot problems without overnight hospitalization. This honor is just one of many that has been bestowed upon Dr. Rosen during his highly successful practice of podiatric medicine.

In 1962 he graduated from Geneva College in Beaver Falls, Pa. He received his D.P.M. degree in Cleveland at the Ohio College of Podiatric Medicine in 1966.

After graduation he was a private practitioner in Columbus, Ohio, for 5 years. From 1972 to 1974 he worked at the University of Alabama in Birmingham, as chief of podiatry for the Diabetes Hospital and served as an assistant professor of podiatry in medicine at the U.A.B. School of Medicine.

From 1974 to 1981 Dr. Rosen was director of the Podiatry Center in Vestavia, Ala. He came to his present practicing position at the Foot Health Center in Tuscaloosa, Ala., in May of 1982.

Dr. Rosen's leadership capabilities in his field have earned many honors and appointments. He was selected as a member of the Govenor's staff for 1973-79 and 1980-84. He has served as vice president and board member of the Birmingham Lay Diabetes Society; public health chairman and president of the Alabama Podiatry Association; board of directors of the Birmingham Regional Health Systems Agency; and was listed in "Who's Who in America."

Dr. Rosen has continued his fine spirit of helping others, not only in his professional field, but in his community as well. During his residency in Tuscaloosa he has served as vice president of the Tuscalossa Quarterback Club; taken an active membership in the Tuscaloosa Tip-Off Club; and served on the University of Alabama Scholarship Committee.

Dr. Rosen is a widely published author in many professional journals. Some of his outstanding articles include "Podiatry and its Role in Diabetic Medicine," Alabama Journal of Medicine, 1972; "The Foot—The Forgotten Part," Alabama Journal of Medicine, 1974; "What Diabetes Means to the Podiatrist," Current Podiatry, May 1977; "Restless Leg Syndrome," Alabama Journal of Medicine, 1981; and "Wilson Bunionectory," Academy of Ambulatory Foot Surgery Journal, 1983.

Mr. Speaker, Dr. Stanford Rosen is a fine example of an individual who has made many outstanding contributions to his profession. He is an asset to his community whose praiseworthy efforts serve as an inspiration to all of us.

He has given so much of himself to others and I believe this tribute is certainly deserving to this outstanding individual. The podiatry profession is fortunate to have a man like Dr. Rosen on their team.

I want to also take this opportunity to express to Joan, his lovely wife, and their seven children, what an honor it is for me to recognize a man like Dr. Rosen. I am proud to have a gentleman of this caliber in my district and in my hometown of Tuscaloosa. I know he will be successful in whatever task he undertakes, and I wish him the very best in all future endeavors.●

TRIBUTE TO PITTSTON SAN CATALDO SOCIETY

HON. FRANK HARRISON

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 8, 1984

● Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to the San Cataldo Society of Pittston. This nonprofit organization was established in the year 1903, which makes the San Cataldo Society the oldest in the Wyoming Valley. Its membership today totals 265 regular members plus an additional 142 social members, of which I am honored to be one.

The purpose of the society is to provide good citizenship, to get involved in civic affairs, encourage the exercise of the right to vote, and to provide for the welfare of all of its members, both regular and social.

The officers of the society this year are Salvatore Anzalone, president; Joseph Leonardi, vice president; Joseph Falzone, treasurer; Raimondo Leonardi, treasurer; Carmen M. Saporito, recording secretary and Frank Scarantino, assistant treasurer.

This is the kind of charitable organization, Mr. Speaker, which is at the bedrock of our community values. It seeks to deal with community problems, it helps its members and it works to build a better place in which to live. It is a pleasure for me to salute its officers and members in this 81st year of its existence and to wish for my friends in the San Cataldo Society many, many more years of social friendship and successful service to the community.●

TRIBUTE TO ROBERT L. TIENKEN

HON. LOUIS STOKES

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 8, 1984

● Mr. STOKES. Mr. Speaker, the Congress recently lost the valued and trusted services of an acknowledged congressional scholar and outstanding public servant with the retirement of Robert L. Tienken of the Congressional Research Service. He was Senior Specialist in American Public Law and a recognized expert in the areas of ethics in Government and congressional procedures.

As an adviser to the House Committee on Standards of Official Conduct, Mr. Tienken provided our committee with invaluable counsel on a wide range of matters that come within its jurisdiction. Despite the thorny and frequently unprecedented nature of many of the problems brought to him by committee members and staff, he unfailingly provided illuminating and helpful advice and counsel.

Two stars guided Robert Tienken's professional life, the Constitution and the Congress of the United States. He revered both—a reverence evident in all his work for the Congress and in the performance of his assignments. For him, the Constitution and the rules and precedents of the House and Senate are the result of reason and of reasonable men and women and insure a workable legislative process.

Robert Tienken brought distinction to everything he undertook—at Princeton, where he earned a bachelor's degree summa cum laude, as a graduate of the Yale University Law School, and as a member of the New York State Bar.

Following several years of practice in an insurance law office in New York City and several more years in private legal practice in Princeton—where he simultaneously pursued graduate studies in political science—Robert Tienken came to Washington in 1957. For a number of years thereafter, he served as legislative assistant first on the staff of Senator H. Alexander Smith of New Jersey and, after the Senator's retirement, with Representative Seymour Halpern of New York.

In 1961, Tienken joined the Congressional Research Services' American Law Division where his many talents became available to the entire Congress, not simply one office. In 1973, he became Senior Specialist in American Public Law, a position for which by training, ability, and disposition he was preeminently qualified.

Tienken played a significant research and advisory role in many issues that affected Congress throughout the 1960's and 1970's including issues of ethics in Government, congressional procedures, contested elections controversies, reapportionment and redistricting, and Congress and the courts. His work in these areas was distinguished by its comprehensiveness, scholarly detachment, and unquestionable good sense. In all of his endeavors for Congress, Robert Tienken strove to provide a product that was useful and meaningful to the legislative process, not something to grace congressional office shelves, much admired and little read.

Robert not only earned the respect and admiration of his congressional clients, he was greatly admired and universally liked by his CRS colleagues. For them, as for us, his encyclopedic knowledge and institutional memory opened the door to solutions to many problems. Notwithstanding his own crowded docket, he always found time to provide invaluable assistance to one and all. When consulted—and his counsel was widely sought—the matter at hand became the focus of attention while he himself, with amiability and unaffected modesty, receded to the background.

Robert L. Tienken has been throughout his life the essence of civility, courtliness, kindness, and amiability. Those of us who have benefited from his long labors on behalf of Congress and the American people will miss him. I join his wide circle of appreciative clients and friends in wishing him a deservedly long, healthy, and happy retirement.●

THE STRUGGLE FOR JUSTICE CONTINUES

HON. SALA BURTON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 8, 1984

● Mrs. BURTON of California. Mr. Speaker, on February 18, 1984, the Bay Area Day of Remembrance Committee will be sponsoring an event entitled, "The Struggle for Justice Continues." This special day will commemorate an event which I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues.

Forty-two years ago, on February 19, 1942, President Franklin D. Roosevelt signed into law Executive Order 9066 which authorized the evacuation of 120,000 persons of Japanese ancestry from the west coast, two-thirds of whom were American citizens.

Executive Order 9066 gave military officials the authority to remove these individuals from their homes to assembly centers—temporary living quarters at racetracks and fairgrounds—and then to 10 relocation centers, dispersed throughout isolated parts of the United States for the remainder of World War II. Although many of the people interned were allowed to leave the relocation centers to attend schools or seek employment, the majority of the Japanese Issei and Nisei, first and second generation Japanese Americans, made their tar-papered barrack rooms their homes behind the guarded barbed wire fence during the war years.

As we reflect upon this terrible injustice imposed on loyal Americans who were denied their basic constitutional rights and civil liberties, it is my fervent hope that this kind of tragedy will never occur again in the course of our Nation's history.

The loss of personal liberty and the prejudices which were inflicted upon Americans of Japanese descent will forever remain as scars and painful memories among these former internees.

It would seem that some 40 years later, we would have a better understanding of other ethnic groups. Yet, the struggle for justice must continue, for it was just a year ago that an innocent American of Chinese descent was beaten to death because his racial identity was mistaken by two men angered by the effect of Japanese car sales on our economy. Perhaps the most shocking aspect of this case were the judge's statements that these men, under ordinary circumstances, would not harm others. The two men were ordered to pay a fine of $3,000 and were placed on probation. This example of the denial of civil rights for minority groups makes it essential for all Americans to be vigilant in protecting the rights of their fellow Americans.

In the House of Representatives, we have followed the recommendations of the Commission on Wartime Relocation and Internment of Civilians and introduced legislation to compensate the victims of this injustice. I will work with my colleagues to pass this legislation.

This year, the Bay Area Day of Remembrance Committee will be addressing and emphasizing the theme entitled, "The Struggle for Justice Continues." I would like to take this opportunity to join this group and recognize February 19 as a day of remembrance to reflect upon the goals of freedom and justice which we all strive to achieve.●

WEST LEECHBURG TRIPLETS JOIN MARINE CORPS

HON. JOSEPH M. GAYDOS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 8, 1984

● Mr. GAYDOS. Mr. Speaker, earlier this year the U.S. Marine Corps scored another first in its illustrious career.

On January 6, 1984, Robert, Mark, and Edwin DeLancey, triplet sons of Mr. and Mrs. Robert and Sarah DeLancey of 112 Jantosik Street, West Leechburg, Pa., raised their right hands and were sworn into military service as marines.

It was the first time in the recorded history of the corps' recruiting station in Pittsburgh, Pa., that a set of triplets had enlisted together. And, it is my understanding that although such records are not kept at Marine Corps Headquarters such an event is looked upon as a rare occurrence, indeed.

The DeLancey triplets were recruited by Sgt. William Neilson of the Pittsburgh station and after their swearing-in ceremonies they left for boot camp at Parris Island, S.C.

Major James P. Walsh, commanding officer of the Pittsburgh station, said the three young men "are a positive reflection on the patriotism shown by the men and women of today." He added the corps was extremely proud to welcome the DeLancey's into its ranks.

As the representative from the 20th Congressional District of Pennsylvania, where the DeLancey family resides, I, too, am proud of these young men. They have demonstrated a love of country and a willingness to serve in its defense which seems to be growing more prevalent among the Nation's young adults.

And, these 20-year-old triplets are carrying on a family tradition by their enlistment. They are following in the footsteps of their father, Robert Sr., an employee of West Leechburg Works of Allegheny Ludlum Steel Corp. Mr. DeLancey enlisted in the Air Force during World War II and served with the 482d Bomb Group in Europe.

Mr. Speaker, I am sure my colleagues in the Congress of the United States join me in applauding Robert, Mark, and Edwin DeLancey and wishing them well in their new careers.●

GREGORY MACKRIDES

HON. ROBERT A. BORSKI

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 8, 1984

● Mr. BORSKI. Mr. Speaker, I rise to bring to the attention of my colleagues an outstanding example of citizenship and bravery in the heroism displayed by Mr. Gregory Mackrides of Philadelphia.

On the evening of April 4, 1982 in Philadelphia, Mr. Mackrides intervened in an attempted assault by two men on Warren Parks, a 14-year-old youth. While attempting to protect the youth, Mr. Mackrides sustained serious injuries from blows and stab wounds.

Mr. Mackrides has long been active in sports in the city of Philadelphia. He presently is the director of the Sports Clinic of Philadelphia. His skills in weight-lifting led many to believe he would be a strong contender for the 1984 Olympic games. Tragically, the injuries sustained in the attack will prevent him from realizing this dream.

Gregory Mackrides deserves the fullest recognition and appreciation of the American people. Serious crime is a scourge on life in America today. Efforts are underway to improve the effectiveness and efficiency of our law enforcement and judicial systems. The individual can and should contribute in many important ways to the law enforcement process. Sadly, many do not want "to become involved." Gregory Mackrides became involved in a most serious way. He is an example of the best kind of citizen—someone who cares about his fellow man.

Mr. Mackrides has received a Presidential commendation for his heroism, as well as recognition from State and local government and civic organizations. Gregory Mackrides' citizenship extends beyond his actions on behalf of Warren Parks. Through his work in the Sports Clinic, he has contributed toward the physical and moral development of young people in Philadelphia. He is the past president of the Optimist Club in Torresdale. He is also founder of the Northeast Victims of Crime, an organization devoted to assisting victims of crime through its efforts in cooperation with law enforcement agencies and counseling groups.

Gregory Mackrides' heroism and continuing citizenship is an example for all to follow.●

TRIBUTE TO LEFTY TRUSZOWSKI

HON. FRANK HARRISON

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 8, 1984

● Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, on Sunday, March 4, Alex "Lefty" Truszkowski better known as "Lefty and His Singing Accordion," will be honored at a testimonial dinner-dance.

For the last 55 years, Lefty has dedicated his life to music and, in particular, to polka music. He is famous throughout the Wyoming valley for bringing that music, with everlasting good cheer, a smile and a friendly remark far and wide to almost every conceivable type of public and private event. He has performed for weddings, clubs, social affairs and "Polish Day" programs throughout the State of Pennsylvania. He has also given selflessly of his time to entertain patients in hospitals and all of us at numerous charitable events.

And so, Mr. Speaker, Sunday, March 4, his family, friends, and neighbors will return to Lefty some of the joy that he has given to others. It is my pleasure to join in that tribute here today and to recognize not only my friend "Lefty" but to his wife, Stella, whose strength and support has made possible so much that he has done.●

LITHUANIAN INDEPENDENCE

HON. BARBARA A. MIKULSKI

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 8, 1984

● Ms. MIKULSKI. Mr. Speaker, I join in noting with Lithuanians around the world the 66th anniversary of the declaration of Lithuanian independence which took place on February 16, 1918. Lithuania is home to a proud people who are subjected unwillingly to Soviet oppression. Their independence, established in 1918, was sadly cut short after a heroic struggle against the numerically superior forces of Communist Russia.

The Lithuanian people, however, continue to demonstrate tremendous courage when faced with constant Soviet attempts to eradicate all forms of their culture and tradition. Despite the most severe forms of repression and religious persecution, Lithuanian culture and tradition still thrive. All Lithuanians retain a strong desire for freedom, and it is this desire from which they get their strength.

The Lithuanians are a symbol to the world of a people determined to maintain their culture, traditions, language, and religion even though the Soviet Union controls their society.

Through their determination, the Lithuanians have succeeded in maintaining their nationalistic spirit, and that spirit remains alive today.

It is this spirit of freedom that we honor today. Let the Lithuanian people know that we, in the United States, recognize and respect their right to freedom and self-determination. We honor and encourage their perseverance. Their struggle is not, and will not, be forgotten.●

KISSINGER COMMISSION CRITICIZED

HON. ANDREW JACOBS, JR.

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 8, 1984

● Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Speaker, the following are news releases from the Christian Church (Disciples of Christ) of Indianapolis, Ind.

Before Congress throws one more saddle on U.S. taxpayers, I think we should all reflect on these criticisms of the Kissinger Commission which, as President Reagan has said in essence, have rubber stamped the administration's military-look-the-other-way-on-human-rights policy in Latin America.

TEGUCIGALPA, HONDURAS (DNS).—The lone Christian Democrat in Honduras' Congress says the Kissinger Commission on Central America was not interested in hearing views opposing the American military presence.

The commission did not interview opposition leaders in Honduras, says Efraín A. Díaz Arrivallaga. Most Hondurans are afraid to speak out because anything other than unquestioned support draws the label "communist."

Congressman Díaz told four visiting executives of the Christian Church (Disciples of Christ) that many Hondurans believe the United States has no interest in this poor country's problems but is using Honduras to deal with its own military objectives in Nicaragua and El Salvador.

Díaz says he does not believe that Nicaragua is trying to destablize Honduras and that nobody believes the Honduran government line that there are no Nicaraguan counter-revolutionaries operating from Honduran soil.

The young economist told the visitors that Americans hear more about what is going on than Hondurans and that his own views are not published in the capital.

Díaz said the Honduran Congress never has debated the American military presence. The government has made modifications to an existing treaty to allow for the building of two radar stations supporting recognizance flights, five military air-fields, a military science center for training Salvadoran troops, the Pine One, Two and Three war games and a proposed permanent naval base similar to Guantanamo in Cuba.

Pine Three, he said, is planned for June along the frontier with El Salvador and Guatemala.

Díaz said Honduras has no border dispute with Nicaragua as it has had with El Salvador. Further, there is favorable economic balance. He feels Honduras is being pushed into a conflict with Nicaragua for the deaths will be Honduran and the objectives someone else's.

Díaz said that as a Christian he believes Honduras has had too much incursion by religious groups which "distort the Christian message" by supporting the status quo when the church should be a force for social change.

SAN SALVADOR, EL SALVADOR (DNS).—Four United States church officials were refused admittance to the Mariona Prison where political prisoners are detained, in their attempt to see a church worker held more than two months without charge.

Guards at the prison, after checking with superiors, turned the Americans away, explaining that church groups sometimes are a cover for journalists who write negative reports on the prison.

A delegation led by the Rev. David A. Vargas, executive secretary for Latin America and the Caribbean of the Christian Church (Disciples of Christ), had arranged a meeting with Ramón Grande García, arrested in November with other members of his family active in church refugee work.

The government considers providing shelter, food and medicine to refugees by the churches as assistance to guerrillas engaged in a war of independence.

American missionaries visit Grande weekly but members of his church are afraid to because of danger to Salvadorans. In addition to the murder of Archbishop Oscar Romero here, dozens of clergy have been killed and more than 400 lay workers have disappeared in recent years.

Grande, in his middle 20's and a church relief supplies worker, was arrested in a midnight raid in November along with his father, sister, 21-year-old brother and smaller children. Government troops sacked the house of the sister, stealing furniture, clothing and leading all but the small children away blindfolded.

In prison, the sister, a church secretary now freed, was beaten until she couldn't speak, tortured with electric shock, and forced to sign documents with her blindfold still on. The father and brother also still are being held.

Mariona Prison lies along a refuse-strewn road at the north of San Salvador where the so called "death squads" have dumped hundreds of bodies, some with the label "communist" sticking from their mouths.

Spokespersons for the Committee of the Mothers and Families of Disappeared, Imprisoned and Assassinated Political Victims told the visiting Disciples of Christ leaders that 40,000 civilians have been killed in the political violence and 5,000 have simply disappeared out of a population about equal to one of the larger cities in the U.S.●

TRIBUTE TO JUDGE LYLE EDSON

HON. TOM LANTOS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 8, 1984

● Mr. LANTOS. Mr. Speaker, tomorrow the San Mateo County Bar Association will host a farewell dinner to honor San Mateo County Superior Court Judge Lyle R. Edson for 20 years of judicial and civic accomplishments. Those who will attend are his peers in the legal profession and the many jurists for whom he has served as a model of excellence.

Judge Edson began his distinguished career with studies at the University of San Francisco, which were interrupted by meritorious service as a naval officer in the South Pacific during World War II. He completed his law degree at the University of San Francisco, graduating cum laude in 1948. He was admitted to the California Bar on January 11, 1949.

Judge Edson began his service to the citizens of San Mateo County when he was appointed deputy district attorney and then chief deputy district attorney in 1955. In 1964, he was appointed as a judge of the Municipal Court for the Southern Judicial District of San Mateo County by Gov. Edmund G. Brown. He remained on the municipal court bench until 1969 when his distinctive tenure was acknowledged by then Gov. Ronald Reagan, who appointed him a judge of the Superior Court of San Mateo County. It is especially his sensitivity and commitment which will be sorely missed with the retirement of Judge Edson.

A native of Ogden, Utah, Judge Edson has also distinguished himself as an involved resident of the community of Redwood City where he and his wife, Josephine, raised their 5 children. He has contributed greatly to many public service groups such as the Redwood City Public Library Board, the Rotary Club of Redwood City, and the California Judges Association. In these, as in all ventures he undertook, he exhibited valuable leadership.

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity to acknowledge the accomplishments of Judge Lyle R. Edson and to wish him and his family a very enjoyable and productive future.●

RABBI ARNOLD M. SHEVLIN RECEIVES B'NAI B'RITH COMMUNITY SERVICE AWARD FROM S. J. STRAUSS LODGE NO. 139

HON. FRANK HARRISON

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 8, 1984

● Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, on Sunday evening, February 12, the Seligman J. Strauss Lodge of B'nai B'rith will hold its annual Lincoln Day Dinner.

This is a significant event for our entire community. It symbolizes the brotherhood which should exist between all peoples and all races and which, indeed, must exist if we are ultimately to live in a world free of strife and the horrors of war.

But this event is significant for another reason, as well, Mr. Speaker. It affords the S. J. Strauss Lodge the opportunity to pay tribute, each year, to an outstanding individual through the presentation of their Community Service Award. This year's most deserving recipient of that tribute is Rabbi Arnold M. Shevlin, spiritual leader of Congregation B'nai B'rith of Wilkes-Barre, Pa.

Rabbi Shevlin was born in Philadelphia and is a graduate of Gratz College, Temple University, the Hebrew Union College-Institute of Religion and the Hebrew Union College. He holds the degrees both of doctor of divinity and of master of Hebrew literature.

In 1947, as a student rabbi, Arnold M. Shevlin founded Temple Israel in Fairfield, Conn. After 4 years service there, he entered the U.S. Army and served in the Korean Campaign. Upon his release from active duty, he served as rabbi in Temple Beth Sholom, Danville, Va., and Congregation Rodeph Shalom, Philadelphia. During this latter service, he was also vice president of the board of rabbis in Philadelphia and cochairman of the Governor's Committee on Mental Health for Philadelphia.

Fourteen years ago, Rabbi Shevlin came to Wilkes-Barre as the spiritual leader of Congregation B'nai B'rith. Its temple is presently located at 408 Wyoming Avenue, across the bridge in Kingston. That fact is symbolic; for Rabbi Shevlin's influence in the community spans not only the Susquehanna River but men, women and organizations of all faiths and national origins. The rabbi's interests and efforts are truly ecumenical. While in the Wyoming Valley, he has been a lecturer in the department of theology at King's College, an independent liberal arts college operated by the Fathers of the Congregation of the Holy Cross. He has served as Jewish chaplain at the Retreat State Hospital and at the Chase Correctional Institution in Dallas. He has been chairman of the Nesbitt Hospital Institutional Review Committee, vice chairman of the Wilkes-Barre General Hospital Pastoral Care Advisory Committee, first vice president of the Board of Directors of Home Care Management of Luzerne County. He has served on the advisory boards of both the Wyoming Valley Clinic and the Heinz Rehabilitation Center. His interests and activities extend as well to the Wilkes-Barre Rotary Club, the Luzerne County Historical Society, the Martin Luther King Committee of Luzerne County, the Century Club of King's College and the Planned Parenthood Association of Luzerne County.

His past memberships and affiliations are too numerous to mention, Mr. Speaker, but special note must be taken that he has given of his time as a lecturer at many of our institutions of higher learning: Wilkes College, College Misericordia, Keystone Junior College, and the Penn State University campus.

And so, Mr. Speaker, on the evening of February 12, the entire Wyoming Valley community will pause to pay tribute to a unique human being, to a man who symbolizes the brotherhood which the Lincoln Day Dinner was instituted to honor and to a man whose service, in so many different ways, has made our community a better place.

It is a pleasure for me, Mr. Speaker, to join with his congregation, his family, and his many friends in paying special tribute to Rabbi Arnold M. Shevlin on this occasion and, as well, to bring his achievements to the attention of my friends and colleagues here in the House.●

HELP FOR AGENT ORANGE VICTIMS

HON. ROBERT A. BORSKI

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 8, 1984

● Mr. BORSKI. Mr. Speaker, the passage in the House of Representatives of H.R. 1961, the Vietnam Veterans' Agent Orange Relief Act of 1983, is an important first step which may, at least in some small way, compensate those who were exposed to the harmful effects of agent orange. Agent orange, a toxic herbicide mixture, was used during the Vietnam war to defoliate jungle growth.

While in Vietnam, our soldiers faced all of the dangers of war, knowing it was possible to be injured or killed. Our Government also recognized these dangers and the potentially disabling environment in which our men and women served. The United States assumed responsibility for those soldiers who did, in fact, suffer physically and mentally from the ravages of war.

However, all of the damaging effects of the war were not known to those serving in Vietnam nor to the American public. Several years of herbicide spraying passed before the National Cancer Institute released results of studies examining the effects of agent orange on laboratory animals. The chemical compound for agent orange contains high levels of the contaminant dioxin. It was shown to cause birth defects in mice, generating great concern about similar effects in humans. At the same time, newspapers in Vietnam began to report the presence of health problems, including birth defects, in rural populations which had been exposed to herbicides.

The American response to this news was first, to restrict the use of agent orange to remote areas of Vietnam; then later, to stop all spraying of agent orange.

But thousands of veterans were exposed to agent orange before the ban in 1971. Many have developed serious illnesses, including skin conditions, cancer, liver ailments, numbness in the extremities, vision and hearing impairments, and birth defects in their children. They have urged the Veterans Administration to provide medical treatment for their disorders and many have filed for disability compensation. Most of these attempts to secure relief have not been successful as the Veterans Administration has hesitated to assume responsibility for the agent orange exposure.

Mr. Speaker, the Veterans Administration has refused to permit disability and death benefits for those veterans suffering the results of exposure to dioxin, claiming there is not conclusive evidence linking various medical ailments with exposure to agent orange. However, the Veterans Administration was responsible for conducting such medical studies. Through foot-dragging and delay tactics, it avoided undertaking any substantive research for several years.

Finally, in 1979, Congress ordered the Veterans Administration to document the health effects of agent orange. But the Administration was unable to determine how best to proceed with the study and, in October 1982, turned responsibility for the study over to the Centers for Disease Control, which is still conducting research.

During all of this time, Vietnam veterans continued to manifest illnesses and were unable to secure help from the country they served so valiantly. These veterans have certainly waited long enough. They need our help now. H.R. 1961 is one way in which we can help redress the physical suffering they have experienced.

While this legislation will not compensate veterans for all illnesses they developed after their return from Vietnam, it will provide disability and death benefits to victims of those conditions most likely to be caused by agent orange. Veterans will be permitted to recover for chloracne, a skin disorder; cancerous tumors of soft tissues; and, porphyria cutanea tarda, a rare liver disease.

I am proud to lend my support to this legislation. We asked much of our young men and women who served our country in Vietnam. We asked them to fight, suffer, and die. Now, they are asking for our help. H.R. 1961 is but one small way to alleviate the long-lasting effects of that war on these brave Americans.●

A TRIBUTE TO THE 175TH BIRTHDAY OF ABRAHAM LINCOLN

HON. FRANK J. GUARINI
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 8, 1984

● Mr. GUARINI. Mr. Speaker, February 12, 1984, will mark the 175th anniversary of the birth of Abraham Lincoln, the immortal 16th President of the United States of America.

It is my pleasure to have been invited once again to functions being conducted commemorating this great President's birthday as conducted by the Lincoln Association of Jersey City.

This association, composed of many of New Jersey's outstanding citizens, is the oldest continuous organization in the entire United States dedicated to the memory of Abraham Lincoln. Their annual events have been conducted continuously and without interruption since 1866, dedicated to the ideals and principals of this great man, who was principally responsible for the reservation of the United States of America from political disintegration in perhaps the most troubled time in our Nation's history.

In addition to paying tribute to the Great Emancipator, it is my desire to congratulate and compliment the Lincoln Association for its continued remembrance, perpetuating itself to the high ideals and principles of Abraham Lincoln.

The litany of Lincoln's difficult road to the White House is outlined as follows. A study thereof indicates the many disappointments and failures Abraham Lincoln encountered and endured and overcame before his election to the Presidency in 1860.

Statistics show that books and literature concerning Abraham Lincoln are only exceeded by the Bible. It is difficult to project new information on the greatness of Abraham Lincoln.

Homer Hock wrote:

LINCOLN

There is no new thing to be said of Lincoln. There is no new thing to be said of the mountains, or of the sea, or of the stars. The years may go their way, but the same old mountains lift their granite shoulders above the drifting clouds, the same mysterious seas beat upon the shore, and the same silent stars keep holy vigil above a tired world. But to mountains and seas and stars men turn forever in unwearied homage. And thus with Lincoln. For he was mountain in grandeur of soul; he was sea in deep undervoice of mystic loneliness; he was star in steadfast purity of purpose and of service. And he abides.

In the compilation by William E. Barton entitled "Abraham Lincoln's Creed" it is written:

I believe in God, the Almighty Ruler of nations, our great and good and merciful Maker, our Father in heaven, who notes the fall of a sparrow and numbers the hairs on our heads. I recognize the sublime truth announced in the Holy Scriptures and proved by all history that those nations are blessed whose God is the Lord. I believe that the will of God prevails. Without him, all human reliance is vain. With that assistance I cannot fail. I have a solemn vow registered in heaven to finish the work I am in, in full view of my responsibility to my God, with malice toward none; with charity for all; with firmness in the right, as God gives me to see the right.

Abraham Lincoln, with the trials and tribulations of his personal and political life, is epitomized in the late John F. Kennedy's "Profiles in Courage":

To be courageous requires no exceptional qualifications, no magic formula, no special combination of time, place, and circumstance. It is an opportunity that sooner or later is presented to us all. Politics merely furnish one arena which imposes special tests of courage. In whatever arena of life one may meet the challenge of courage, whatever may be the sacrifices he faces if he follows his conscience—the loss of his friends, his fortune, his contentment, even the esteem of his fellow men—each man must decide for himself the course he will follow. The stories of past courage can define that ingredient—they can teach, they can offer hope, they can provide inspiration. But they cannot supply courage itself. For this each man must look into his own soul.

WHAT PEOPLE SAID

The great poet Carl Sandburg said:

When people talked about Lincoln, it was nearly always about one or more of these five things: (1) how long, tall, quick, strong, or awkward in looks he was; (2) how he told stories and jokes, how he was comical or pleasant or kindly; (3) how he could be silent, melancholy, sad; (4) how he was ready to learn and looking for chances to learn; (5) how he was ready to help a friend, a stranger, or even a dumb animal in distress.

It was K. Morgan Edwards who made the comparison of Jesus Christ and Lincoln, who wrote in his comparison:

JESUS AND LINCOLN

There is a striking similarity between the Man of Galilee and the man from Illinois.
Both had obscure beginnings.
Each came to his own and they received him not.
Neither allowed difficulty to turn him from his central purpose.
Both prepared for responsibility through self-sacrifice and self-denial.
Both loved little children.
Both befriended the weak.
The common people heard each of them gladly.
Neither condescended, yet both loved all men as children of God.
Both hated the things which enslaved men.
Each had a passion for justice and truth.
Each took the pains of humanity as his own so that he was a "man of sorrows . . . acquainted with grief."
Neither made room for bitterness.
Each of them knew the loneliness of following the course of the heart rather than the dictates of men.
Both marched resolutely toward death for humanity.
Each of them died to set men free.

On Sunday, February 12, there will be a traditional laying of the wreath at the beautiful Lincoln statue at Lincoln Park, in Jersey City. I look forward later to being at the annual dinner at the casino in the park, where Albert Angrisani, former Assistant Secretary of Labor, to Bayonne's own U.S. Secretary of Labor Raymond J. Donovan, will be the guest speaker.

Ceremonies at the dinner will include the installation of retired Superior Court Judge Henry B. McFarland as the 1984-85 president of the Jersey City Lincoln Association.

During the ceremonies it will be my distinct pleasure to present a bust of Abraham Lincoln to the 1983-84 outgoing president, my dear friend, Judge J. Leonard Hornstein, of the Superior Court of New Jersey. I am pleased to continue this tradition, which I commenced in 1982 when I presented the first bust to outgoing president, Joan Quigley, vice president of St. Francis Hospital, and last year to Mark Sullivan, Jr., attorney at law, who served last year.

Officers and trustees to be installed at the association's 119th annual dinner on February 12 will be Dorothy McGrath, first vice president, Dr. Reginald Farrar, second vice president; Edwin Bogart, third vice president, Lorraine O. Smith, secretary, Nicholas Boshko, treasurer, and J. Owen Grundy, historian.

Trustees are John J. Quigley, Jr., Peter T. D. Murphy, the Reverend Edward Glynn, S.J., Gustav Onorato, Mrs. J. Randolph Jones, Kevin Ward, and Edward J. Davin. I am pleased that Assemblyman Paul Cuprowski has introduced a resolution in the New Jersey Assembly commemorating this 175th anniversary, and praising the association.

Lincoln's life indeed echoes the words of the late Robert F. Kennedy who said:

But I know of no American who would not rather be a servant in the imperfect house of freedom, than be a master of all the empires of tyranny.

I feel certain that Martin Luther King, Jr., as he expressed in his famous message, had Abraham Lincoln in mind when he said:

It is no longer a choice between violence and non-violence in this world, it is nonviolence or nonexistence. * * * I have a dream that one day every valley should be exalted, every hill and mountain shall be made low, the rough places will be made plains, and the crooked places will be made straight * * * and all flesh shall see it together.

Both these men have been to the "mountain top" working for peace, love, and the brotherhood of mankind. We hope that all persons of good will will continue this dedication.●

A FUNNY THING HAPPENED ON THE WAY TO THE FINANCIAL FORUM

HON. RICHARD C. SHELBY

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 8, 1984

● Mr. SHELBY. Mr. Speaker, too often, it seems, the Members and staffs who roam these hallowed halls of the Hill become divorced from reality—the reality of everyday life from which most of us are comfortably insulated. The debate surrounding the breakup of AT&T provides a case in point. By day, Members engaged in pedantic pugilism, hurling modern day regulatory spears of access charges and ENFIA rates at their committee counterparts. By night, however, one could always look forward to an effortless affair with a WATTS line, free from any time constraint or service hassle that plague most mere mortals. After all, AT&T would never dare allow telephone service to degenerate within 500 yards of the Capitol steps.

The drama of divestiture is far from over. In fact, as Ann B. Diamond of the New York investment firm of Seiden & de Cuevas, has eloquently shown in the following article, it is still far from apparent as to who the villains and heroes are in this ultimate of financial melodramas.

DIAL M FOR MURK

(By Ann B. Diamond)

A funny thing happened on the way to the A.T.&T. divestiture. Everyone forgot to service the customer. A lot of material has been published on the divestiture, but none of it explained how frustrating it would be to get your telephone fixed.

I thought I had it figured out. I would buy my phone from American Bell, the part of A.T.&T. that sells and repairs equipment. That way, if anything went wrong, A.T.&T. would feel some loyalty and help me. Wrong. There is no such thing as loyalty in the telephone business now. This is what happened when I reported a dead telephone to American Telephone and Telegraph Company:

A.T.&T. "What exactly is the problem?"

Me. "I don't know. The telephone doesn't work."

A.T.&T. "Is the problem with the equipment or the line?"

Me. "How should I know?"

A.T.&T. "If your problem is with the line, New York Telephone will have to service you. If it is the equipment, American Bell is responsible."

Me. "I am not an engineer. All I know is that I can't make a call."

A.T.&T. "I'll have someone from New York Telephone come to see you. I'm not supposed to do this, but I will make an exception and help you out."

Me. "Oh, thank you."

After three days, there is a visit from a New York Telephone repairman.

New York Telephone. "What seems to be the problem?"

Me. "My phone doesn't work."

New York Telephone. "I checked your line and it works fine. There is a problem with your equipment. I shouldn't do this, but I will call American Bell for you and ask them to visit."

Me. "Oh, thank you."

Another three days pass, and then a visit from an American Bell person.

American Bell. "What is the problem?"

Me. "My phone doesn't work."

American Bell. "Your equipment is fine. There seems to be trouble on the line. We will have to contact New York Telephone to see who is responsible. I shouldn't do this, but I will call them to set up a visit."

At this point, I begin to catch on to the hidden meaning of divestiture—to provide an excuse for telephone repairmen to tell customers someone else is responsible for the repair.

When people ask what this divestiture business means, I know just what to tell them: an endless circle of disservice to the customer. Sure makes you want to reach out, reach out and punch someone.●

A TRIBUTE TO THOMAS W. ZITO

HON. FRANK J. GUARINI

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 8, 1984

● Mr. GUARINI. Mr. Speaker, a good and faithful public servant from the city of Bayonne is retiring, leaving an illustrious career with countless accomplishments affecting the good and welfare of tens of thousands of individuals. His hometown community is joining in a well-deserved salute to be held at the High Hat Restaurant in Bayonne.

On Saturday, February 18, 1984, Thomas W. Zito will be honored by the United Service Organization, in cooperation with other community service organizations, for 42 years of public service to his community. Mr. Zito retired as director of the Bayonne Housing Authority on November 30, 1983.

Representation at the retirement dinner will be from the following organizations: Boy Scouts; Catholic Committee on Scouting; NCCJ; NAACP; United Way of Hudson County; American Red Cross; USO Motby; Bayonne Housing Authority; South Shore Village not for Profit Corp.; South Shore Village Leased Housing Corp.; New Jersey Association of Housing Authorities; National Association of Housing Officials; National Housing Conference; Tiro A. Segno of New York, Inc. (N.Y. Rifle Club); National Leased Housing Association; St. Peter's Prep; and the Unity Council.

Tom Zito comes from a family with roots long established in Bayonne. His grandfather, Anthony Carlo, migrated to Bayonne from Sasson in Italy in 1886. His mother, Anna, was born in Bayonne in 1898. His father, Peter, came to Bayonne from Petina, Italy, in 1902.

Tom Zito attended local public schools and graduated from Bayonne High School in June 1930. After graduation, he worked during the day and attended New York University where he earned the bachelor of arts and masters degree in economics.

In 1940, he married Rose Scarito; they have three children and one grandchild.

In 1942, Mr. Zito was employed as an economics instructor at the John Marshall School of Law in Jersey City. He became assistant to the dean in charge of the college division where he was instrumental in raising the college program from a 2-year course of study to degree-granting status.

In 1950, Tom Zito was delegated by the board of directors of John Marshall School of Law to represent the interest of the school before the section of legal education of the American Bar Association. After 3 days of testimony, Mr. Zito's presentation resulted in the gift of the charter of the John Marshall Law School to the Seton Hall University. The law school was then accredited by the American Bar Association.

Mr. Zito served as the first admissions officer of the law school of Seton Hall University.

On March 15, 1951, Tom Zito was appointed executive director of the Housing Authority of the city of Bayonne. At the time, the authority was newly organized with no staff and no resources. Today, the authority is responsible for 2,000 units of federally assisted housing, a completed urban renewal program, which revitalized the economic life of the central core of the city of Bayonne, and 65 employees. In connection with the urban renewal program and with the backing and support of the former mayor, Francis Fitzpatrick, and city of Bayonne received the first letter of credit from the Urban Renewal Administration for the $1 million credit toward the cost of a new city hall.

In 1960, the State of New Jersey mandated that all veterans' projects in the State be sold. Mr. Zito organized the support of the political and corporate leaders in the city of Bayonne and arranged for the purchase of the 260-unit garden apartment through the sale of renewal bonds to Allstate Insurance Co. Today, this apartment complex has the lowest rent in the city without the benefit of any Federal subsidies.

During the Nixon years, no direct Federal funds were available as outright grants for construction funds for housing for low-income families. Mr. Zito recommended to all New Jersey public housing authorities that they create nonprofit corporations to comply with the provisions of the housing laws making funds available for the private sector.

In this manner, a nonprofit corporation, South Shore Village II, was formed as an instrumentality of the authority to construct and purchase housing units for occupancy by low-income families. As a result of this endeavor, our 600 units of housing became a reality.

The format of the organization of tenants into a unity council was devised by Mr. Zito. Each apartment complex elected a president, and all the presidents collectively were organized as the unity council. The council has a staff of five paid employees whose function is to assist the tenants in all aspects of their social and cultural well-being. This uniqueness of the unity council is that although the staff is employed by the authority, their basic obligation is to the needs of all tenants. Mr. Zito always maintained that the unity council should operate independently—free from political interference.

In other community endeavors, Mr. Zito was appointed a trustee of the board of education because of his educational background as a teacher and administrator.

In 1956, Esso, the largest single taxpayer, requested that the city of Bayonne and the board of education reduce expenditures 10 percent so that taxes could be reduced in 1956 and to hold the line in 1957, with no increases in taxes or expenditures. Under Mr. Zito's leadership as president of the board of education, the economies were achieved. Esso officials showed their appreciation by providing a lake for Scouters at Camp Lewis and the engineering data and plans to construct a bridge between the high school and technical school. This bridge made it possible to achieve economies from the common use of the auditorium for study classes instead of individual homeroom classes.

From 1953 to 1976, Mr. Zito taught economics at Rutgers University as an adjunct instructor. During this period, the Dumbarton Oaks Agreement resulted in the free float of gold which, prior to the agreement, was pegged at $32 per ounce. Mr. Zito accurately predicted and recommended to his students that gold shares be purchased as a hedge against the inflation which was to follow. Many of his students benefited from the increase in value of gold shares.

In addition to his duties as an academician and as executive director of the authority, Mr. Zito devoted time to community endeavors. He served the Boy Scouts, the United Way, the Selective Service System, the National Conference of Christians and Jews, the USO, the NAACP, and National and State housing organizations.

For the Boy Scouts, he was instrumental, as president, in the development of a lake at Camp Lewis; for the Catholic Committee on Scouting, as chairman, he supported the annual nuns' day at Camp Lewis; for the United Way, as president, he was a factor in the first million-dollar campaign; for the NCCJ, he served as chairman of the brotherhood annual award dinner; for the NAACP, he spearheaded the program of homeownership housing for minorities; for national housing groups he served as an officer and board member.

It is no surprise, therefore, that for his endeavors on behalf of others, Tom Zito was honored by the Boy Scouts with the Silver Beaver; the Catholic Committee on Scouting with the Pelican and St. George Award; the NAACP with the Man of the Year Award; the NAACP as the Catholic honoree; the Catholic War Veterans as the recipient of the God and Country Award, and by the New Jersey Association of Housing Officials as the Second Achievement Awardee.

One significant phase of his housing experience was being selected by the Agency for International Development to visit Costa Rica and report to the agency on the progress of American housing aid. Another major achievement was the development and approval by HUD of an authority operation which resulted in setting up a reserve to support the obligations of a not-for-profit corporation.

Tom Zito has provided the inspiration and perspiration to get the job done. He believes that with every problem there is an opportunity to win the grace of strength and progress, and believes that a person's life work must not only be simply good, it must be good for something.

Taking part in the program are the following, which indicates the communitywide love and admiration for Tom's work: Mayor Dennis Collins, honorary chairman; Councilman Neil De Sena, Michael Sheehan, cochairman; Assemblyman Joseph Doria, who will be joined by Anthony Cortalessa; and James T. O'Halloran, the guest speaker, according to Dominick Cione, chairman of the event.

I am certain that my colleagues here in the House of Representatives wish to join me in this salute to Thomas Zito, for indeed he has made our great Nation even greater.●

UKRAINIAN NATIONAL ASSOCIATION CELEBRATES 90TH ANNIVERSARY

HON. WILLIAM O. LIPINSKI

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 8, 1984

● Mr. LIPINSKI. Mr. Speaker, on February 22, 1984, the Ukrainian National Association celebrates the 90th anniversary of its founding. The UNA is the oldest and largest Ukrainian organization in America, and has provided valuable leadership and services to the Ukrainian community.

Since its founding by Ukrainian immigrants on February 22, 1894, the Ukrainian National Association has helped Ukrainians succeed in the New World while maintaining contact with their cultural heritage. UNA members established cultural, religious, patriotic, and social activities to foster a sense of community in their neighborhoods. The UNA fraternal and insurance benefit functions provided recent immigrants with important financial assistance.

There are over 80,000 UNA members in 450 local branches located across the United States and Canada. The members meet regularly to discuss organization and community issues, plan religious and patriotic ceremonies, and organize social and athletic events. In addition, many branches participate in community fund drives, parent-teacher associations, and other civic activities.

The local branches of the UNA continue to provide financial assistance to Ukrainians across the country. Annual scholarships to needy students, low-interest loans and an emergency fund for victims of natural disasters are just a few of the many services provided by the Ukrainian National Association.

The UNA publishes newspapers and periodicals, both in English and in Ukrainian, that keep readers informed of the progress of the UNA and link Ukrainians around the world.

The Ukrainian National Association is a shining example of the initiative taken by immigrants to this country. We can all be proud that this organization, set up nearly a century ago by newcomers in a strange land, continues to serve its people. The guidance, leadership, and solidarity provided by the UNA still enrich the lives of thousands of Ukrainian-Americans. I congratulate the Ukrainian National Association on its 90th anniversary, and I wish the UNA and its members many more years of success in serving the Ukrainian-American community.●

BEAGLE CHANNEL

HON. ROBERT J. LAGOMARSINO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 8, 1984

● Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, it is welcome news to read that the Foreign Ministers of Argentina and Chile have signed a Declaration of Peace and Friendship and have pledged to settle the dispute over the Beagle Channel.

As you will recall, those two nations almost went to war in 1978, with each claiming territorial jurisdiction over the waterway at the southern tip of South America.

Special recognition should be given to Pope John Paul II who engaged in a 5-year mediation effort trying to find a formula that would resolve the conflicting claims.

Although there have been no details released yet on the exact terms for the settlement of the dispute, apparently both nations will be working together to draw up the final treaty.

I am pleased that the Governments of Argentina and Chile have acted in a responsible, constructive manner to resolve a conflict that for so long served to block cooperative relations between the two.●

THE 1984 CONGRESSIONAL CALL TO CONSCIENCE VIGIL

HON. JOHN EDWARD PORTER

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 8, 1984

● Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, as a participant in the 1984 Congressional Call to Conscience Vigil for Soviet Jews, I would like to call my colleagues' attention to the plight of the Tarnopolsky family of Kharkov.

The Tarnopolsky family, Yuri, Olga, and their 12-year-old daughter Irina, originally applied to emigrate to Israel in June 1979. They have been refused permission for an exit visa several times and have been subject to great hardship and harassment. Yuri, an organic chemist, lost his professional standing in the scientific community and last March Yuri was arrested and charged with anti-Soviet slander.

Following the arrest of her father, young Irina corresponded with Yuri Andropov, General Secretary CPSU, requesting justice for her father. She wrote,

My father, Yuri Tarnopolsky is in prison now. He is accused of slandering the Soviet system and soon will be tried. But my Papa is an honest man. He has never lied. He is under arrest only because we are Jewish and want to leave for Israel . . . Already four years we have waited for permission to leave. Now Papa is arrested and we don't know what will happen to us. I beg you to release my Papa and let us leave for Israel.

Despite this urgent plea, Mr. Tarnopolsky was tried, without legal representation and sentenced to 3 years of imprisonment in a Siberian labor camp.

In November, Olga embarked on a 6-day journey to visit her husband. Prior to her trip, she was informed by prison authorities that she would be allowed to visit her husband three times a year and bring him one small package, weighing 1 kilogram, during each visit. Olga packed up a small amount of warm clothing for her husband and traveled over 3,500 miles by train from Kharkov to Chita. At the end of her difficult journey, she was told by prison authorities that she would not be allowed to see her husband. Although at first the prison authorities refused to tell her why she had been denied permission to visit Yuri, she was finally told that her husband had broken a prison rule by placing his small notebook on his pillow instead of keeping it on his nightstand. And as a result of this small infraction, Olga's long trip was for naught.

I am sure that my colleagues can sympathize with the Tarnopolsky family and the persecution they have been forced to suffer. It is an outrage that this innocent family, who simply desire to practice their religion and live in Israel, have become victims of the tyranny of Soviet authorities. Unfortunately, the Tarnopolsky family is only one of thousands who are denied permission to emigrate, are not allowed to practice their religion and are subject to great harassment. During 1983 Soviet emigration reached an all-time low of 1,314 and the prospects for 1984 are not much better.

We must not forget the plight of the Tarnopolsky family and the injustice suffered by other Soviet refuseniks. Their situation emphasizes the need for congressional activity, such as the Congressional Human Rights Caucus and the International Parliamentary Group for Human Rights in the Soviet Union, to focus attention on the abuses practiced by the Soviet Government. We must do all that we can to help Irina Tarnopolsky realize her dream of living in Israel and practicing her religion. There is no more vital task than to help innocent victims whose only crime is their desire for human liberty.●

UNEMPLOYMENT REDUCTION AND RETRAINING ACT

HON. HANK BROWN

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 8, 1984

● Mr. BROWN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, today, I am introducing the Unemployment Reduction and Retraining Act, which proposes a jobs tax credit for those who hire the long-term unemployed.

Although the United States has made great strides in recovering from the 1981–82 recession, we are not out of the woods with respect to unemployment. We still have 8 percent of our labor force out of work. What is needed is an incentive for the private sector to increase the size of its work force.

This bill is directed at small businesses, which account for about one-half of the Nation's total employment. It limits the tax credit to a maximum of $100,000 per taxable year and to the unemployment insurance wages paid on a qualified employee during the first year of employment.

Qualified workers are defined in the bill as employees who have been involuntarily unemployed and were eligible to receive or received unemployment compensation during the 12 consecutive weeks immediately preceding their hiring.

The tax credit is refundable, allowing an employer to take immediate advantage of its benefits, even if he doesn't have any tax liability for the current year. For new employers, especially, this can help in meeting cash flow problems and may be the deciding factor in hiring additional employees.

Currently, the Tax Code provides a jobs tax credit for a targeted group of workers. This group includes handicapped people undergoing vocational rehabilitation and economically disadvantaged Vietnam-era veterans.

My proposal is written to coexist with the targeted jobs tax credit program. An employer could choose to file for a credit under either provision, if he meets the qualifying criteria. However, he would not be eligible for both credits on the same employee in the same year.

I believe we need to encourage continued investment and job creation in the United States, and the jobs tax credit is one means of doing just that. I urge my colleagues to join me in this initiative. Please contact my office if you would like to cosponsor this jobs proposal.●

HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT

HON. RICHARD T. SCHULZE

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 31, 1984

● Mr. SCHULZE. Mr. Speaker, the State of Pennsylvania has long had a tradition of sending to Washington men who have made significant and lasting contributions to our Nation. Since the earliest days of our Republic, Pennsylvanians have served this country in great and various ways. Often these individuals have possessed talents in numerous fields, and became known not only as national, but world leaders. Ben Franklin and Gen. George C. Marshall are representative of such men.

Jimmie Van Zandt follows in this line of distinguished Pennsylvanians. Never content to be accomplished in only one area, Jimmie served where the need was greatest. Hailing from the town of Altoona in the center of the Keystone State, and the hub of the railroad industry, Jimmie began the first of his several careers with the railroad. After serving 20 years in that capacity, Jimmie Van Zandt won a seat in the U.S. Congress. In 1943, deciding that he could better serve his country in the war against the Axis powers, he enlisted in the Navy. As with all things he has done, he excelled in this role, rising to the rank of captain by 1946.

Returning to the House of Representatives after this period of naval service, he served on the Armed Services Committee, and as the ranking member of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy.

For the past 20 years Jimmie has served selflessly as the secretary of the Pennsylvania congressional delegation. He has done so in the best bipartisan spirit, serving with equal enthusiasm both Republican and Democratic members. His wealth of experience about the ways and means of Congress and Washington, coupled with his intimate knowledge of Pennsylvania's resources and needs, have enabled him to serve in this capacity as no one else possibly could. His past accomplishments never prevented him from attending to whatever details were necessary to attain results that were in the best interest of his home State and the country.

Among the many citations that he has received are those from veterans organizations, including the Veterans of Foreign Wars Distinguished Service Medal. Fittingly, the James E. Van Zandt Veterans' Administration Center will be dedicated later this year in Jimmie's hometown of Altoona. This is truly a worthy tribute to him.

While the delegation will surely miss the benefit of Jimmie's experience, as well as his commitment to service, the spirit of his example as a public servant will remain. We understand that there is more still that Jimmie wishes to do, including the writing of his memoirs. So I will simply say thank you, Jimmie, and join with my colleagues in wishing you well.●

HON. BOB McEWEN

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 8, 1984

● Mr. McEWEN. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to introduce the Steel Modernization Act of 1984—legislation to provide investment tax credits for the modernization of America's steel industry.

Mr. Speaker, this bill is not a bailout of a dying industry, because the industry is not dying. We see evidence of the vitality of the steel industry as it attempts to meet head on the pressure of foreign competition. Steel companies throughout the country are investing in new technology: Armco, headquartered in my own congressional district, is installing state-of-the-art continuous casters at some of its plants. Bethlehem Steel has committed a half-billion dollars for continuous casters just now coming on line. And the list goes on.

Yet, because of the poor performance of the industry in the last 2 years, it is hard pressed to generate internal funds for investment and to present a favorable outlook to the financial community. Thus, its ambitious plans to invest over $5 billion in 1981 had to be scaled back by more than half.

This means that foreign steel producers who have modernized sooner will continue to stay ahead of us. In Europe and Japan, the cost of capital embodied in 1 ton of steel is 25 percent less than in the United States. And the result is that their steel industries, and those in countries like Brazil and Korea, produce more steel, about twice as much as we do, using continuous casters and other new technologies.

This bill provides only an incentive to our steel industry to modernize, so that it can achieve a truly competitive place in the world steel market. It does not take over the industry. The choice to modernize is theirs.

But, the incentives provided in this bill mean that the industry can present to investors a more favorable financial plan, which means lower costs of capital, and ultimately lower costs of producing steel. It enhances security for the jobs of nearly 300,000 workers employed in the industry itself, and of another 800,000 or so people in industries dependent on steel. It benefits the whole country, because steel is a national industry, as shown in a recent report of the Congressional Research Service. It is, Mr. Speaker, an opportunity for Government to give steel and those who derive their livelihoods from it a new beginning in the international marketplace.●

CERTIFICATION OF HUMAN RIGHTS PROGRESS IN EL SALVADOR

HON. BOB EDGAR

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 8, 1984

● Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Speaker, I want to commend the House for its action yesterday in again passing legislation to require the President to certify progress on ending human rights violations in El Salvador as a condition to continued military aid to that troubled country.

As an original sponsor of this measure, it has always been my chief concern that the United States has a moral and practical responsibility to refuse to condone repression and official terrorism. The evidence which I have gathered shows that the Government of El Salvador has not exercised adequate control over the Salvadoran military and the so-called death squads with regard to violations of fundamental human rights. Tens of thousands of Savladoran civilians and a number of American citizens have been victims of political violence, while the Salvadoran authorities continue to refuse to curb the institutions and individuals which clearly are responsible for the terror.

I should emphasize that the need for the House to act on this legislation was created by President Reagan when he pocket vetoed identical certification legislation at the end of 1983. I have joined several other Members of Congress in a lawsuit challenging the validity of the use of the pocket veto in this case. I viewed the President's veto of certification as a signal that with the President's blessing, recommended that military aid to El Salvador be conditioned on human rights progress and that such conditions be formally codified in law.

The simple fact is that there will never be any progress toward long-term stability in El Salvador until both official terrorism and civil war can be wound down. The Kissinger Commission's recommendations for vastly increased military and economic aid to El Salvador and other Central American countries can serve no purpose unless political and social stability can form the foundation for a worthwhile investment of this type. The administration has yet to propose a viable policy for winding down the violence, and in fact has created an atmosphere in which it appears that the United States is not essentially concerned with continued, widespread, politically motivated violence.

One major flaw of the Kissinger Commission report, which is now being touted as a blueprint for U.S. policy in Central America, is that it fails to consider new, creative approaches to diplomacy and negotiation which might help defuse the escalating cycle of violence which now traps El Salvador and its people. My own view, after visting Central America and studying this situation, is that the role of the Catholic Church and clergy could be a key to the search for peace and negotiation. For example, the conservative and liberal clergy within Central America could mitigate the conflict by using social and moral influence with leftist and rightist political factions. An American policy firmly and visibly identified with the quest for a peaceful settlement could foster the types of needed negotiations between the various factions in El Salvador. I believe that there are institutions and groups within Central America committed to ending the violence, but that these parties are not receiving adequate support from our Government officials and diplomats.

Within this year it is my hope to again visit Central America, as I did in 1981, in order to seek out ways that American policy could be used constructively for peace in the region. As one who views the crisis in Central America as a continuing threat to peace and stability in our hemisphere, and as one who has serious disagreements with current American policy toward the region, I feel a responsibility to use my own position to advance the search for peace.

The conditioning of military aid on human rights progress is a step in the direction of a peaceful and constructive solution, but we must continue the journey toward a long-term solution to a crisis which could drain our moral credibility and damage U.S. interests on the international scene for years to come.●

WORLD MARRIAGE DAY 1984

HON. ROBERT A. BORSKI

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 8, 1984

● Mr. BORSKI. Mr. Speaker, I rise to call the attention of my colleagues to the celebration of World Marriage Day, honoring the institution of marriage as the basic unit of our society.

World Marriage Day is sponsored by Worldwide Marriage Encounter, an organization primarily devoted to helping couples improve their lives together. Founded in 1962, Marriage Encounter currently has a membership of 250,000, with chapters in 57 countries. Their long-held ideal has been to provide programs that foster communication between individuals, in turn enabling people to better experience the sacrament of marriage.

Many believe the value of the family has diminished in the present era of rapid sociological and technological change. We must not let this happen. A healthy marriage, with its sacrifices and joys, contributes to the development of trust and communication between individuals, and thus to the personal growth of our people.

The observance of World Marriage Day can remind us of the important influence marriage can and should have on our society.

I call on my colleagues to consider the message of World Marriage Day and the fine work of Worldwide Marriage Encounter.●

TRIBUTE TO LOUIS SMITH, FORMER DIRECTOR OF THE JEWISH COMMUNITY CENTER

HON. FRANK HARRISON

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 8, 1984

● Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, my native Wyoming Valley and the Jewish community in particular, suffered a grievous loss with the death of Louis Smith, the former executive director of the Jewish Community Center, who passed away this past Sunday in Lauderhill, Fla., after an illness.

Born in Lithuania, the son of the late Jenny and Elick Smith, Lou was brought to Pennsylvania at the age of 3. He was raised in Pittston and graduated with the class of 1918. After further training in engineering, he began a long and exemplary career.

Lou organized Camp Ahmy, and for 2 years was the YMCA's athletic director. At the same time, he was a professional basketball player with the Celtics.

From 1925–76 Lou Smith performed the real work of his life as executive director of the Jewish Community Center. For 31 of those years, he was, as well, the executive director of the Wyoming Valley Jewish Committee, which is responsible for the annual United Jewish Appeal campaign.

It would take far too long, Mr. Speaker, to catalog here the many awards and tributes which Lou Smith received in his life. It should be sufficient to note that the State of Israel bonds board of governors saluted him for his many years of service to the support of the States of Israel and Israel bonds. From the Council of Jewish Federations, he received an award for his outstanding community leadership spanning more than half a century at the Jewish Community Center of Wyoming Valley. And, I am certain, dear to his heart, Lou received, in 1973, the community service award of the Seligman J. Strauss Lodge 139 of B'nai B'rith. That coveted award is given each year to a community leader, who by his example and his efforts, has done most to promote the cause of brotherhood and make a better community for all of us to share.

Particular note must be made, also, of Lou's outstanding efforts following the 1972 Agnes flood. He brought the entire Jewish Community Center together in one effort to overcome the trauma of the loss and to rebuild that which had been destroyed. At the same time, he worked tirelessly with the United Way of Wyoming Valley and its various member agencies to bring relief beyond his own community to all the tens of thousands who were afflicted by the Agnes disaster.

Over the years, Mr. Smith was a member of the general board of directors of the Ecumenical Council of Wyoming Valley and of the board of trustees of the Luzerne County Community College. He was a devoted and very active member of Temple Israel.

Beyond the titles and the awards and, yes, even beyond his daily work, most of all we remember Lou Smith as a gentle, caring, dedicated human being. He could not see human suffering without wanting to do something about it. He could not see ignorance without wanting to enlighten it. He could not see hatred without wanting to end it. He was one of those rare people whose counsel and guidance were sought by men and women of all creeds and ethnic backgrounds, of all professions and stations in life. He was a friend to the Wyoming Valley and all of its people.

In the last years of his life, Lou and his beloved wife, Julia, retired to Florida and there in the sunshine, he had the opportunity to reminisce, relax and simply to enjoy his family and many friends. On occasion, he came back to Wilkes-Barre and visited with us and we always welcomed his return and were sorry to see him go. In a far more profound sense, Mr. Speaker, we are sorry that he has left us this final time.

I rise, Mr. Speaker, to extend my deep sorrow to Julia Lieberman Smith, and to Lou's son, Robert, as well as his grandchildren, his sisters, Dorothy Kaplan and Rose Levin, and his brother, Ben Smith. To them I can offer only the solace that, in the words of his own people, "his memory shall be a blessing" to us all.●

BELL LIBRARY COMMEMORATED

HON. MATTHEW G. MARTINEZ

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 8, 1984

● Mr. MARTINEZ. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take a few moments today to recognize and commend the Bell Library in Bell, Calif. The Bell Library was established in 1913 and was the 29th branch library in the Los Angeles County system. This year marks the 70th anniversary of the Bell Library and it is with great pride that I have the opportunity to recognize the library's many achievements on the floor of the U.S. House of Representatives.

Throughout the 70 years of service, Bell Library has diligently served and accommodated the community. It has provided residents with information and materials offering a wealth of knowledge, skills, and culture. Oftentimes, we tend to take libraries for granted and overlook the many services provided free of charge. The Bell Library was begun in 1913 in a small classroom with a handful of books. Today, it has grown to contain over 21,000 volumes and is housed in its own building. With much personal satisfaction, I commend the Bell Library and its many dedicated employees for the exemplary service to our community.●

FINDING THE COURAGE TO CUT

HON. RON PAUL

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 8, 1984

● Mr. PAUL. Mr. Speaker, in case you or any of my colleagues missed it, former Secretary of the Treasury, William E. Simon, offered some noteworthy observations about Congress and the budget in a recent Wall Street Journal article. Without arguing about the merits of Mr. Simon's tongue-lashing, I confess I have always found it remarkable that even though we already confiscate more than one-third of personal income it does not satiate our appetites for spending money. We borrow literally trillions of dollars from our children and grandchildren.

I suggest that my colleagues consider the simple test that has guided me during my few years in this body. It comes from the noted French legislator and author of a century ago:

See if the law takes from some persons what belongs to them, and gives it to other persons to whom it does not belong. See if the law benefits one citizen at the expense of another by doing what the citizen himself cannot do without commiting a crime. Then abolish this law without delay, for it is not only evil itself, but also it is a fertile source for further evils. . . .

I hope my colleagues will reflect on Mr. Simon's comments and find the courage to begin the painful, yet necessary, task of reducing the tremendous burden of government.

THE POLITICAL COWARDICE OF CONGRESS COURTS REVOLUTION

(By William E. Simon)

I recall an old Grade Z movie in which someone is poking about in the ruins of a burned mill. Lo and behold, he unearths the body of a large humanoid monster beneath the blackened rubble. It is the monster created by the misguided Dr. Frankenstein, and apparently it was not destroyed when the mill burned down in the previous movie.

The rest of the plot is easily imagined. The monster is reanimated. It gets loose and crashes about the landscape, terrorizing the simple burghers. Finally a posse of citizens, with torches and muskets, traps the monster and destroys it. Or so we are given to believe. You can bet that another curious adventurer, years later, will stumble across the remarkably preserved corpse of the monster in the cave in which it was thought to have perished. Then yet another Grade Z plot will unfold, something like "Return of the Son of Frankenstein."

What brings all this to mind was the return of Congress to the scene of its relentless destruction of tomorrow's prosperity, a destruction interrupted only by occasional recesses in which the perpetrators return home either to lie about their exploits or to blame the coming calamities on someone else.

The damage wrought by this hydraheaded aggregation of pusillanimity, irresponsibility, venality and ignorance staggers the imagination. Congress has utterly defeated the president's efforts to put the brakes on federal spending, defeated them so conclusively that no less a person than David Stockman, director of the Office of Management and Budget, now admits that anyone hoping for any additional budget cuts is a "dreamer."

Less than two years ago, Congress promised the president that it would produce or allow budget cuts three times the size of proposed tax increases. So the president put his name to a five-year, $228 billion tax bill. That was supposed to reduce the fiscal 1983 deficit to $115 billion. Well, what happened? Federal revenues dipped in the face of the higher taxes, Congress welshed on its part of the deal and the fiscal 1983 deficit turned out to be $195 billion. And now we are being told to expect deficits of that magnitude indefinitely into the future, as if the American economy can sustain such a spending spree without collapse or revolution.

Last month the Grace Commission announced its findings on improving government management. It is a magnificent document chock-full of plans for saving the taxpayers billions of dollars every year. But turn to the section called "Cost of Congressional Encroachment" and see what the Gang of 535 is doing to keep spending up.

Close useless military bases? Congress says no. Stop subsidies to military commissaries surrounded by competing private supermarkets? Congress says no. Let the veterans administrator try to make sense of that sprawling and inefficient empire? Congress says no. Pay government printers no more than the private sector counterparts? Congress says no. Let construction wages reflect supply and demand? No way, say the wonderful folks in Congress.

No wonder Mr. Grace says, "Government spending is getting so bad that things are gonna happen that never happened before. I can't tell you when, but it's gonna happen. At some point the taxpayers are gonna say NO!"

Listen to what some of the more candid members of Congress say about their own performances. Take Rep. Dan Rostenkowski (D., Ill.): "We have put special interests on notice that we can be pushed around. We have confessed to an already doubting nation that we are ruled by political fear, rather than economic courage." He ought to know. He's chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee.

Or listen to Rep. James Jones (D., Okla.): "The leadership, starting with the president, avoided all the tough problems and basically took the political safe approach." Rep. Jones is chairman of the House Budget Committee.

Lest anyone think I am citing only Democrats, here's an offering from Sen. Rudy Boschwitz (R., Minn.). Why won't Congress get serious about the deficit? a constituent asks him on the campaign trail. Sen. Boschwitz draws a deep breath. "Lack of political courage," he candidly replies. Shortly thereafter, we see the good senator claiming credit for the costly Payment-in-Kind program for subsidizing feed grains, the new dairy bill that pays farmers not to milk their cows, and retention of special tax benefits for moderate income housing. Sen. Boschwitz is a member of the Senate Budget Committee.

Not long ago, I was invited once again to testify before a congressional committee on "the problem of the deficit." Now I ask you: Do the hypocritical, pandering, gutless wonders in Congress intend to do anything after taking more testimony, from me or anybody else? Of course not. This is yet another absurd ritual to give the illusion of motion, while Congress goes right on squandering the national substance, inviting resurgent inflation, ducking the tough questions, receiving awards from every special-interest group that ever wheedled a subsidy or tax break in return for a campaign contribution, and, of course, railing about "the problem of the deficit" at every campaign stop from East Overshoe to Hog Haven.

As one editorial writer recently put it, "How can Congress show its face in Washington again? One would need the vocabulary of Shakespeare to adequately describe this craven, abject, lily-livered body of lap dogs, these lickspittles, these toadies, these footmen." In my opinion, he lets 'em off easy. It's time for the American people to crucify these no-count, posturing, blood-sucking, thimble-witted hypocritical Kallikaks. Anything less is far too good for them.●

HON. JOHN N. ERLENBORN

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 8, 1984

● Mr. ERLENBORN. Mr. Speaker, today, along with several of my colleagues, I am introducing the administration's bill to consolidate and simplify the existing Federal vocational education program. While modeled on last year's bill (H.R. 2940) which I introduced, this bill has a number of major changes:

The Adult Education Act is not included in this legislative proposal;

The provisions for a set-aside of funds for the handicapped and disadvantaged is applied to the entire State grant program;

A hold-harmless provision—with a 3-year phaseout—for the small State minimum is added to the State allocation formula;

The authorization figure for fiscal year 1985 is set at the current spending level and at "such sums" for fiscal years 1986 through 1989. Last year's bill contained only a "such sums" figure while the administration's budget request for vocational and adult education combined was $500 million—compared to this year's figure of $838 million.

As our colleagues know, the current vocational education law and regulations have been characterized as extremely complicated, intrusive, and burdensome to many State and local officials. The bill I am introducing today would vastly simplify the current law while sharpening the Federal focus on such priorities as economic development and adult retraining. Furthermore, these provisions are in keeping with the needs and trends of the 1980's and are designed, I feel, to complement the bipartisan and administration-supported Job Training Partnership Act.

It is also important to emphasize that under the proposal the Federal effort at targeting funds for the handicapped and disadvantaged would be enhanced. Assuming current funding levels for the Vocational Education Act, Federal support under this bill would increase approximately 8 percent for the handicapped and 2½ percent for the disadvantaged over current spending levels.

I laud the administration for coming forward with such a creative, positive, and serious proposal which would accomplish four major objectives: First, to increase State and local flexibility in using Federal funds to provide educational services; second, to increase cost effectiveness by minimizing administrative burdens at the Federal, State, and local levels; third, to focus Federal vocational education funds on activities that will contribute to economic development; and fourth, to assist the States in insuring handicapped and disadvantaged students equal access to vocational educational programs.

I urge my colleagues to give this legislation careful attention as the Education and Labor Committee begins its deliberations on the reauthorization of the Vocational Education Act.

A section-by-section analysis of the bill follows:

PART A—GENERAL PURPOSES

Section 101 establishes the purpose of the Act as the authorization of State and national programs which will promote economic development by addressing the needs of youth and adults in all communities for vocational education, strenthening State and local systems of vocational education, enhancing equal opportunities in vocational education for all students overcoming sex stereotyping and sex bias in vocational education, addressing the national need of employers for a skilled work force, addressing the training needs of displaced workers, and coordinating with other programs of training and employment. An additional intention is that States participating in programs under the Act be afforded broad discretionary authority in planning, developing, administering, coordinating and operating these programs.

Section 102 authorizes $731,314,000 for this Act for fiscal year 1985 and such sums as are necessary for fiscal years 1986 through 1989. It further provides for expenditure of funds appropriated under the Smith-Hughes Act.

Section 103 authorizes the Secretary to set aside, for National Programs, up to 5 percent of the funds appropriated under the Act.

Section 104 prescribes a method for allotting funds to the States. Funds are to be allotted on the basis of population and number of unemployed persons in three age cohorts and inverse per capita income. Section 104 also provides for a declining minimum States allotment (initially at ninety percent of the fiscal year 1984 level) during fiscal years 1985 through 1987. In fiscal years 1988 and 1989 no State may receive less than $100,000. (If funds are not available to satisfy these requirements, allotments to States will be reduced proportionately.)

Section 105 describes the requirement of a Proposed Use Report that a State must submit to the Secretary in order to participate in programs funded under Part B. The report must designate a single State agency that is responsible for the administration or supervision of the administration of Part B programs. It will describe the goals the State will seek to achieve, the characteristics of the individuals to be served, how the Federal funds will be used, how the funds will be distributed within the State, and the anticipated results. It will further describe how the State will provide vocational education students with students with access to basic skills instruction, how equal opportunity in vocational education will be enhanced for all students, how the State will address sex stereotyping and sex bias in vocational education, and how the State job training coordinating councils and private industry councils or other private sector representatives will be involved in planning and carrying out vocational programs. The report will include assurances regarding proper administration, fiscal control, fund accounting, submission of reports, and the participation of private school students. Finally, the report will contain an assessment of programs and projects supported during the most recently completed program year. Prior to submission, the report will be made public in the State.

Section 106 provides for State audit of activities funded under Part B.

Section 107 requires that the Secretary submit an annual report to Congress on the Status of vocational and adult education in the Nation.

Section 108 establishes a National Advisory Council on Vocational Education, with members appointed by the President.

Section 109 makes certain sections of the General Education Provisions Act applicable to programs conducted under this Act.

PART B—STATE PROGRAMS

Section 120 states that the Secretary shall make grants to the States (in accordance with Section 104) for establishing, expanding, and improving vocational education programs. A State may set aside that portion of the grant required for State administration. Of the remainder, at least 30 percent must be used for programs and projects under Subpart 1 (Economic Development and Skilled Work Force Training), and at least 30 percent for programs and projects under Subpart 2 (Strengthening State and Local Systems of Vocational Education). In addition, States must use at least 10 percent of their total Subpart 1 and Subpart 2 funds to meet the special needs of handicapped persons and at least 20 percent of their total Subpart and Subpart 2 funds to met the special needs of educationally disadvantaged persons. Funds under this part may be used to pay for up to half of the administrative expenses at the local level. Funds also may be used to pay for State or local advisory councils, but not for stipends or construction.

Section 121 provides that States may use funds under this part directly or to make grants or enter into contracts with other eligible recipients for the purpose of carrying out programs and projects under Part B.

Section 122 states the purpose of Subpart 1 as supporting Economic Development and Skilled Work Force Training programs and projects. Training conducted under this Subpart must correspond to specific State or local economic needs or plans.

Section 123 describes the types of activities that may be funded under Subpart 1, including retraining persons whose jobs have been lost or jeopardized by technological or economic change; training for skilled occupations needed to revitalize business and industries that are essential to States or local economic well-being; training for skilled occupations which are needed to attract the entry of new businesses into a State or community; related research, curriculum development, and instructor training; and training in entrepreneurship. Recipients must give careful consideration to the needs of persons who have lost their jobs or whose jobs are jeopardized by technological or economic change.

Section 124 states the purpose of Subpart 2 as supporting programs, projects, services, and activities for strengthening State and local systems of vocational education.

Section 125 describes the types of activities that may be funded under Subpart 2, including joint programs with business, industry, and labor; support services (except for stipends) for homemakers and single heads of households; programs designed to reduce sex stereotyping and sex bias in vocational education; cooperative and work-study programs; programs for persons with limited English proficiency; remedial instruction in basic skills; acquisition or replacement of equipment; consumer and homemaking education; and student organizations.

PART C—NATIONAL PROGRAMS

Section 130 requires the Secretary to use funds reserved under Section 103(a) to support any or all activities authorized by sections 131, 132, 133, and 134.

Section 131 authorizes the Secretary to conduct research, develop programs, collect and disseminate information, and develop State and local leadership in vocational education. The Secretary is also authorized to support a National Center for Research in Vocational Education.

Section 132 authorizes the Secretary to make contracts, grants and cooperative agreements with Indian tribes and organizations for vocational education programs and projects consistent with tribal economic development plans.

Section 133 authorizes support of the National Occupational Information Coordinating Committee established under the Job Training Partnership Act.

Section 134 authorizes activities of Program Inprovement for Meeting National Skilled Work Force Needs. These may include exemplary job training programs for persons who have lost their jobs or whose jobs are jeopardized by technological or economic change; demonstration programs designed to reduce sex stereotyping and sex bias in vocational education; model or demonstration training programs; collaborative programs, including employment and training programs, with business, industry, and labor and with other agencies of the Federal government; programs designed to expand the use of volunteers in providing vocational education; activities in the areas of rural vocational education and rural family education; and special training programs and projects designed to address critical shortages of skilled workers which the Nation requires.

PART D—DEFINITIONS

Section 140 provides definitions for a number of terms used in the Act.

PART E—CONFORMING AMENDMENTS; REPEALS; EFFECTIVE DATE

Section 150 would make a number of conforming amendments to the Job Training Partnership Act and other Acts.

Section 151 repeals the Vocational Education Act. The effective date of this Act is July 1, 1985.

RETIREMENT OF JOHN J. FORD

HON. MELVIN PRICE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 8, 1984

● Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to pay tribute to an individual who, with the highest distinction, served the Committee on Armed Services, U.S. House of Representatives, as a professional staff member and as staff director, Mr. John J. Ford.

Retiring recently after 19 years of outstanding service to the Committee on Armed Services, John Ford came to the committee from the staff of the Army Times publication as its Capitol Hill correspondent. During these past 19 years, he successfully climbed the ladder of experience and responsibility in the committee, participating in countless investigations and mastering issues in such diverse areas as legislation governing military personnel and compensation, and public policy related to the development and procurement of the variety of complex weapon systems defending our Nation today.

With the knowledge, understanding, and genuine concern for the hospital rights of military personnel and their dependents, John Ford's efforts contributed materially to the enactment of permanent legislation establishing the basic military health program known today as CHAMPUS.

While a staff member to several special and standing subcommittees, his innovative counsel resulted in improved enlisted promotion policy, enhanced medical and dental care for military personnel and dependents, standardization of the law governing appointments, promotion, separation, and retirement of military officers, and the enactment of the survivor benefit plan among other progressive personnel initiatives that bear his imprint.

As staff director of the Armed Services Committee, John Ford handled that responsibility with a highly commendable sense of evenness and fairness so necessary in congressional staffs today. His intellect, sincerity, sense of humor, and good fellowship has earned the respect and affection of all the committee members and staff colleagues.

The chairman, members, and the staff of the Committee on Armed Services are extremely grateful to John Ford for his contributions to the committee, the Congress, and the national security of the United States.●

THE DEATH OF JOHN PHILLIPS

HON. ALFRED A. (AL) McCANDLESS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 8, 1984

● Mr. McCANDLESS. Mr. Speaker, it is with great sadness that I announce the death of a former colleague, John Phillips, of Riverside County, Calif. Former Congressman Phillips died at the age of 96 in Palm Springs shortly before Christmas. He served this body with distinction from 1942 until his retirement in 1956.

He began his career in politics in 1930, when he was elected to the City Council of Banning, Calif. He later went on to serve in the California State Assembly and State senate.

A longtime resident of the area, he moved to Palm Desert and Rancho Mirage until 1970, when he moved to Hemet for 9 years.

He was married to the late Dorothy Phillips for 53 years, until she died in 1966. He is survived by a daughter, Margaret McWhirter of Palm Springs, two sons, Robert W. of Riverside, and Carl of Hemet; and eight grandchildren and six great-grandchildren.●

GONE TO THE (PRAIRIE) DOGS

HON. RON MARLENEE

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 8, 1984

● Mr. MARLENEE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call the attention of my colleagues to an editorial written by Gladys Silk, editor of the Glasgow Courier, the weekly newspaper of Glasgow, Mont.

The editorial, entitled "Gone to the Dogs" explains the problems we westerners encounter with certain public lands policies. Some of these policies, as Mrs. Silk points out, are "utter madness." I offer the following editorial for the edification of my colleagues.

[From the Glasgow Courier, Jan. 19, 1984]

GONE TO THE DOGS

(By Gladys Silk)

Every now and then, we pounce in the middle of the prairie dog fracas because we firmly believe we have one of the largest concentrations of the rodents in the country.

Located mostly on the Charles M. Russell Game Refuge (CMR), the big rodents in the UL Bend have spread over 20,000 acres, according to research done by Marilyn Orahood of Malta who concentrated on prairie dogs in her testimony at a hearing on the CMR Environmental Impact Statement (EIS) in October, 1980. And the UL Bend count was not included in the EIS.

The goal of CMR, according to its EIS, is to "maintain viable prairie dog towns between 5,000 and 20,000 acres (not counting the UL Bend) of suitable size with signs and patterns desirable for black-footed ferrets." No black-footed ferrets have ever been found on the CMR, yet a proposal in the EIS was to introduce them and other endangered species as they become available.

The Courier added its bit at the hearing about prairie dogs and their link to bubonic plague. We knew that animals with plague were collected in 1974 and 1975 in Garfield County on the south side of Fort Peck Lake.

On Jan. 4 of this year, a report came back from the Center for Disease Control laboratory in Fort Collins, Colo., that a dead cottontail rabbit found in a prarie dog town on BLM land near Miles City in Custer County was carrying fleas with the plague. The prairie dogs had disappeared. According to reports, they had been dying.

Although health officials say that there has never been a death from the plague in Montana, a total of 27 persons in New Mexico had plague in 1983 and three of them died. We heard reports of plague in humans in Oregon and other states.

Ken Quickenden, a medical epidemiologist for the state Department of Health and Environmental Sciences said fleas are the most common carrier of the disease. He said a vast majority of human victims contact the disease by being bitten by fleas and "you can also contact the disease if you are a hunter, trapper or other person who comes in direct contact with an infected animal."

To expend acreage for ballooning prairie dog populations to feed back-footed ferrets that do not exist here is utter madness.

We spend millions of dollars to protect people from diseases on the one hand, and millions to proliferate disease carriers on the other.

Is any endangered species or overgrown rodent dangerous to human health worth the risk? ●

THE DAMASCUS HIGH SCHOOL BAND AND "OPERATION FRIENDLY INVASION"

HON. BEVERLY B. BYRON

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 8, 1984

● Mrs. BYRON. Mr. Speaker, our best ambassadors of good will toward other countries are not usually appointed by the President; they are Americans themselves. In my district, there is an outstanding group of young men and women that truly exemplifies this.

The Damascus High School Band first participated in "Operation Friendly Invasion" in 1979 as part a celebration commemorating the 35th anniversary of D-day. The 1979 trip took them through parts of England and France, where they took part in many ceremonies honoring veterans of the Normandy invasion. In addition to making many friends overseas and reliving the historic event, the Damascus group earned the name "Young Ambassadors" from the Europeans who welcomed them. Indeed, Lt. Col. Hal Ryder, who has helped organize the event and is writing a book about "Operation Friendly Invasion," said, "As representatives of the spirit and character of our country, the Damascus High School Band and its community are unequaled." The band became the only foreign band to perform under the Arc de Triomphe at the Tomb of the Unknown Soldier.

Because of their outstanding performance in 1979, the band and parents were eagerly invited back for this year's 40th commemoration celebration. Students and parents are currently organizing fund-raising activities to pay for the costs and the band is having extra rehearsals to prepare. They will be gone for 12 days, including ceremonies on the beaches at Normandy.

I am sure that this year's trip will be every bit as successful as the one in 1979. In an important way, the Damascus Band and Band Front represent the best of America. Along with the other Members of this body, I salute them and wish them the best for their trip.●

DESIGNATING 1984 AS THE YEAR OF THE SECRETARY

HON. CHRISTOPHER H. SMITH

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 8, 1984

● Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be introducing legislation which appropriately recognizes and honors the largest segment of the white collar work force: the American secretaries.

I think the Members of this House are all aware of the outstanding contributions that the men and women of the secretarial profession have brought to the private and public sectors of out society. In every office, secretaries serve as the focal point—the linch pin—of information and productivity. In a day, a secretary will process mail, complete order forms, contact clients, answer the phones, take dictation, edit drafts, type letters, schedule appointments, reschedule appointments, pay the bills, develop reports, update the ledger, and balance their budget. This last task, as we know, Mr. Speaker, can prove to be most challenging!

Performing some of the most valuable work of an administrative staff, secretaries compliment and complete the work of the office executive. My secretary/office manager, Joan Alexander, typed this very speech and has worked on hundreds of other critical assignments. Put simply, Mr. Speaker, our Nation's businesses could not operate, could not function, could not succeed without these technically trained and talented people, the secretaries.

Mr. Speaker, good secretaries are in constant demand to help run our businesses; our hospitals; our schools; and our Government. There are currently 3.6 million secretaries in the United States and the Bureau of Labor Statistics has projected that the secretarial profession will expand, burst forth, throughout the 1980's and into the next century.

As the number of secretaries continues to grow, so too does the vital role these professionals play in office operations. Mr. Speaker, as America has moved swiftly into office automation and computer technology, our Nation's secretaries have adapted rapidly and have fostered business operations. The 1980's promise to be the age of computer advancement possibly rendering many traditional office procedures worthless and expendible. Already, our secretaries have shown a willingness, an eagerness, and an ability to excel in computer literacy and electronic mail communications. As we move closer to the 21st century, it will be these new office systems that American businesses need to utilize. Furthermore, it will be the office secretary on whom these businesses must rely to manage the new systems most effectively and efficiently.

Although we have recognized the last week in April as secretaries' week, since 1952, I think it is time that we acknowledge and keep in step with the expansion of this profession and the ever increasing role secretaries are assuming in American business. Mr. Speaker, today I recognize this progression and I introduce a timely resolution to designate 1984 as "The Year of the Secretary." I encourage my colleagues to support this legislation as a fitting tribute to the secretarial profession upon whose skills, loyalty, and efficiency the functions of American business and government are predicated.●

ROUKEMA CONGRATULATES EAGLE SCOUTS

HON. MARGE ROUKEMA

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 8, 1984

● Mrs. ROUKEMA. Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I call my colleagues' attention to the accomplishments of James W. Hillas and Steven M. Friedman. Both of these fine young men recently achieved the rank of Eagle Scout in Boy Scout Troop 126 of Montvale, N.J. Both James and Steven have worked long and hard to reach this goal, the highest rank that can be attained as a Scout.

James W. Hillas is a lifelong resident of Bergen County, N.J. He was born in Westwood in 1964, resided in Park Ridge, and at the age of 5, moved to Montvale. James attended public schools in the Montvale School System. He was treasurer of the Pascack Hills Senior Class and now attends Green Mountain College in Vermont. James joined the Boy Scouts at the age of 11, was elected to the Order of the Arrow and currently holds the position of assistant scout master. He was an instructor for winter survival courses and is merit badge counselor for several merit badges. James resides with this parents and sister in Montvale.

Steven M. Friedman was born in the Bronx, N.Y., in 1965, lived in Matawan, N.J., and Maryland, and moved to Woodcliff Lake in 1982. He graduated from Pascack Hills High School in 1983 and currently attends Syracuse University. Steven also joined the Scouts at the age of 11 and since that time, has been very active. He has been a patrol leader, senior patrol leader, and was elected to the Order of the Arrow. He has also served as a river guide on the Delaware River and has been a water safety instructor. Steven resides in Woodcliff Lake with his parents, a brother and a sister.

Mr. Speaker, these two young men have shown maturity and responsibility and have proven their leadership to their peers. I commend them and wish them continued success.●

TRIBUTE TO JOHN J. FORD

HON. WILLIAM L. DICKINSON

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 8, 1984

● Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to Mr. John J. Ford, who has retired as staff director, House Committee on Armed Services. For the past 19 years, John Ford performed his duties as a professional staff member and later as the staff director in an outstanding and distinguished manner, truly a professional among professionals.

As a staff member of the Investigations Subcommittee, he recommended actions related to a number of irregularities resulting in remedial actions in the Department of Defense significantly benefiting the United States. John Ford's depth of knowledge and unique ability not only to understand, but to explain the implications of the enormous decisions facing the committee have resulted in informed judgments and a better national defense policy.

In the unique position as director of a nonpartisan staff in a nonpartisan committee, he handled that responsibility with a highly commendable sense of fairness rarely seen in congressional staffs today. As a result of John Ford's ability and leadership as staff director, the Armed Services Committee staff achieved and maintained a well deserved and widely recognized reputation for excellence and quality performance.

As the ranking minority member of the Committee on Armed Services, I commend John Ford for a task well done and successfully completed that reflects great credit upon himself and the Congress of the United States.●

FEDERAL CREDIT UNION POSTAGE STAMP

HON. MARY ROSE OAKAR

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 8, 1984

● Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, 1984 promises to be a banner year for Federal credit unions. On June 26, we will observe the 50th anniversary of the signing of the Federal Credit Union Act. During the last session, many of our colleagues joined in cosponsoring House Joint Resolution 139, designating the week of June 24, 1984, as "Federal Credit Union Week." I am happy to report that the resolution, having been acted upon favorably by both Chambers of the Congress, was signed into law on August 11 as Public Law 98-71. I would like to take this opportunity to thank my colleagues for their support of this highly worthwhile commemorative resolution.

Federal credit union officials from around the country are planning to gather in Salem, Mass. tomorrow, February 10, for the U.S. Postal Service's ceremony to inaugurate the new 20-cent commemorative stamp recognizing the important role credit unions play in the American financial marketplace. The stamp honors the 50th anniversary of the signing of the Federal Credit Union Act, which allows credit unions to organize under the supervision and insurance protection of the Federal Government.

The ceremony will be held at the Hawthorne Inn with Postmaster General William A. Bolger speaking. Mrs. Catherine Filene Shouse will also be on the program. She is the niece of Edward A. Filene of Boston who played a key role in the establishment of credit unions in the 1920's and 1930's. National Credit Union Administration Board Chairman Edgar Callahan, Vice Chairman P. A. Mack and Board Member Elizabeth Burkhart will also be in attendance. They preside over the Federal agency that regulates Federal credit unions.

John Hutchinson, president of the National Association of Federal Credit Unions (NAFCU), will join them on the podium to pay tribute to the U.S. Postal Service, the National Credit Union Administration and Members of Congress who supported the concept of a stamp for credit unions. Mr. Hutchinson and the NAFCU staff deserve a good deal of credit for their diligence and perseverance in pursuing their request for a Federal credit union commemorative stamp. As John Hutchinson recently told me:

> This stamp will be an integral part of NAFCU's plans to properly celebrate the 50th anniversary of Federal credit unions.

This first-class Federal credit union postage stamp and commemorative resolution, will insure that Federal credit unions receive the recognition they deserve for diligently serving the financial needs of their more than 26 million members. I extend my own personal congratulations not only to Federal credit unions but to all our Nation's credit unions on this happy occasion. It is reassuring to once again witness the great things that can be accomplished when Americans reach out in an cooperative way to achieve a common good.●

THE EFFECTIVE SCHOOLS DEVELOPMENT IN EDUCATION ACT OF 1984

HON. AUGUSTUS F. HAWKINS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 8, 1984

● Mr. HAWKINS. Mr. Speaker, on February 2, 1984, I introduced H.R. 4731, the Effective Schools Development in Education Act of 1984. The purpose of this bill is to assist and encourage State and local education agencies in broadening and improving effective school programs that they have developed and implemented.

The effective schools movement, based on effective schools research and models of school effectiveness, acts on this research that shows that instructionally effective schools have five characteristics that differentiate effective schools from ineffective schools: First, strong leadership at the school level; second, high expectations that no child will fall below minimum levels of achievement; third, an orderly school atmosphere conducive to learning and teaching; fourth, student acquiring of basic and higher order skills takes precedence over all other school activity; and fifth, frequent and consistent evaluation of student progress.

The research into what makes a school an effective institution primarily began in the inner cities of this Nation among the children of the poor. An early pioneer in this endeavor was George Weber, who examined four inner city schools—in his 1971 study—in which achievement in reading was clearly successful for poor children. Weber found that all four schools evidenced: strong leadership by the school principal; high expectations for all students; and orderly school climate; strong emphasis on pupil acquisition of reading skills; frequent evaluation of student progress.

Another giant in the effective schools movement was education researcher-reformer Ronald Edmonds. Mr. Edmonds disagreed with highly respected academicians who postulated that in a child's education, family background was a more important teacher than a child's school experience, and that therefore "schools don't make a difference." Edmonds at Harvard, at Michigan State University, and as a New York City school administrator put his research to practical application and concluded that a school can make a difference when it controls the quality of those things it does best: leadership; expectations; and school climate. Edmonds noted that in research on pupil performance, in which he participated in the 20 elementary schools in Detroit's Model Cities neighborhood—in 1974—that

"pupil family background neither causes nor precludes elementary school instructional effectiveness."

The new thinking advanced by Edmonds and his colleagues challenged the accepted view in the early seventies that "schools don't make a difference" because family background and social class was a more effective teacher than any classroom experience. Edmonds' view was that a school's control of program and program quality could make the difference in a child's school achievement regardless of family background.

Effective schools research is now showing that there are many things teachers, principals and schools do control which can serve as the means to improve student achievement, student behavior, and teaching and learning practices. The underlying assumption in effective schools programs is: that all children are educable; that their education derives primarily from the nature of the school to which they are sent, as contrasted with the nature of the family or neighborhood from which they come; and that children who start out not doing well in school get further behind the longer they go to school.

The objective is to stop the continuous movement of children who are not prepared to do academic work and to require that students demonstrate minimum academic mastery at each of the levels of schooling, so that they will be successful at the next level.

Currently, there is insufficient specificity concerning the exact number of school districts with effective schools programs in place. It is reasonable to assume, however, that some 15 to 25 States have implemented effective schools programs, involving some 875 school districts and covering about 2,400 school buildings, with approximately two-thirds of the programs occurring in elementary schools. The programs tend to be located in large and moderate-sized cities, less in the suburbs, but fairly well distributed in rural areas.

Dr. Matthew Miles of the Center of Policy Research in a January 1983 report on effective schools, prepared for the National Commission on Excellence in Education, noted that a representative example of an effective schools program typically was as follows:

> The program is aimed at improving teaching practices, student achievement, and student behavior. In each school building, a leadership team is convened for shared decisionmaking: it includes teachers, department heads and the principal. The principal and teachers receive intensive training in how to guide the process, which begins with the collection of hard data on student achievement and behavior, along with information on community perceptions of the school, and review of district policies that impact on the school. The team analyzes the data in the light of five major factors from the effective school research (leadership, climate, teaching, expectations, pupil monitoring), and examines current practices used in the school.
> This review leads to the development of an improvement plan with specific changes in each of the five areas; the plan is carried out with careful monitoring of progress. There is a range of supportive, self-using materials. The program is designed to be managed without much external consultation or technical assistance.
> The program took four years and about $300,000 to develop into its present form. It is currently being used in 7 school districts, most of them urban. Included are 18 elementary schools, 4 middle schools/junior high schools, and 13 high schools. The typical add-on costs for schools are minimal, usually about $2,000 for released time for training.
> The program has only been in operation for a year, but data already suggest improved student attendance and fewer discipline problems. It's too early to tell about student achievement. The results seem to depend in part on how well integrated the leadership team is as it manages the process.

Dr. Miles described effective schools programs that he studied as being "well defined, largely based on the effective schools/effective teaching literature, and emphasized improvement at the school building level." He further indicated that most of the schools in his study said that the experience had a clear impact on their defined goals:

> Student achievement and improved student behavior (attendance, vandalism reduction, improved discipline); the "5 factors" of the effective schools literature (leadership, orderly humane climate, high expectations, instructional focus, and student performance monitoring); teaching behavior; curriculum change; and positive organizational changes (collaboration, support, climate).

I am impressed by the mounting evidence that the effective schools programs across this Nation, are making an important contribution in improving the education climate in many of our schools, thereby effecting improvement in student achievement and student behavior.

I am also concerned about the education of this Nation's children, and am deeply disturbed by the continuing attacks on the public education institutions of this country. I have determined therefore that I will use a substantial amount of my energies to enhance, encourage, and support new ideas in education. The effective schools bill that I have introduced in this session of Congress is such a step in that direction.

The Effective Schools Development in Education Act of 1984 would authorize the Secretary of Education to award matching grants to State and local education agencies that have implemented an effective schools improvement program, and who wish to broaden and improve such programs, but who may not be able to effectuate such improvements because such additional funds may not be available at the local or State level. State or local educational agencies making applications for such matching grants—in which the award funds would not pay more than one-half the cost of a State or local educational agency program—could use the funds:

To promote State and local educational agency awareness of effective schools programs through school conferences, seminars, and meetings, and through visits to model effective schools;

To develop and implement data collection systems and feed back the analysis and interpretation of the data to local schools;

To support effective schools efforts such as: training programs, workshops, and forums for school personnel, parents, and community organizations; and to support demonstration programs;

To obtain technical assistance;

To develop, publish, and disseminate effective schools materials;

To encourage State and local educational agencies to participate in effective schools programs and school improvement programs;

To encourage State and local educational agencies involved in effective schools program implementation;

To conduct research and development programs in effective schools practice and school improvement methods, which can contribute to an improved formulation of Federal, State, and local education policy;

To assist State and local educational agencies in meeting the special school needs of educationally deprived children involved in effective schools programs.

There is no doubt that more study and research is needed to determine the dynamics of program implementation and impact within the school and in the classroom. What is clear is that effective schools programs are occurring nationwide at a significant rate, and that most of the programs are being fairly well implemented.

What is also clear is that effective schools programs are showing promise for secondary school improvement as well as for elementary schools, and that this promise suggests that effective schools usage will expand appreciably over the next few years.

What better role for the Federal Government than to encourage the adoption of effective schools programs in schools throughout the Nation that see the need for this kind of program effort. Nowhere is this said with more clarity than in the National Commission on Excellence in Education's report, "A Nation at Risk." In discussing the role of the Federal Government in education, the report notes that this role includes "supporting curriculum improvement and research on teaching, learning, and the management of schools; supporting teacher training in areas of critical shortage or key national needs."

More emphatically, the Commission report stated that:

The Federal Government has the primary responsibility to identify the national interest in education. It should also help fund and support efforts to protect and promote that interest. It must provide the national leaderships to ensure that the Nation's public and private resources are marshaled to address the issues discussed in this report.

The leadership I am concerned about rests here in the Congress. We have and opportunity in considering the effective schools bill to advance the cause of education by recognizing that the children of this Nation are our most precious resource, by extending every opportunity to provide them with excellence in education. Promoting a national effort in assisting schools in their effective schools endeavors would be the best use of resources of which I am aware.●

SUMMER YOUTH EMPLOYMENT PROGRAM

HON. PAT WILLIAMS

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 8, 1984

● Mr. WILLIAMS of Montana. Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to be able to share the results of a survey on the impact on cities of funding cuts in fiscal year 1984, for job training and the summer youth employment program. This survey was prepared by the National League of Cities and the U.S. Conference of Mayors.

I have spoken before regarding the cuts in the basic job training program, so my colleagues should be apprised of that general problem. This survey cites the specific impact of the cuts on 24 cities.

This is the first opportunity, however, to review the impact of the cuts in the 1984 summer youth employment program. The cuts are extreme in some cities. For example, Chicago lost 47 percent of the funds it had last summer, Cleveland 42 percent, and Dallas 40 percent, just to mention a few.

One reason for these cuts is that the Congress appropriated $100 million less for the summer youth employment program in fiscal year 1984 when compared with fiscal year 1983. In addition to the lower funding level, there was a formula change in allocating JTPA summer youth funds when compared with the CETA formula; there was a 100 percent hold-harmless provision regarding summer youth funds under CETA; and, there was a 5 percent Secretary's discretionary fund under CETA that was previously distributed to prime sponsors experiencing high unemployment rates.

I urge my colleagues to review this survey and the summer youth employment program funding situation in their districts.

I would like to thank Alan Beals, executive director of the National League of Cities, and John Gunther, executive director of the U.S. Conference of Mayors, for making the results of this survey available to me. Also, special credit should go to Carol Kocheisen of NLC and Steve Cain of USCM, who prepared the survey.

FEBRUARY 1, 1984.

Hon. PAT WILLIAMS,
U.S. House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE WILLIAMS: Attached for your review are two recent surveys of selected cities conducted by the National League of Cities and U.S. Conference of Mayors documenting significant reductions in funding for training programs for the economically disadvantaged and for the summer youth employment programs.

While the national unemployment rate has been declining and is projected to continue decreasing modestly this year, many cities have not shared in the economic recovery experienced by the nation overall. Unemployment problems remain severe for the unskilled who reside in these cities.

Unemployment among young people, especially minority teenagers, has been impervious to general improvements in the economy. And, as you know, funding for summer youth employment programs for this summer is 14 percent below the amount available last year.

We appreciate your support for these vital programs and look forward to working with you to secure additional needed funding.

Sincerely,

ALAN BEALS,
Executive Director, National League of Cities.

JOHN GUNTHER,
Executive Director, U.S. Conference of Mayors.

PROHIBITING INDIAN TRIBES FROM HUNTING ELK IN OLYMPIC NATIONAL PARK BEING DISCUSSED

HON. AL SWIFT

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 8, 1984

● Mr. SWIFT. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing today a bill to overturn a recent lower court decision that allows members of Indian tribes to hunt elk in Olympic National Park in Washington State.

Olympic National Park was established by Congress in 1938. One of the principal reasons the park was created was to provide protection for the herds of native Roosevelt elk and other wildlife indigenous to the area. This purpose was so central to the creation of the park that the park was almost called Elk National Park. In 1942, Congress acted to give further protection to the elk by banning all hunting in the park. These enactments have been very successful: Today, the largest unmanaged herd of Roosevelt elk in the Nation lives within the park.

Recently, however, the safety of the elk has been threatened by a Federal district court decision which arose when two Indian tribal members were charged with hunting and killing elk within the park boundaries. The judge dismissed the charges that had been brought by the United States because in his opinion tribal members were guaranteed the privilege of hunting in the areas encompassed by the park. He also ruled that neither the 1938 act creating the park nor the 1942 act banning all hunting in the park served to diminish these privileges.

With due deference to the court decision, what has been guaranteed to Indians is the privilege—not the right—to hunt on lands which are "open and unclaimed." I do not believe that the lands of the park, which have been expressly reserved for the benefit of the U.S. citizens, continue to exist as open and unclaimed for the purpose of determining the preogatives of Indian tribes under treaties into which they entered. Prior to the court decision, there had been no hunting within the park, and in fact at least one tribe had promulgated regulations prohibiting hunting in the park.

The legislation that I am introducing today will make it clear that the 1942 statute extinguishes any privilege that may exist for Indians to hunt in the park. In addition to the obvious and severe threat this decision poses to previously protected elk and other wildlife, it also creates a potentially dangerous situation for the more than 2.5 million people who visit the park each year. Tourists may be mistaken for game by overeager hunters; moreover, wildlife accustomed to peacefully coexisting with humans may now become hostile to visitors as a result of any hunting excursions.

Mr. Speaker, this legislation is necessary to insure that the original intent in creating the park, the protection of the Roosevelt elk and other wildlife, is carried out. I urge my colleagues to support this bill.●

SENATE COMMITTEE MEETINGS

Title IV of Senate Resolution 4, agreed to by the Senate on February 4, 1977, calls for establishment of a system for a computerized schedule of all meetings and hearings of Senate committees, subcommittees, joint committees, and committees of conference. This title requires all such committees to notify the Office of the Senate Daily Digest—designated by the Rules Committee—of the time, place, and purpose of the meetings, when scheduled, and any cancellations or changes in the meetings as they occur.

As an additional procedure along with the computerization of this information, the Office of the Senate Daily Digest will prepare this information for printing in the Extensions of Remarks section of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on Monday and Wednesday of each week.

Any changes in committee scheduling will be indicated by placement of an asterisk to the left of the name of the unit conducting such meetings.

Meetings scheduled for Thursday, February 9, 1984, may be found in the Daily Digest of today's RECORD.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Thursday, February 9, 1984

The House met at 11 a.m., and was called to order by the Speaker pro tempore (Mr. WRIGHT).

DESIGNATION OF SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following communication from the Speaker:

WASHINGTON, D.C.,
February 8, 1984.

I hereby designate the Honorable JIM WRIGHT to act as Speaker pro tempore on Thursday, February 9, 1984.

THOMAS P. O'NEILL, Jr.,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

PRAYER

The Chaplain, Rev. James David Ford, D.D., offered the following prayer:

O God, of all the many gifts that brighten our lives and cause us joy, we thank You for Your miracles of life and love. We remember how You spoke to the prophets of old and showed Your power in the events of the time, yet we thank You too for the miracles that touch our lives in our day and time—the miracles of reconciliation between enemies, the miracle of transcending differences for the sake of the common good, the miracles of healing and helping, and above all else, the miracle of life itself. Amid the dangers and destruction in our world, we pray, O God, that the miracle of peace may be with us and all Your creation. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has examined the Journal of the last day's proceedings and announces to the House his approval thereof.

Pursuant to clause 1, rule I, the Journal stands approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Sparrow, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate has passed a bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 1762. An act entitled the "Comprehensive Crime Control Act of 1984."

BLACKLISTED

(Mr. GARCIA asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, I rose this morning to discover that I have been blacklisted by an agency of the U.S. Government. The very same Government that was founded on the principles of free speech has determined that I and other individuals with different views than those of the current administration, should not be invited to speak in Government-sponsored engagements abroad.

Now, I have been grouped in good company. Among my fellow philosophical outlaws are Walter Cronkite, David Brinkley, Ben Bradlee, Elizabeth Drew, James Schlesinger, Adm. Stansfield Turner, Coretta Scott King, and our colleagues TOM DOWNEY, JACK BROOKS, and the late Phil Burton.

Mr. Speaker, this is a very frightening development. Our Nation was built on debate and the resolution of different views. For over 200 years, we have progressed through consensus building—never ignoring or stifling those that disagree. The year is 1984 and George Orwell's work does not seem so fictional any more.

NATIONAL LAW ENFORCEMENT HEROES MEMORIAL

(Mr. BIAGGI asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, as a 23-year veteran of the New York City Police Department, I am introducing legislation today to honor our Nation's forgotten patriots by establishing a National Law Enforcement Heroes Memorial in Washington, D.C.

This memorial would pay a long overdue tribute to all Federal, State, and local law enforcement officers killed in the line of duty. In addition, it would serve as a constant reminder of the critical need to better protect those who continue to protect us.

The FBI reports that during the 10-year period from 1973 through 1982, 1,600 law enforcement officers were killed in the line of duty. During the last 2 years, 309 law enforcement officers died while performing their official duties—nearly one police death every 2 days.

Under this measure, no Federal expenditures would be required to construct the memorial. Instead, the Law Enforcement Officers Memorial Fund, Inc., a nonprofit, tax-exempt group, would be authorized to establish the memorial through private contributions.

Mr. Speaker, with good reason, we have built memorials to honor those who lost their lives in foreign wars. A similar national monument is needed to honor those brave men and women who lose their lives at home in the war against crime.

DEFICITS: A SPEECH OF FRUSTRATION

(Mr. ROEMER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ROEMER. Mr. Speaker, this morning I am giving a speech of frustration and I apologize for the feeling, not the speech. I am frankly sick and tired of the so-called political leaders in our two parties and in the White House telling us what they are not going to do on the deficit.

So far these men of courage are committed to not cutting entitlements, that is $400 billion in the budget; not cutting military spending, that is $300 billion in the budget; not cutting interest payments, that is $100 billion in the budget. And, oh, yes, they are not going to raise taxes.

I have got news for these so-called leaders. There is nothing left in the budget after you exclude these subjects.

If you cut everything else, the deficit next year will still be $125 billion.

The feeling grows that our leaders do not want to reduce these deficits. They want to get reelected. I mean they seem desperate to find someone to blame; someone else, preferably.

The American people know who to blame: all of us.

I have news for our leaders. Either lead with courage and wisdom on this question, or someone else will.

We are pretty far down the hierarchy in the House, pretty low on the totem pole. We do not have your knowledge or your experience, but the feeling grows. If you do not have the courage to lead, step aside and let us try.

LEGISLATION TO PROVIDE FUNDS FOR DRUG EDUCATION PROGRAMS IN THE SCHOOLS

(Mr. ORTIZ asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ORTIZ. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing the National Drug Education Act of 1984 to fund education programs in the schools to deter drug use and provide children with information about the harmful effects of drug abuse.

Statistics indicate that drug experimentation and use among young people is widespread and transcends all socioeconomic strata. Even children under age 12 are being induced through peer pressure to try drugs or alcohol. Daily alcohol and marihuana use among high school students is high. At least 1 in every 16 high school seniors is actively smoking marihuana on a daily basis and 1 in 16 is drinking alcohol daily.

In addition to the harmful physical and mental side effects, drug use costs this Nation $100 billion annually, of which an astonishing $70 to $80 billion is attributable to drug-related crime and corruption, and $15 to $20 billion is attributable to the impact of drug abusers on the health care, law enforcement, and judicial systems, the employment market, and the general welfare and social service systems. We cannot afford to drain our economic and judicial system in this way. More importantly, we cannot stand by and watch our children become drawn into drug abuse because they did not know or understand the consequences.

My bill would provide grant moneys to State educational agencies to establish and improve drug, alcohol, and tobacco education programs for elementary and secondary school students. The bill allows the States flexibility and autonomy in designing programs to meet their needs. Local educational agencies would provide 5 percent of the funds, the States would provide 20 percent, and the Department of Education would contribute the other 75 percent. This bill would insure that students receive the information they need at an early enough age to be able to cope with peer pressure to use drugs and to make an informed choice not to use them.

PERMISSION FOR SUBCOMMITTEE ON ENERGY RESEARCH AND PRODUCTION OF COMMITTEE ON SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY TO SIT TODAY DURING 5-MINUTE RULE

Mrs. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Subcommittee on Energy Research and Production of the Committee on Science and Technology be permitted to sit while the House is reading for amendment under the 5-minute rule on Thursday, February 9, 1984. The minority has been advised of this request and it is my understanding that they have no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

BLACKLISTED BY U.S. INFORMATION AGENCY

(Mr. BROOKS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, this morning I was both amused and shocked when I read the Washington Post and discovered that I and 83 of my fellow citizens had been "blacklisted" from speaking engagements abroad, sponsored by the U.S. Information Agency's American participation program.

This action on the part of the Reagan administration's self-confessed electronic peeping tom, Charles Z. Wick, is something that we have come to associate with Republican administrations ever since Watergate and President Nixon used his infamous "hit list" to single out American citizens for special treatment. Of course, such an action is a clear abuse of Executive power and it got President Nixon in deep trouble.

For the record, while I am pleased to be associated with such dignitaries as Walter Cronkite and Benjamin Bradlee, as a Member of Congress, chairman of the House Government Operations Committee, and a member of the Judiciary Committee, I am less than pleased with the existence of such a list and I am more than anxious to discover a detailed explanation as to why the list was compiled in the first place.

Through the years, we have developed procedures for dealing with such arrogant and outrageous abuses of Executive power. The President and his hand-picked political appointees should be aware that the American people and their Representatives in Congress will not tolerate such behavior.

In closing, I want to urge all of my colleagues who might be disappointed that they too did not make the Wick blacklist, not to give up in a fit of pique but keep faith with your democratic values and you too may work your way into a similar exhaulted circle.

CHARLES WICK'S BLACKLIST—IN GOOD COMPANY

(Mr. DOWNEY of New York asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DOWNEY of New York. Mr. Speaker, you know, all the years that I have been entering contests, playing sweepstakes, I have never won anything. I was low in the draft lottery; but now I have won something.

I have made Charles Wick's blacklist, and I am really honored to be with this other company of 83 distinguished Americans.

I can understand; maybe they just did not have enough money to hear progressive Democrats speak on the issues of the day.

Therefore, I propose a solution, Mr. Speaker; Mr. Wick is wonderful at tape recording things. I will be happy to call him on the telephone, he can record my speech and he can have it for distribution abroad. And I propose a second solution. A very long trip abroad for Mr. Wick and an end to this wick hunt at home.

REPORT OF AD HOC GROUP ON DEFICIT REDUCTIONS

(Mr. WRIGHT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday, Congressman TRENT LOTT, Senators INOUYE and LAXALT and I met with a group from the White House and the administration in a serious effort to identify and locate ways in which jointly we might reduce the enormous deficits that are frightening the money markets and alarming the public and providing upward pressures on interest rates.

Some progress may be reported.

I offered a suggestion, originally made by the former President Ford, with respect to streaching out certain military procurements and thus saving perhaps $100 billion over the 3-year period.

Other suggestions were made.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may insert in the RECORD at this point a letter to Hon. James Baker, Chief of Staff at the White House, which I have had hand delivered to him today with respect to where those talks stand at this moment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. GARCIA). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
OFFICE OF THE MAJORITY LEADER,
Washington, D.C., February 9, 1984.

Hon. JAMES BAKER,
Chief of Staff,
The White House.

DEAR JIM: In view of the enormous increases in military spending projected by the President's budget submission for the next three years, Speaker O'Neill has requested that the next meeting of our ad hoc exploratory group on deficit reductions be devoted exclusively to discovering and agreeing upon ways in which the runaway growth in military spending can be reduced by at least $100 billion over this time frame.

At our meetng on Wednesday, the White House agreed to consider and evaluate my suggestion, originally expressed by former President Ford, that we stretch out planned military procurement and other costs related to attaining specific force levels, attaining over the next six years the five year growth which the administration has asked.

This would seem to be a good starting point for our next meeting.

It is obvious that any really substantial spending reductions must come from the very rapid increase in military spending, since this—except for interest charges on the growing national debt—is clearly the most rapidly escalating item in the budget and the most logical source for serious savings.

Military budget authority for the current fiscal year already comes to $265 billion. President Reagan has asked for a total of slightly more than $1 trillion in additional military spending over the next three years. His requests amount to $268 billion above the current spending level for this period.

It is with the view in mind of achieving really major reductions in our unacceptably high level of budget deficits that Speaker O'Neill has asked that we concentrate first on these areas which can yield the most significant results.

As you know, domestic programs have been reduced substantially during the past three years, and whatever additional savings might be available through further economies in domestic activities would be relatively small by comparison. These can be considered, along with tax loophole closers and other revenue code reforms, after first we have made a convincing demonstration of the seriousness of our intent by agreeing upon major reductions in the rate of growth in military spending. I believe that our doing so will have a reassuring effect both with the general public and with the financial markets which seem to lack confidence that anything of a major nature will be done this year to stem the flood of red ink flowing from the enormous deficits in the President's budgets.

Whenever your associates in the Administration can complete their analysis of the Ford suggestion which I offered and be prepared to present such other savings as they may propose in the area of military spending, I shall be anxious to join you for our next meeting.

Although I have appointments in Texas next week, I can and will cancel such as necessary to return to Washington for a resumption of our meetings on Tuesday, Wednesday or Thursday if you desire. I believe that Senator Byrd has requested that you make available to him and Senator Inouye any formal proposals you may be prepared to offer some 48 hours in advance, if possible, for their prior study and evaluation.

Looking forward to hearing from you in this regard.

Sincerely,

JIM WRIGHT.

THIS BODY SHOULD ACT TO REDUCE THE PRESIDENT'S BUDGET

(Mr. PAUL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. PAUL. Mr. Speaker, it is time for this body to act. Fine rhetoric is not enough. Eloquent spokesmen on both sides of the aisle have come to the well in the past few weeks and decried the tremendous budget deficit. But only actions are what counts—the markets and voters have not been fooled by our empty rhetoric compromised votes.

I ask my colleagues, when are we going to begin to cut and cut across the board? The American people are pleading for us to act. At the rate we are spending the annual deficit by the year 2000 will be $2 trillion if we make it that far.

Recently, the Grace Commission submitted 2,500 cost-cutting recommendations on ways to reduce Federal spending by $424 billion over the next 3 years. These recommendations provide a good starting point from which we can begin to eliminate our huge deficits and reduce the size of overgrown Government. But cutting must begin with each one of us. Republicans must support cuts in overseas military spending that contributes nothing to our own defense and Democrats must support cuts in domestic programs. Furthermore, each of us must support cutting funding for programs that benefit the special interests in our districts as well as welfare for both the rich and poor. Our constituents do not want more handouts, but lower taxes, less spending, and balanced budgets.

It is past time to reassess our priorities. The taxpayers can no longer afford to have us spend ourselves into oblivion. Our children and grandchildren will not be able to afford the tremendous debts we are leaving as our legacy to them.

Mr. Speaker, it is up to those of us in this body to take the lead and reduce the President's budget across the board.

CALLING FOR CONSIDERATION OF VOLUNTARY SCHOOL PRAYER AMENDMENT

(Mr. DEWINE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DEWINE. Mr. Speaker, at this time I would hope to offer a unanimous-consent request calling for consideration of the voluntary school prayer constitutional amendment.

The Chair has ruled that in order to make this request I must have clearance of the majority and minority leadership. This request has been cleared by the minority leadership. I would now yield to a spokesman from the majority leadership for the appropriate clearance.

Mr. Speaker, I hear no response. That should make it clear, I think, to the American people who stands in the way of voluntary school prayer, the Democratic leadership of this House.

THE LINE-ITEM VETO—HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION 404

(Mr. BADHAM asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BADHAM. Mr. Speaker, I am constantly amazed at the newfound fiscal conscience that many of my colleagues on the other side of the aisle have developed.

On the one hand they blame the President for the deficits. Then they turn around and refuse to give the President any tool he might need to reduce the Federal deficit.

The big spenders have publicly criticized the line-item veto and I think it is easy to see why. They do not want President Reagan singling out their favorite programs from which they can derive political capital.

The line-item veto would go a long way toward eliminating this kind of abuse of the taxpayers' hard-earned dollars.

So, Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to cosponsor and to support House Joint Resolution 404, establishing a line-item veto because, Mr. Speaker, I believe that the vast majority of the American people would like to see a return to fiscal sanity in the budget process.

LET US GET DOWN TO BUSINESS—PASS THE BALANCED BUDGET AMENDMENT

(Mr. BLILEY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BLILEY. Mr. Speaker, when Congress adjourns today and the Members go back to their districts, one theme will be heard across the country. Every Member will have to make up an excuse for the House's inactivity on the people's agenda.

We have pending before various committees and subcommittees important legislation that our people want us to pass. But the House routinely refuses to act. Instead, we have to listen to Member after Member criticize the White House for its intransigence on the budget. It seems ironic to me that the same Members that yell and scream and call the President uncaring when he takes a day or two off refuse to do any real work themselves. Perhaps the reason they do not have time to take up the balanced budget amendment or go downtown to work with the President on reducing deficits is that they squander all their time knocking the President. If we spent half the time trimming the budget that we spend coming up with excuses why we cannot, we would have balanced the budget years ago.

Mr. Speaker, we owe the people of this country better representation. If the House leadership is unwilling to do what our citizens want and balance the budget, then it is indeed time for new leadership. Let us stop making excuses and get down to business. Bring the balanced budget amendment to the floor.

DEVASTATING EFFECTS OF BIG SPENDING POLICIES

(Mr. ROGERS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I rise today in strong support for the balanced budget amendment.

I call on my colleagues to support this mission not just on behalf of the thousands of Americans who have asked their Representatives to support the amendment, but also on behalf of the future generations of Americans.

I would like to remind our colleagues of some of the effects which our deficit spending will have on the Nation. First, there is the issue of interest rates.

Our Federal Government is cornering the market; 75 percent of all available credit is taken up by Uncle Sam. This leaves all private borrowers scrambling to compete for the remaining 25 percent.

This policy has bid up interest rates over recent years, and, as most small businessmen and farmers can attest, when Uncle Sam elbows you out of the credit market there is not much you can do to fight back.

The second major effect of the big spending policy is soaring costs of servicing the debt. This cost has climbed from near $6 billion in 1960 to an estimated $91 billion over the next year; and by the close of the decade, this decade, interest payments are expected to account for 16 percent, over 16 percent of the total Federal budget.

Mr. Speaker, the Congress, this 98th Congress has a choice; it can leave future generations of Americans a well-ordered financial condition, one primed for the engines of growth, to generate improved standards of living, jobs, and equality of life and freedom, which we all can treasure; or we can leave to it a future of lost jobs, lost hopes, and soaring taxes.

A BALANCED BUDGET OR A CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION

(Mr. KRAMER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. KRAMER. Mr. Speaker, the party that calls itself the party of the people is thwarting the will of the people.

All across this Nation an overwhelming majority of the people support adoption of a balanced budget amendment to the Constitution. And once again, a handful of Members in this House, who presume to know more than millions of taxpayers, have thwarted efforts to get the ball rolling for a balanced budget amendment.

It is the same kind of attitude, Mr. Speaker, that is spending this country into bankruptcy. At the beginning of 1968, the total debt from our Nation's first 192 years of existence was $350 billion. By 1978, the year I first campaigned for Congress, the debt had doubled. Since then, it has doubled again, this time in only 5 years. Given current deficit projections, the national debt will top $2 trillion during fiscal year 1986.

Mr. Speaker, we are building a financial crisis of proportions unequaled in the history of this Nation. Unless we act now to bring a halt to this deficit spending, by moving on the balanced budget amendment, we will see a return of high inflation, high interest rates, and high unemployment—and worse.

Moreover, if we in Congress do not act soon, the American people will take the issue out of our hands, by pursuing with vigor, and rightly so, a constitutional convention.

PRODUCTIVITY INCREASES

(Mr. REGULA asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. REGULA. Mr. Speaker, it has been said that there is no free lunch. This week's issue of Business Week carries a cover story about what one Treasury Department economist terms "the only free lunch in economics," an increase in productivity.

In light of all the disheartening news of budget and trade deficits, the news of a surprising and potentially permanent growth in productivity is indeed a ray of sunshine.

After over a decade of low or no growth in productivity we are, for the first time in years, facing the prospect of substantial and sustained economic growth.

During the first three quarters of 1983 the hourly output of the average worker increased by a remarkable 13.6 percent. While no one projects continued growth rates of this magnitude, some experts predict that annual growth rates in output per work hour in the nonfarm sector could run as high as 3 percent a year for the rest of this decade.

Many of the factors responsible for the decline in productivity experienced during the 1970's have begun to reverse themselves.

Shortly, I will be reserving time for a special order to discuss these reversals and the potential social and economic benefits. I invite my colleagues to join me in a dialog on this vital issue.

SEEKING CONSIDERATION OF A BALANCED BUDGET AMENDMENT

(Mr. BILIRAKIS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BILIRAKIS. Mr. Speaker, at this time I would hope to offer a unanimous-consent request calling for consideration of an amendment to require a balanced budget.

However, the Chair has ruled that in order to make this request I must have the clearance of the majority and minority leaderships.

This request has been cleared by the minority leadership.

I would now yield to a spokeman from the majority leadership for appropriate clearance.

Mr. Speaker, I hear no response. The American people hear no response. That should make it clear to the American people who stands in the way of a balanced budget—the Democratic leadership of this House.

LEGISLATION TO EFFECT CHANGES IN MEDICARE PROGRAM

(Mr. SHAW asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SHAW. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a bill that will tie a loose thread in the medicare knot. As a Representative from a congressional district with a large number of medicare recipients, I am particularly concerned about the solvency of this important program. We should not fool ourselves, the medicare system in its present form is in trouble. We, as elected officials, have the responsibility to formulate and to then institute changes to put this important system back on its feet. Just a few short months ago the Congress demonstrated its ability to rise above partisan squabbling by passing a social security reform package. It was not easy, but the job was done and responsible changes were made that will do much to strengthen the system. Now it is time to turn our attention to the medicare program.

With passage of the Tax Equity and Fiscal Responsibility Act (TEFRA), we took the first step toward cost control in the medicare system by introducing prospective payment into the system. Under this new reimbursement system, hospitals will know in advance exactly how much money they will receive from medicare per patient based on the diagnosis of the illness. This plan encourages efficiency and discourages unnecessary spending. A number of States have enacted prospective payment plans and have found them to be most effective in building checks and balances into the system.

Mr. Speaker, the bill that I am introducing today will instill this same check and balance on the supplementary medical insurance portion of the medicare program. Currently, a physician who accepts assignment is solely responsible for the request for reimbursement of services. A standard 1500 form is completed by the physician and submitted to medicare for reimbursement. Physicians are not required to provide a copy of this request for reimbursement to the patient. The only record of the reimbursement provided to the physician by the medicare system is an explanation of benefits form that is mailed to the patient by the medicare office once the physician has received reimbursement. In most instances, the patient does not receive this form until weeks after the services were provided. By this time the patient is hard pressed to recall the details of the treatment. For example, if a patient was under the care of an orthopedic surgeon and required 10 office visits to treat the problem, it is unlikely that weeks later the patient would remember whether he/she saw the physician 7 times or 10 times. Thus, the current law has an open loophole should one decide to squeeze the system. My legislation will simply close this loophole by requiring that any physician or other person furnishing services covered under the system provide a copy of the request for reimbursement to the patient within 10 days after the written request for payment is submitted. In so doing, the patient will be able to review the request for reimbursement.

Mr. Speaker, I know that in the grand scheme of things, this is a minor change at best. However, I am convinced that as we continue to study this very important system in an attempt to insure its solvency, these minor technical changes are an important first step. Therefore, I urge my colleagues to join me in supporting this legislation.

SYRIA'S TRUE GOAL IN MIDDLE EAST—THE DESTRUCTION OF ISRAEL

(Mr. McEWEN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. McEWEN. Mr. Speaker, over the past few weeks we have endured a convulsion of 1-minute speeches urging the removal of the multinational peacekeeping forces from an independent Lebanon.

Now that their removal is imminent, I am sure that these Members of Congress will be interested to hear the report last night on the "CBS Evening News" in which Dan Rather said:

The Soviet Union has moved quickly today to coordinate what one Moscow source called, Soviet-Syrian military policies. The Kremlin announced that a member of its ruling Politburo will make a brief working visit to Damascus next week in recognition of Moscow's great deal at stake in Syria, its military aid, its political influence, and its 5,000 technicians based there.

Perhaps with the collapse of only the second Arab nation to make peace with Israel the Reverend Jesse Jackson and those Members of Congress who have cheered Lebanon's demise will be able before very long to toast Mr. Assad in Syria's ultimate and true goal in the Middle East, the total destruction of Israel.

CONSIDERATION OF A LINE-ITEM VETO AMENDMENT

(Mr. BARTLETT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, at this time I would hope to offer a unanimous-consent request calling for consideration of a line-item veto constitutional amendment.

The Chair has ruled that in order to make this request I must have the clearance of the majority and the minority leaderships. And this request has been cleared by the minority leadership.

I now yield to a spokesman from the majority leadership for appropriate consideration to consider a line-item veto.

Mr. Speaker, I continue to be amazed that I would hear no response. I would not hear one word from the majority leadership to permit this issue to be debated and considered by this floor.

And that lack of response should continue to make it clear to the American people who stands in the way of consideration of a line-item veto and cutting Federal spending. The majority leadership of this House.

I am here to object to continued business as usual, Mr. Speaker, in the face of the pending recession. The next recession will not be caused by monetary policy, not caused by taxes, not caused by business cycles, but caused by the spending policies of this Congress. With the procedure for line-item veto, Congress has the ability to reverse and to reduce those spending policies. And I would suggest that the reduction of the spending policies should at least deserve consideration and debate on the floor of this House.

THE LINE-ITEM VETO—A NECESSARY TOOL

(Mr. RIDGE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. RIDGE. Mr. Speaker, as an enthusiastic supporter of legislation calling for a line-item veto, I rise today to ask the distinguished leadership on the other side of the aisle why the House has not yet had—and reportedly will not have—an opportunity to consider this critically important tool for reducing the size and cost of Government.

Much has been said, Mr. Speaker, but little has been done here on the floor of the House—to control Federal spending, or, to bring down dangerously high deficits that threaten the widespread economic recovery just now getting underway.

Time and time again, each of us has heard our constituents rise at local meetings and plead for restraint—for some responsible leadership—when it comes to spending their hard-earned tax dollars. But time and time again, Mr. Speaker, the leadership of this Congress has turned a deaf ear to those pleas.

The President has called controlling Federal spending one of his most important jobs.

It is, without question, one of his most important jobs. Our Nation's economic survival depends on it. But the President cannot do the job if we do not give him the necessary tools.

The line-item veto is one of those necessary tools. It works in 43 States. And it would work here in Washington—if only the big spending leadership on the other side of the aisle would permit its consideration on the floor of this House.

LEGISLATION AUTHORIZING REIMBURSEMENT TO CITY OF DUCHESNE, UTAH, FOR SERVICES PROVIDED TO CENTRAL UTAH PROJECT

(Mr. NIELSON of Utah asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. NIELSON of Utah. Mr. Speaker, late last session I introduced legislation that would authorize the Secretary of Interior to provide reimbursement to the city of Duchesne, Utah, for public safety services provided by the city to the portion of the central Utah project situated within the city.

At the present time the Bureau of Reclamation has three housing camps within the city limits of Duchesne. There are over 300 people who live in these camps. This represents close to 20 percent of the total population of Duchesne. In addition, there are 91 individuals who are employed by the Bureau of Reclamation and who impact the city but live outside of the city limits. In all there are approximately 813 Bureau personnel and dependents, 31 percent of the population, who impact the city and benefit from the public safety services without significantly contributing to the tax base of Duchesne City.

There are four functions of the public safety services, law enforcement, fire protection, animal control, and administrative, which each of the Bureau personnel directly benefit from, but because they live on Federal lands within the limits of the city they do not pay local taxes. The total amount budgeted for these services in 1984 is $176,423 and the estimated cost for 1985 is $188,679. In addition, the city anticipates the need for street improvements and maintenance this next year at a cost of $86,073. The total cost of providing public safety services and public roads for Federal workers is $81,993 for this budget year and $87,703 for fiscal year 1985.

This represents a significant portion of the city of Duchesne total budget. The people of Duchesne are being forced to pay additional taxes in order to cover the cost of services directly benefiting the large population of Federal workers. The bill I have introduced would permit the Bureau of Reclamation to reimburse the city of Duchesne for the services it provides for over 427 of its personnel and 386 dependents. I feel strongly that the Government has both a moral and a real obligation to reimburse the city of Duchesne for the financial hardships it has created.

Mr. Speaker, I hope that this legislation can move through the legislative process quickly and that the Federal Government will fulfill their obligations to the people of Duchesne. Thank you.

FEDERAL CRIME LEGISLATION

(Mr. HUGHES asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker, last night Members from the other side of the aisle took to the well to applaud a recent editorial in the Washington Post which criticized an unnamed Member of the House for remarks predicting that the crime package just passed by the Senate would not successfully move in the House.

I wish to correct errors in the Post editorial, errors which were repeated by Members on the other side of the aisle.

First, was the confusion of the Senate-passed bill with the Criminal Code revision, on which both Houses of Congress have labored for more than a decade. They are two entirely different matters, covering, for the most part, different matters, and no one reasonably well informed on Federal crime legislation should be suggesting that the recent bill represents Federal Criminal Code revision.

Second, the prediction that the omnibus bill approach to anticrime legislation would not be successful in the House should not have been, but was, interpreted as opposition to the individual measures contained in the Senate package.

The bill passed by the Senate falls under the jurisdiction of perhaps as many as half a dozen House committees; no one knows yet just how many subcommittees. Unless all act favorably on the measure, which is highly unlikly, such a bill is unlikely to come to a vote in the House. This fact, as all Members of this body know, is not partisanship, or obstructionism, but merely reality.

The Senate leadership knows this. Almost all of the major matters in the original Senate package—including bail, sentencing, forfeiture, habeas corpus, exclusionary rule, capital punishment, and tort liability reform—have been, or are being, acted on as separate bills. The one notable exception is one which my colleagues on the other side of the aisle blame us for bottling up—the Justice Assistance Act. In fact, the House passed this bill last May by a vote of 399 to 16. If my House colleagues would prevail upon their counterparts in the other body to also act upon the matter separately, I assure them we could complete a conference and have a bill to the President within days or a few weeks.

THE FEDERAL MONEY MANAGEMENT ACT OF 1984

(Mr. GILMAN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, today, I have introduced the Federal Money Management Act of 1984, H.R. 4837, which requires timely deposits of all funds received by the Federal Government.

The Task Force on Financial Asset Management of the President's Private Sector Survey on Cost Control (PPSSCC) recently reported that $38 billion is being lost annually by the U.S. Government due to poor fiscal management.

Of that sum, many millions of dollars are being lost due to the failure of the U.S. Government to expeditiously deposit all checks received from any source.

The current law allows deposits to be made not later than the 30th day of the month in which they are received. The 291-page Grace report on financial asset management documents the failure of many bureaucracies to observe these guidelines.

While the U.S. Department of the Treasury promises action on ending the practices criticized in the PPSSCC task force report, there is an urgent need to enact this Federal Money Management Act of 1984, mandating prompt bureaucratic efforts in making substantial savings by more timely deposit of checks issued to the Federal Government. This act allows only a 3-day time limit between receipt and deposit, thereby saving taxpayers an estimated, by PPSSCC, $41.5 million and a one-time cash acceleration of $125.4 million.

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues favorable consideration of this proposal and for their review I request that a full text of this bill be inserted at this point in the RECORD.

A bill to require custodians of public money to deposit funds not later than three business days after the date of receipt, and for other purposes

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Federal Money Management Act of 1984".

SEC. 2. Section 3302(c) of title 31, United States Code, is amended by striking out the first sentence and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "A person having custody or possession of public money, including a disbursing official having public money not for current expenditure, shall deposit the money without delay. If deposited with a depositary designated by the Secretary of the Treasury under law, such money shall be deposited not later than the close of the third business day after the date of receipt. If deposited in the Treasury, such money shall be deposited not later than the third day after the date of receipt.".

DEMOCRATS HAVE ABILITY TO PRODUCE LEGISLATION TO REDUCE DEFICITS

(Mr. DAUB asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. DAUB. Mr. Speaker, since the beginning of the 2d session of the 98th Congress we in the House and the American people as well have been treated to a series of denunciations by the majority of the deficits contained in President Reagan's 1985 budget.

When I hear the impassioned oratory of these men and women inveighing against deficit spending I smell the same scent of hypocrisy as when Playboy magazine attacks sexism. Just as Hugh Hefner parts with a few of the many dollars he has made exploiting women in order to gain the sympathy of those who have come to believe that exploitation is wrong, the Democrats in the House now seek to convince Americans who fear the deficit that they are in the vanguard of those who seek to reduce it.

But just as Hugh Hefner continues to print centerfolds the Democrats continue to spend money. These 1-minute speeches provide Republicans with a rare opportunity to address issues that the majority refuses to consider in committee or as legislation. The majority who take the well to decry the deficit do not suffer these restrictions.

Let me put it to you now. You control the most important committees in the House by a better than 2-to-1 margin. When you have a mind to do so, legislation can be brought to this floor overnight. So instead of talk I invite you to return to the committees that you so overwhelmingly control and come back with answers. Let us see some budgets that reduce these deficits. Let us see where you would reduce spending. Where you would increase taxes. Even more than the President of the United States, you in the majority have the ability to produce a budget bill quickly and see it through the House.

I invite you to add actions to your words.

THE LINE-ITEM VETO AND A BALANCED BUDGET AMENDMENT

(Mr. PACKARD asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. PACKARD. Mr. Speaker, I am having a real problem understanding why our Democratic leaders will not even consider bringing up a balanced budget amendment this year. Every single day I get letters from my constituents about our inability to balance our budget, and what can I tell them? The only answer I can possibly give them is that the Democrats refuse to bring this to the floor. Oh, my colleagues on the other side of the aisle may cry and wring their hands about how our President has the largest deficit in the history of this great country, but do they honestly want a balanced budget? Of course not. Their silence speaks the real truth.

Let us give the President the tools he really needs to balance the budget—the line-item veto and a balanced budget amendment.

THE BUDGET DEFICIT

(Mr. SILJANDER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SILJANDER. Mr. Speaker, the onus of the infamous budget deficit has been placed on the shoulders of President Ronald Reagan by the majority party in Congress. So, as a result, I see only two options: First, we can carry on business as usual, waiting until the tail end of the session on Sunday midnight, when Monday the entire Government goes bankrupt, and force compromises busting the budget; or, second, we could give Ronald Reagan the authority he is requesting, a line-item veto to begin bringing the budget deficits into line.

And if, after the authority is given the President, the budget is experiencing $180 billion to $200 billion deficits, then the responsibility certainly squarely fits on his shoulders.

Now, to those of you who are fearful of constitutional amendments, consider the option of giving specific authority in each budget bill to allow the President to deal with the line-item veto.

Rather than passing the blame, let us give opportunity for positive constructive changes to help America move once again and deal with this great problem of budget deficits.

EQUAL COMMITTEE REPRESENTATION FOR THE MINORITY

(Mr. DANNEMEYER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Speaker, this morning I have been advised by the Democratic leadership that they will bring up a motion to add Members on their side to the Committees on Education and Labor, and Foreign Affairs.

This Member from California intends to offer a motion to commit to that resolution so as to give to the House the opportunity of participating in a debate on the issue of whether or not we in the minority have been afforded equal representation consistent with our total membership in the House on all of the committees of the House, not just the Committee on Education and Labor and the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Under the rules of the House, on a motion to commit this Member would have no time to discuss the matter. I am at the mercy of my distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Arkansas, who will handle the matter for the majority. He has said he will give me equality of time. I asked the gentleman how much time he intends to take and he said maybe 2 minutes.

I would hope that in the bottom of his heart he can find some concern for minorities and perhaps expand the time. Under the rules, he has 1 hour on his resolution. I would ask that we each have half an hour, but I am here with my hat in my hand asking, Give me what you will, because we need to discuss this issue so the American people can find out how the minority has been adversely treated here in the House of Representatives.

DEAD ON ARRIVAL

(Mr. GINGRICH asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New Jersey seemed concerned that some of us had used the Washington Post editorial about a bill coming over from the other body being dead on arrival.

Let me suggest that for a number of us there is a feeling that the Committee on the Judiciary has become Death Valley; that prayer in school has been in there for 20-some years and does not quite get out; that the bankruptcy bill does not quite get out; that the criminal revision will not quite get out.

So for those of us who may be looking at the historical track record of 18 years of working on criminal reform, over 20 years of working on prayer in school, we would appreciate very much a commitment by that committee to have a schedule to report out a bill and to have a commitment from the Democratic leadership to bring those bills to the floor.

I hope the gentleman from New Jersey, looking at the historical record, can appreciate why we believe the Washington Post when they quoted him as saying that the bill was dead on arrival.

FREEDOM TO PRAY

(Mr. FIELDS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker, many of us have recited many times from very meaningful words, our Pledge of Allegiance, and it goes:

> I pledge allegiance to the flag of the United States of America. And to the republic for which it stands, one nation under God, indivisible, and with liberty and justice for all.

With that pledge, I joined more than 220 million Americans who have repeated it countless times in confirming our commitment to this country. Now I must ask the question of my colleagues on the other side of the aisle: Where is this Nation? I believe that this is a nation under God, just as we recite in our pledge.

But I have to also ask the compatible question: What do my colleagues believe in? I think many of them must believe in a court ruling that denies millions of American public schoolchildren the chance to pray to their God. I just hope, Mr. Speaker, that the next time these Members are at a sporting event or at a townhall meeting or town meeting and they recite the Pledge of Allegiance that they remember that this country was founded upon a belief in a Supreme Being and not on a belief in a Supreme Court.

I urge my colleagues to cosponsor and support House Joint Resolution 100 to permit voluntary school prayer.

ELECTION OF MEMBERS TO STANDING COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I offer a privileged resolution (H. Res. 436) and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

H. RES. 436

Resolved, That the following named Members be, and they are hereby, elected to the following standing committees of the House of Representatives:

Committee on Education and Labor: Dennis E. Eckart, Ohio, and Timothy J. Penny, Minnesota;

Committee on Foreign Affairs: Robert Garcia, New York.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MOAKLEY). The gentleman from Arkansas (Mr. ALEXANDER) is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, this resolution is very simple and I will not take long to explain it. It merely authorizes the reappointment of the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. ECKART) to the Committee on Education and Labor for 1 year; the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. PENNY) to the Committee on Education and Labor for 1 year; and the gentleman from New York (Mr. GARCIA) to the Committee on Foreign Affairs for 1 year.

Under the rules, temporary appointments can only be made for 1 year. All three of these gentlemen have temporary appointments to these two committees. This resolution merely reappoints these three gentlemen to these two committees for 1 additional year, under the rules. It does not change the ratios that were adopted by the 98th Congress. It does not in any way affect the rules that were adopted by the 98th Congress. It merely complies with the rules.

I understand from a previous announcement by my good friend, the gentleman from California (Mr. DANNEMEYER), that he intends to offer a resolution to recommit this resolution in order to protest the rules that have already been adopted by the 98th Congress.

I will simply state that the 98th Congress has already adopted the ratios that establish the membership of the various committees. That matter has already been debated by this House. It has been voted upon, and, by a majority vote, approved by this body.

In addition to the action by the House, on an action brought before the Federal courts which was taken to the court of appeals, as well as to the Supreme Court of the United States, was brought about by the gentleman from California (Mr. DANNEMEYER) and others, on April 23, 1981. The U.S. District Court in the District of Columbia, accepting the jurisdiction over the rules of the House of Representatives, refused to take action upon the petition of the gentleman from California and others, stating that the matter had been properly resolved by action of the House of Representatives and that the matter was concluded. Subsequent appeals to higher courts, indeed to the Supreme Court, affirmed the decision of the lower courts.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to include extraneous matter in the RECORD which includes the committee ratios adopted by the 98th Congress as set forth by the actions of this Congress, together with two examples explaining those ratios. It is important to note that the committee ratios on the committees in question have always favored the majority—even in the Congress in which the House was controlled by the Republican Party.

I ask further unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, to include in the RECORD a letter dated November 17, 1983, which was forwarded to the Republican colleagues of the House by the gentleman from California (Mr. DANNEMEYER) and others explaining the tactics which are proposed to disrupt the proceedings of this House, which is illustrated by the gentleman from California.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the requests of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

[1] Committee did not exist in 80th and 83d Congresses.
[2] Includes delegates in House totals but not on committee ratios.

EXAMPLE: WAYS AND MEANS COMMITTEE

In the 98th Congress, the Democratic Party won 62.3 percent of all House seats, but took 65.7 percent of the seats on the Ways and Means Committee, or only 3.4 percent more than the Democratic House percentage.

Compare this with the actions of the Republican Party. When last the Republicans controlled the House (the 82rd Congress, in 1953) their percentage of total House membership was 51.2 percent. Nevertheless, the Republicans claimed 60 percent of the seats on Ways and Means. This was 8.8 percent more than their House percentage—more than twice the excess percentage taken by the Democratic Party in this 98th Congress.

In reality, those who are now crying "Unfair" were more than twice as "unfair" when last they organized the House.

What we have done is not to be "unfair" to the Republicans, but rather to assure that the Democratic Party has working control of certain key committees in this Congress—control without which the House majority, be it Democrat or Republican, simply could not function.

EXAMPLE: RULES COMMITTEE

In the 98th Congress, the Democratic Party won 62.3 percent of all House seats, but took 69.2 percent of the seats on the Rules Committee, or 6.9 percent more than the Democratic House percentage.

What did the Republican Party do when it organized the Rules Committee? In the 80th Congress (1947), the Republican membership on the Rules Committee exceeded their House percentage by 10.1 percent compared to our 6.9 percent in the 98th Congress. And, in the Republican 83rd Congress, Republican membership on Rules exceeded their House percentage by 15.5 percent.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., November 17, 1983.

DEAR REPUBLICAN COLLEAGUE: The Constitution of the United States places within the jurisdiction of Congress the power to "determine the Rules of its Proceedings." U.S. Constitution, Art. I, Sec. 5, cl. 2. Pursuant to this power, the House of Representatives has provided by rule that the 22 standing committees in the House shall be elected by the Representatives at the commencement of each Congress from nominations submitted by the respective party caucuses.

From the end of World War I until 1970, the rule of thumb in the House of Representatives had been that committee ratios would be proportional to party membership in the entire House. Supreme Court decisions decided during that period in the area of voter equality (i.e. Baker v. Carr, Reynolds v. Sims) seemed to reinforce this proportionally standard for House committee and subcommittee appointments.

Beginning in 1971, however, the Democratic majority in the House, through its caucus, voted to create an extra working margin of two-to-one on many of the major committees and subcommittees. At first, Republicans had only one-third of the seats in the 94th and 95th Congresses, and thus the new House committee ratios closely corresponded to Republican representation in the House as a whole.

Yet, beginning in the 96th Congress when GOP representation in the House rose to 36.3 percent, the effects of the two-to-one "extra working margin" became more evident. Republicans found themselves with 15 less seats on standing committees than they would have obtained had committee seats been allocated proportionally according to full House party membership. The Democratic Caucus of the 96th Congress extended the "extra working margin" concept to subcommittee as well, and hence the Republicans received 58 less subcommittee seats than a proportional system of representation would have dictated. On Febrary 13, 1980, all 160 Republican Members sent a letter of protest to Speaker of the House Tip O'Neill, which resulted in no remedial action.

As a result of the 1980 congressional elections for the 97th Congress, Republican Members garnered 44.1 percent of the seats of the House of Representatives and the Democrats held 55.86 percent of the House seats. After such a significant gain by the Republicans, many were willing to believe that the House might return to the committee allocation system of the 1921-1971 era. Yet, after the dust cleared, Republicans found themselves 30 less full committee seats and 37 less subcommittee seats than proportional allocation according to party membership would have indicated (see Appendix A). Although the Democrats represented 55.86 percent of House membership, they granted themselves 65.71 percent of the seats on the Committee on Ways & Means, 68.75 percent of the seats on the Appropriations Committee, and 60 percent of the seats on the Budget Committee.

The importance of such inequitable allocation of seats is underscored by the fact that in 1981-82 there were 43 committee votes decided by a voting margin equal to, or smaller than, the number of seats Republicans claimed they were deprived of on these committees. Republicans voted as a bloc in 26 instances, and these votes most likely would have been reversed had Republicans been allocated seats in a fair manner (see Appendix B).

The Republicans were thus left with five options: (1) to accept their fate, thus compounding the problem, (2) to protest again, which had already been done in 1980 to no avail, (3) to obstruct House proceedings and try to bring increased attention to the problem as well as to gain leverage in committees and subcommittees, (4) to take their case to the people through the election arena, and (5) to take their case to court.

On July 23, 1981, fourteen Republican Representatives brought legal action against the elected Democratic leadership in the United States District Court in the District of Columbia knowing that this was a long-shot alternative. The D.C. District Court dismissed the case citing its reluctance to stick its head into legislative affairs. The Circuit Court of Appeals, although holding that the court system did have jurisdiction over the Rules of the House, dismissed the case citing that there was not sufficient injury involved! Lawyers interested in seeing an example of an extreme case of waffling by a court need merely look at the opinions of the Circuit Court which is bereft of any principled rationale or succinct legal analysis. The U.S. Supreme Court recently denied certiorari.

What the Democrats have been saying to us is that we still should be able to field a competitive team despite the fact that we are missing our designated hitter on offense and centerfielder on defense. The Democrats are not the only ones to utilize this philosophy. In Iron Curtain countries such as Albania, Bulgaria, Poland and the USSR, committee memberships are not proportional to membership of the entire legislative bodies. In every western world country, and in the U.S. Senate but not the U.S. House, committee memberships accurately reflect the overall political divisions.

Organization of the 98th Congress, like the 97th, has resulted in an enormous Republican deprivation of committee and subcommittee seats. Republicans have been shorted 24 committee and 37 subcommittee seats in this session (see Appendix C).

In turn, if we are to do anything to remedy this problem, rather than just lying in the grave, the only alternatives we have left are (3) obstruction of House proceedings, and (4) taking the case to the people.

The end that we seek to achieve shoud be something that is meaningful to the public, i.e.: (1) continuing appropriation measures should be clean—not Christmas trees; (2) consideration by House of concurrent budget resolution which will reflect spending reductions advocated by Grace Commission—about $80 billion per year; (3) the proposed constitutional amendment to balance the budget should be on the floor for a vote; (4) the constitutional amendment on school prayer should be on the floor for a vote; (5) the constitutional amendment on abortion should be on the floor for a vote; (6) proposed reforms on bankruptcy, criminal law, immigration and enterprize zones should come to the floor for a vote; (7) proxy voting on committees should be eliminated; (8) verbation, transcripts and records of congressional proceedings, and (9) committee and subcommittee ratios should be consistent with the division in the full House as it was precised in November 1982.

Given these facts and the tremendous significance of the problem here presented, we would like to request that you join us in the effort to obstruct House proceedings at the beginning of the Second Session and thus bring these important issues to a vote and or a resolution in the 98th Congress. Exhibit D contains a list that is not exclusive. If you would like to help in this effort, please call Don Eberly, Director of the Repubican Study Committee at 5-0587.

Sincerely,

Jerry Solomon, Newt Gingrich, Dan Crane, John Kasich, Connie Mack, Ron Packard, Don Ritter, Bill Dannemeyer, Tommy Hartnett, Dan Lungren, Bob Walker, David Dreier, Norm Shumway, Denny Smith.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Under the rules, I am allowed 1 hour. This matter has been debated extensively in the past weeks. It is discussed during the 1-minute period and during special orders almost every day. The Members have had ample opportunity to know the scope and the depth of the proposal which will be offered by the gentleman from California. I do not see the merits in taking a lot of time on this. In fairness I do want to afford the gentleman from California ample time, and because of his impassioned and eloquent statement a minute ago, I will not adhere to my statement that I will give him equal time. I will yield 5 minutes to the gentleman in order to discuss his motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Arkansas (Mr. ALEXANDER) has consumed 4 minutes.

The gentleman from California (Mr. DANNEMEYER) is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for the dispensation.

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRY

Mr. Speaker, I have a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Speaker, I have a motion to commit with respect to the resolution offered by the gentleman from Arkansas. At what point in the process is it appropriate for me to offer the motion to commit?

□ 1150

The SPEAKER pro tempore. After the previous question has been ordered or moved.

Mr. DANNEMEYER. At that point I may offer the motion to commit?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Speaker, how much time under the rules would this gentleman from California have to discuss the motion to commit, if any?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the previous question is ordered, the gentleman from California would not have any time to debate the motion.

Mr. DANNEMEYER. So, Mr. Speaker, as a practical matter, the only time this gentleman from California would have to talk about this issue is the time the gentleman from Arkansas has given me right now?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the Chair for the indication of where we are.

Mr. Speaker, initially let me say that we in the minority party of the House are pursuing this issue of malapportionment of committee ratios not just because of the slots on the committees on which we seek proper representation. To put that in perspective, in the 98th Congress we Republicans have been shorted 22 slots on full committees and 37 slots on subcommittees.

Our goal is to bring this matter to the floor of the House for consideration and a rollcall vote in order to establish accountability to the American people on the major issues of the day such as prayer in public schools, a balanced budget in the form of a proposed constitutional amendment, the issue of human rights, the proposed constitutional amendment dealing with the decision of Roe against Wade, the issue of immigration reform that this country badly needs, the issue of bankruptcy law, and the issue of criminal law. Those are the issues that we think we have a responsibility to bring to the floor of this House and debate and have a rollcall vote on so that the American people will, with that rollcall vote on those issues, be able to assess who is accountable in this institution for stopping legislation the people want or helping legislation the people want.

We believe that that accountability is what politics is all about in America, that one party proposes, another party opposes, people have a record vote, and that lays the foundation for the November election so that candidates around the country, challengers and incumbents, will have the privilege and the responsibility of pointing out where the incumbent Member in this instance has voted wrong or inconsistent with the voters of that district.

That is why we are pursuing this matter. It is not just the slots in and of themselves that we seek.

To show the inequity that is taking place in this whole issue, in 1982, in November, Republican candidates for Congress around the country received 43.2 percent of the vote all over the country. Because of the vagaries of reapportionment in the 50 States of the Union, we ended up with 38 percent of the membership of the entire House. With 43 percent of the vote nationally, we ended up with 38 percent of the Members of the House of Representatives, specifically 167 out of 435.

The Democratic majority has exclusive control over this matter since they have 62 percent or 267 Members on their side. And one of the amazing things about this whole process is that the Democratic Party leadership has over the last several decades made an eloquent defense of civil rights of minorities in America. I have to ask, in the face of that protestation of respect for minority rights, what in the world has ever caused the majority Democrats in this House to deviate to the point of what they have done to we Republicans, the minority in the House, and do what they have done to us?

I ask, "Why do you dislike Republicans so much? What have we done to you? We bathe regularly, most of us shave, we conduct ourselves in a proper manner, and we wear suits and ties. What is it about us that you dislike?"

And I have to say that "what I have to conclude is that you don't like the proposals that we make for the American public. We stand here in the well of the House and we say we want this House to vote on a proposed constitutional amendment to require the Federal Government to have a balanced budget, and you are stopping that issue day after day from coming into existence."

And we ask, "Why do you do that? That is why we want the representation on the Judiciary Committee. You have shorted us on the Judiciary Committee in this Congress one slot."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from California (Mr. DANNEMEYER) has expired.

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the gentleman from Arkansas will yield to me for a moment?

Mr. ALEXANDER. No; I do not yield, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. LEVITAS).

Mr. LEVITAS. Mr. Speaker, as I understand the proposition that is being made by the Republicans, it is that there should be a more proportionate Republican membership on committees to reflect the results of the election in 1982 in terms of the respective percentage of Republican votes and Democratic votes. If that proposition is correct, then I have a proposition for my colleagues on the other side, which I am sure they cannot refuse. It is based on the principle that what is fair for one is fair for the other, or what is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander.

Democrats, then, should have a proportionate number of judges and Cabinet members and other Presidential appointees in the agencies to reflect the percentage of Republican and Democratic votes in the results of the Presidential election, which was a lot closer than the congressional election in 1982.

What is fair is fair.

If they will implement my proposal to them, I will support theirs.

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I will conclude the debate at this point.

Mr. DANNEMEYER. That is unfortunate.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I will conclude this debate by reading an excerpt from a letter that the gentleman from California (Mr. DANNEMEYER) wrote to his Republican colleagues which I think clearly states the purpose and the intent of the motion to commit which the gentleman from California (Mr. DANNEMEYER) intends to offer following my conclusion of this debate. It says, and I quote:

> We would like to request that you—
> The Republican colleagues—
> join us in the effort to obstruct House proceedings at the beginning of the second session and thus bring these important issues to a vote and/or a resolution in the 98th Congress.

Mr. Speaker, it should be clear that the intent of the motion of the gentleman from California is clearly dilatory and aimed at obstructing the regular proceedings of the House.

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, I would point out that some 140 bills have been passed by the House of Representatives during the first session of the 98th Congress and are now pending in the other body, the scheduling procedures of which are controlled by the Republican majority. I would suggest to the gentleman and his associates, who have joined him in this questionable venture, that if they are mystified by the procedures by which bills come to the floor of a legislative body, they are the leadership of their own party which is now sitting on 140 pieces of legislation which have already passed this House.

Mr. Speaker, I have no need for further time. I do not yield further time to debate this matter, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I do not yield, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the previous question is ordered on the resolution.

There was no objection.

MOTION TO COMMIT OFFERED BY MR. DANNEMEYER

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to commit.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the motion to commit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. DANNEMEYER, moves to commit House Resolution 436 to the Committee on Rules with instructions to report the resolution back to the House forthwith with the following amendment: At the end of the resolution strike out the period and insert in lieu thereof the following:

": Provided, That this resolution shall not take effect until the majority membership of each standing committee of the House, except the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct, is constituted with its membership in a ratio which is proportionate to the membership of the two political parties in the House as a whole."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the previous question is ordered on the motion to commit.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion to commit offered by the gentleman from California (Mr. DANNEMEYER).

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. DANNEMEYER) there were—yeas 13, nays 16.

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 153, nays 237, not voting 43, as follows:

FURTHER MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A further message from the Senate, by Mr. Sparrow, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed with an amendment in which the concurrence of the House is requested, a concurrent resolution of the House of the following title:

H. Con. Res. 255. Concurrent resolution providing for an adjournment of the House from February 9 to 21, 1984, and an adjournment of the Senate from February 9 or February 10 to February 20, 1984.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 1787. An act to establish a National Drug Enforcement Policy Board.

CONFERENCE REPORT ON S. 1340, REHABILITATION ACT AMENDMENTS

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the Senate bill (S. 1340) to revise and extend the Rehabilitation Act of 1973 and to extend the Developmental Disability Assistance and Bill of Rights Act, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the rule, the conference report is considered as having been read.

(For conference report and statement, see proceedings of the House of February 6, 1984.)

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. PERKINS) will be recognized for 30 minutes and the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. ERLENBORN) will be recognized for 30 minutes.

□ 1220

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, this conference report on S. 1340 contains amendments to the Rehabilitation Act of 1973 and the Developmental Disabilities and Bill of Rights Act.

The Rehabilitation Act of 1973 is the largest Federal program focused on helping disabled Americans to become more productive citizens. When I first came to Congress in 1949, there was no large program of assistance. It was not until 1953 that we were able to achieve enactment of an expanded Vocational Rehabilitation Act.

During all my years in Congress one of my greatest satisfactions has been to work on improving that program and watching it grow so that today it serves approximately 1 million Americans. All evaluations show that vocational rehabilitation is an extremely cost-effective program returning $11 to the Treasury for every dollar of expenditure.

The conference report we are bringing to you today further improves this program. First, and most importantly, we increase the funds for basic State grants from $943.9 million authorized for fiscal 1983 to $1.038 billion for fiscal 1984, to $1.117 billion for fiscal 1985 and $1.203 billion for fiscal 1986.

This means a 9.9-percent increase from fiscal 1983 to fiscal 1984, 7.7 percent from 1984 to 1985, and 7.7 percent from 1985 to 1986.

I am extremely pleased that we were able to achieve these substantial increases for vocational rehabilitation. I know we face enormous deficits, but these expenditures will be returned to the Treasury many times over in terms of reduced unemployment compensation, reduced disability payments, and fewer food stamps. We can make no better investment.

The vocational rehabilitation program is also improved in this conference report:

First, by having the basic State program automatically extended to fiscal 1987 if Congress takes no adverse action. This provision will bring additional stability to the program.

Second, by extending all the discretionary programs from fiscal 1984 to fiscal 1986. These programs provide the essential training and research components of vocational rehabilitation.

Third, by improving these discretionary programs by targeting the training grants on areas where there are shortages of personnel and by broadening the research and training centers to deal with both particular and multiple disabilities.

Fourth, by requiring performance standards to judge the success of the programs.

Fifth, by strengthening client assistance through requiring each State to have such a program by September 30, 1985. Those States now receiving, or having in the past received, section 112 client assistance funds through their regular vocational rehabilitation agency may continue to administer this client program in that manner if the Governor designates this agency. Other States must have a separate agency operate their newly required client assistance programs, and Sixth, by placing the Helen Keller National Center for Deaf-Blind Youth and Adults on a firmer footing through creating a separate authority for the center.

Mr. Speaker, this conference report will improve the lives of many disabled Americans, and I would like to commend our colleague, AUSTIN MURPHY, chairman of the Subcommittee on Select Education, for his leadership in achieving these gains. We are all indebted to Mr. MURPHY and his subcommittee members.

As fine as this conference report is in the area of vocational rehabilitation, it is enormously deficient in other areas where the House of Representatives tried to improve the Nation's basic education and domestic programs. The House conferees on this bill tried and tried, but we were completely unsuccessful in securing improvements in these other programs.

The Members recall that the budget resolution for fiscal 1984 called for increases in funding of basic education and domestic programs. This resolution was approved by both the House of Representatives and the Senate.

In order to implement the resolution, the Committee on Education and Labor added amendments to the bill reauthorizing the Rehabilitation Act. We had to do this because the so-called Gramm-Latta budget caps adopted in 1981 severely restricted spending for education and other areas.

We provided: $3.83 billion for the chapter 1 program for disadvantaged children; $505 million for impact aid; $825 million for vocational education; $112 million for adult education; $273.9 million for arts and humanities; $10.8 million for museum services; $398 million for the community services block grant; $2.25 billion for low-income energy assistance; $1.36 billion for the women, infants, and children (WIC) feeding program; $1.5 billion for education of the handicapped; $28 million for the National Technical Institute for the Deaf.

On September 13 the House approved those amendments by a vote of 283 to 124, showing clearly that spending for these areas should be increased in accordance with the budget resolution. The Senate had already passed a companion bill reauthorizing vocational rehabilitation, but without any amendments raising the authorization ceilings for other programs. So, the House asked for a conference with the Senate.

The Senate refused to go to conference with us for months and months.

I tried and tried to go to conference with the Senate. I wrote to the chairman of the Senate committee asking for a conference. I had my staff contact his staff. And there was no response.

After 2 months of trying, I finally joined our majority leader, JIM WRIGHT, in offering an amendment to the second continuing resolution to provide the funding for these programs which our amendments to the vocational rehabilitation bill had authorized. Again, the House approved these funds by a vote of 224 to 189.

We provided: $3.645 billion for chapter 1; $812.8 million for vocational education; $112 million for adult education; $382.3 million for the community services block grant; $2.07 billion for low-income energy assistance; $1.357 billion for education of the handicapped; $1.037 billion for vocational rehabilitation; $145 million for immigrant education; $570 million for college work-study; $380 million for supplemental opportunity grants; $347 million for community health centers; $28 million for National Technical Institute for the Deaf; $3.559 billion for job training; $34 million for Gallaudet College; $10 million for emergency shelter for the homeless; $150 million for child nutrition. But again the Senate frustrated the will of the House.

This time at least the Senate had to agree to a conference committee; otherwise, the Government would have come to a halt without a continuing resolution. But the Senate conferees would only accept 10 percent of the increased funding we approved. Ten cents on the dollar. And no funds at all for compensatory education, vocational education. Low-income energy assistance, the WIC program, or school lunch programs.

And let me remind the House that all the increases we asked for were well within the budget resolution; and they were mostly meant to repair part of the harm, and only part of the harm, caused to education and nutrition by the cutbacks of the last 3 years.

Having lost on the continuing resolution, we tried again to go to conference with the Senate on the vocational rehabilitation bill. And the Senate again refused.

Finally, the Senate appointed conferees in February and agreed to a conference. This was 5 months after the House has passed its bill.

At the Senate-House conference I brought up the amendments calling for increases in education and domestic programs.

I brought up the increase for vocational education. The response was "we won't discuss that." I brought up the immigrant education program. The response was "we won't discuss that." I brought up the low-income energy assistance program, but we got no where.

I tried and tried, but the House conferees had no choice in light of the Senate's obstinance. If we wanted any conference report, we had to yield, and so we did.

I am sorely disappointed. I hope we can find another way to increase these funds.

I would like to make a point with respect to one particular program not included in the conference report, the special impact aid for immigrant children. Although the conferees did not accept the 3-year authorization for this program included in the House bill, the program was authorized, and a $30 million appropriation made, in the continuing resolution for fiscal year 1984 (H.J. Res. 413). Thus, the program should be operational this year, and I urge the Department of Education to move expeditiously to implement it. Moreover, the program is to be considered an applicable program for purposes of the General Education Provisions Act, just like any other program administered by the Secretary of Education.

The only positive accomplishment we gained in this conference on S. 1340 was that the vocational rehabilitation program realized solid increases in funding, because the opponents of these other programs suggested that increase only. The appropriation for vocational rehabilitation is already 9.9 percent higher for fiscal 1984 because we secured that increase in the final conference report on the second continuing resolution. It will be raised another 7.7 percent in fiscal 1985 and another 7.7 in fiscal 1986 as a result of this conference report before us today.

We should be as proud of that accomplishment as we are ashamed of our defeats in improving education and nutrition.

Mr. ERLENBORN. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to make some observations on the conference report for S. 1340, the Rehabilitation Act Amendments of 1984. The amendments represent a reauthorization effort to improve and expand the Rehabilitation Act originally passed by Congress in 1921. The House and the other body discussed and resolved 45 points of difference between their respective bills. The conference report reflects this resolution.

I shall comment on three areas in the conference report: the reauthorization of the State grant program; the authorization levels for discretionary programs; and the elimination of title IV and title V from the conference agreement.

The State grant program reauthorized by the Rehabilitation Act Amendments of 1984, provides assistance to State Vocational Rehabilitation Agencies which help handicapped individuals to receive training and support services so that they may join the American work force, lead more independent lives, and participate more fully in their communities. The 1984 amendment increase the allotments States would receive for fiscal year 1984 by 10 percent over the fiscal year 1983 appropriation, to $1,037.8 billion. The 1984 amendments would increase the State allotments for fiscal year 1985 and fiscal year 1986 by an inflation factor based on the Consumer Price Index for urban consumers (CPI-U); however, the total funds that could be made available for the State grant program could not exceed $1,117.5 billion in fiscal year 1985, and $1,203.2 billion in fiscal year 1986. These caps would allow a growth rate of 7.7 percent each year. The amendments allow an automatic extension of 1 year for fiscal year 1987 with an increase based on the CPI-U. These authorization levels represent a midpoint between the original authorization levels in H.R. 3520 and those adopted by the other body.

The State grant program over its 63-year history has had strong bipartisan support, due in large measure to its cost-effectiveness. Since its central focus is promoting employment of handicapped individuals, it helps reduce the dependence of handicapped individuals on Federal income maintenance programs, once such persons are rehabilitated and employed. For example, on the average, for every rehabilitation dollar invested on a handicapped individual, that person's earning power increases by $10. On the average, the cost of a rehabilitation is returned in 4 years, through local, State and Federal taxes paid by a rehabilitated, employed handicapped individual. The authorization levels for State grants in S. 1340 are viewed as further support for the investment potential of the rehabilitation program.

S. 1340 also reauthorizes the multiple discretionary programs under the Rehabilitation Act for 3 years, fiscal year 1984 through fiscal year 1986. These programs provide Federal dollars for research in rehabilitation, training of rehabilitation personnel, collaborative agreements with industry to promote on the job training and employment of handicapped individuals, independent living programs, and several other activities. The authorization levels adopted for these multiple programs are highly variable. For example, when fiscal year 1984 authorization levels are compared with fiscal year 1983 appropriations, the increases range from a zero-percent increase to a 246-percent increase. Although the variability in authorization levels for fiscal year 1985 over fiscal year 1984 is less dramatic, it ranges from 5 percent to 23 percent. Similarly when the fiscal year 1986 levels are compared with fiscal year 1985 levels the range is 4.8 percent to 15 percent. Such variability may raise questions not only related to a failure to contain costs and help reduce the Federal deficit, but also the neglect of funding equity across program categories.

The House bill, H.R. 3520 contained a title IV and title V not contained in the bill of the other body. Title IV increased the authorization of appropriations for: Chapter 1 of the Education Consolidation and Improvement Act of 1981; the Impact Aid Program (Public Law 81-815); the Vocational Education Act of 1963; the Adult Education Act, the National Foundation on Arts and Humanities Act of 1965; the Museum Services Act; the Community Services Block Grant Act; the Low Income Energy Assistance Act of 1981; the Supplemental Food Program for Women, Infants, and Children under section 17 of the Child Nutrition Act; the Education of the Handicapped Act; and the National Technical Institute for the Deaf Act.

If title IV had been adopted as part of the conference report, these several programs would have had their respective authorization ceilings increased by about $1.6 billion. These programs have nothing directly to do with the rehabilitation of handicapped individuals.

Title V of H.R. 3520 authorized funds for school districts with more than 500 immigrant children. Since the numbers of legal and illegal alien children in the public schools is unknown, the projected costs for this new program ranged from $500 million to $2 billion.

The conferees agreed to drop both titles IV and V from the House bill, thus removing two significant barriers to the speedy adoption of the conference report on S. 1340.

I urge my colleagues to vote for the conference report. The integrity of the Rehabilitation Act has been preserved. Particularly through the reauthorization of the State grant program we will continue to promote employment of handicapped individuals. Such an endorsement is not incompatible with our interest in reducing the Federal deficit and our commitment to a full economic recovery.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. MURPHY).

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my chairman, CARL PERKINS, for his commitment to bringing the rehabilitation reauthorization bill to conference and to seeing that we reached agreement with the Senate. The 1 million handicapped persons who are receiving services under this act should be aware that Chairman Perkins kept their interests foremost when very difficult decisions had to be made in order to reach agreement in conference.

S. 1340 is an excellent piece of legislation to build upon for the next 3 years and beyond. We have provided increases in funding to begin to restore the losses due to inflation and cuts in SSI and SSDI rehabilitation moneys. Because the State grant entitlement is authorized at $1,037,800,000, we will be seeking a supplemental appropriation of $34 million to meet the entitlement this year. For fiscal year 1985 and 1986, the entitlement is to be set by increases in the cost of living for the previous fiscal year. As in the House adopted bill, and an additional authorization for State grants permits funding above the cost of living increase. The total amount that may be appropriated for both the entitlement and the additional authorization, however, is set at $1,117,500,000 in fiscal year 1985 and $1,203,200,000 in fiscal year 1986. I want to assure my colleagues that this provision maintains the compromise approach adopted on the House floor to eliminate any inconsistency with budget act requirements on funding of entitlements in outyears.

The House bill contained a 5-year reauthorization for State grants and the Senate bill a 3-year reauthorization. The conference agreement provides that there will be an automatic extension of funding for a fourth year if the program is not reauthorized prior to September 30, 1986, the amount authorized for the entitlement in the fourth year would be the fiscal year 1986 level increased by the Consumer Price Index for all urban consumers in the previous fiscal year.

The cost effectiveness of this program has historically brought it unified bipartisan support. It is essential that the data that documents the program's effectiveness and its impact on the lives of rehabilitation clients continues to be available. The conference agreement mandates the collection of individual client data. The conferees are further in agreement that the commissioner of RSA shall continue to collect the information contained in the "annual vocational rehabilitation program/cost report," RSA reporting form RSA-2, which has been critical to the effective management of rehabilitation agencies.

The agreement reached on the client assistance program recognizes demonstrated benefits to both State rehabilitation agencies and to their client when a third party is available to mediate differences and facilitate the process of rehabilitation. The successful experience of existing client assistance projects, which have been administered in a variety of settings through a demonstration project grant authority, justifies a change to a State grant formula program. In every State, the Governor, with the advice of those knowledgeable about the rehabilitation process and about the needs and services available to persons with handicaps, will choose a placement for the client assistance program. In States where a client assistance project is now or has been administered within an agency providing rehabilitation services, the Governor may choose to continue that placement. In all other States, the Governor is required to place the program outside of any agency providing rehabilitation services under this act.

I would like to clarify at this point that the conferees intended that the term "handicapped individuals," as used in this section, refer to all persons who are handicapped and is not intended to be limited to persons eligible for services under titles I and III of this act. The comprehensive evaluation of the client assistance program required by the conference agreement is to include information on all handicapped persons served by the client assistance program. By providing information on the program's operation in a variety of settings, this evaluation is expected to provide a sound basis for decisions concerning its reauthorization in 1986.

The conference agreement includes a number of additional provisions intended to provide information to both Congress and the administration for the next reauthorization of the act, as well as information to assist both the administration and appropriations committees in their funding requests and decisions. For the first time, standards are rquired for the evaluation of all programs under the act. In the csse of independent living centers and projects with industry, such standards must be developed by February 1, 1985, and an evaluation based on those standards completed by February 1, 1986. The conference agreement also requires the Commissioner of RSA to gather and provide accurate information on rehabilitation personnel shortages to justify the allocation of training funds. The conferees recognize that it is essential to maintain and upgrade the skills of presently employed personnel, as well as to increase the number of personnel in shortage areas, in order to meet current and projected vocational rehabilitation needs. The Commissioner's report on personnel shortages and allocation of funds is to be submitted each year to Congress along with the department budget submission for the succeeding fiscal year.

The conference agreement also includes the separate statutory authority provided in the house bill for the Helen Keller National Center for deaf-blind youths and adults, and as in both House and Senate bills, establishes the National Council on the Handicapped as an independent agency with the Federal Government.

Mr. Speaker, without the strong commitment of both Chairman PERKINS and Senator WEICKER for programs benefitting handicapped persons, we would not be voting on this conference agreement today. I appreciate their cooperation, and the hard work of their staffs, in helping us enact this extremely important piece of legislation.

Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURPHY. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the committee and as a member of the conference, we are grateful for the leadership of the chairman, the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. PERKINS). We are also thankful for the commitment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. MURPHY), the ranking minority member, the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. ERLENBORN), and all of our colleagues who worked so assiduously on this legislation.

Mr. Speaker, I rise as a member of the committee and as a member of the conference which considered this legislation, to express my strong support for this legislation before us.

The Rehabilitation Act of 1973 stands as a monument to the commitment which our Federal Government has made to the economic development of handicapped adults in this Nation. It is a successful program and one which continues to enjoy a great deal of bipartisan support in Congress. I was proud to have been one of the original authors of the 1973 act and continue to work to assure that its provisions remain responsive to the needs of the handicapped as well as the world of work.

Specifically, this legislation provides the following:

Extends the State grant portion of the Rehabilitation Act through fiscal year 1986, at a level of $1,037.8 billion in fiscal year 1984 with cost-of-living increases for each the following years;

Extends all other programs under the act for 3 more years;

Establishes a separate authority for the Helen Keller National Center for Deaf-Blind Youth and Adults;

Establishes the National Council on the Handicapped as an independent agency within the Federal Government;

Requires the collection of individual client data for the annual report required of the Rehabilitation Services Administration;

Requires the development of standards for evaluations of existing independent living center and projects with industry, but specifically does not deny funding for existing programs; and Changes the client assistance program from a demonstration, discretionary program to a formula State grant program authorized at $6 million in fiscal year 1984. $6.3 million in fiscal year 1985 and $6.6 million in fiscal year 1986. In States which have had a client assistance program in place within an agency that provides rehabilitation services, the Governor may choose to continue such placement. In States where there has not been previously been such a placement, the Governor must place the program in an independent agency. States must have a client assistance program in place by October 1, 1984, as a condition of eligibility for vocational rehabilitation State grants.

I would like to make a few elaborated points on these provisions. First, I am pleased that we were able to provide for separate authority for the Helen Keller National Center which is located in my home State of New York to assure that they can continue their work on behalf of deaf-blind children.

Second, I am pleased that we provided for an autonomous National Council on the Handicapped, which is critical if we are to remove the deliberations of this body from political influence as well as other similar types of influence. I recently met with the newly appointed chairperson of the Council, Sandra Perrino, who is from my home State of New York, and am fully convinced that the Council stands ready to work together with Congress on behalf of the handicapped children and adults in this Nation.

Finally, I am strongly supportive of the compromise language that we were able to retain for projects with industry. This program has a proven track record of success since 1968 and has provided 65,000 people with disabilities with competitive employment since its inception. It also is a program which forms a true partnership with the private sector. I have had the opportunity to witness this partnership firsthand for the national coordinator for PWI is located in my own congressional district in the Bronx and through Aging in America, Inc., where PWI is administered, there have been large numbers of local businesses as well as individuals who have benefited from this important partnership. I believe that PWI is a partnership that we want to continue to promote. Further, the language in this legislation provides for evaluations of existing programs and projects but will not terminate current programs which would cause grave disruptions in current services.

Finally, I wish to commend Chairman PERKINS and the chairman of the subcommittee, AUSTIN MURPHY for their leadership on this issue. I know that the road to this day has been long in coming and I appreciate his attention to seeing this legislation through in a bipartisan fashion. I also wish to commend our chairman, CARL PERKINS, for his leadership and statemenship in attempting to address other programs which are important to this committee in this legislation. I regret that we were not able to accommodate the interests of this body, which is clearly on record in support of increases in education which were provided for under title IV of the House-passed version of this bill. However, I feel that we will again have the opportunity to address these concerns in the near future and I stand with the chairman in seeing these issues to their appropriate conclusions—more money for education.

I am also glad that the conferees were able to drop the floor amendment adopted by the House which radically readjusts the low-income energy assistance program formula. While I recognize that those Members from States which produce natural gas feel that adjustments must be made in the existing formula, I believe that the floor of the House is not the appropriate arena to examine these issues and I will fight any attempt to effect this change in the future, especially when it will result in a major loss of funding for States in the Northeast where the low-income family is directly dependent upon this program in order to pay their fuel bills during the cold months of the winter season.

I join with my colleagues in supporting this legislation and urge the House to act with us in support of S. 1340.

Mr. ERLENBORN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 8 minutes to the gentleman from Texas (Mr. BARTLETT).

Mr. BARTLETT. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I strongly endorse the conference report on S. 1340, the Rehabilitation Act Amendments of 1984. This report is the result of many hours of constructive negotiations and is the result of work by the subcommittee and the full committee in this House since last April.

I would note that the negotiations in the conference began only after the extraneous, costly, and unrelated title IV and title V were deleted from the conference consideration. I would also note, Mr. Speaker, that, as vigorously as this gentleman dissented to the inclusion of title IV and title V, this gentleman would just as vigorously now compliment the chairman of the full committee, the gentleman from Kentucky, and the chairman of the subcommittee, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and thank those gentlemen for agreeing to permit the Rehabilitation Act to be negotiated and to go to conference without title IV and title V.

Through the conference, the State grant program would be extended through fiscal year 1986 at funding levels that would help States to maintain and in fact to modestly expand their rehabilitation services for handicapped individuals with employment potential. The conferees, this member, the chairman of the subcommittee and the full committee, and the ranking minority member of the full committee all insisted from the very beginning that that 9.9-percent increase for State grants be permitted.

Through this conference, discretionary programs would also be reauthorized for 3 years. In the long term, Mr. Speaker, perhaps one of the most significant features of the conference report is an amendment that would direct the National Council on the Handicapped to review, to analyze and to recommend back to Congress how Federal legislation that impacts on handicapped individuals may be improved. The focus of this Council's efforts would be to identify those unanticipated and unintended barriers to opportunities for independent and productive lives for the handicapped that may exist in Federal law because of incompatibility, ineligibility or related requirements in major Federal legislation.

During the conference negotiations compromises were made by both bodies. I believe that most of these compromises strengthen and improve the act. In one area of compromise, however, I have a lingering concern—that pertaining to the client assistance program. Although I have endorsed the conference as a whole, I would share with my colleagues the effects because they may come back to haunt us in future years.

Since 1974, Mr. Speaker, the client assistance program has been a model demonstration program to encourage the development of programs to assist rehabilitation clients and potential applicants and State vocational rehabilitation agencies to resolve differences between clients in those agencies related to services. It has been a good program and a good demonstration program.

The conference agreement converts the client assistance program from a demonstration initiative to a mandatory State program. With this conference report, in order to receive State grant money under the Rehabilitation Act, each State must establish such a program. The Governor of each State would designate a public or private agency to administer the State client assistance program. So far so good, because, Mr. Speaker, after a good deal of thought and study and listening to the witnesses, I support the mandatory provisions. However, another provision does cause me some concern.

The conferees agreed to a provision which would give a majority of Governors of States of this country more discretion than other Governors in choosing an agency to administer the client assistance program. Those States in which any time between 1974 and today a client assistance program grant was administered and housed within a State agency could designate the State rehabilitation agency to administer the client assistance program. In the remaining States, however, a Governor would be prohibited from designating a State vocational agency from administering the client assistance program. And that is where the problem is. In many States, the vocational rehabilitation agency would be the preferable and the best administrator of the client assistance program.

Now, we have a preliminary list. According to the Rehabilitation Service Administration, the States of Alabama, Alaska, Arizona, Connecticut, Delaware, Hawaii, Idaho, Indiana, Iowa, Louisiana, Minnesota, Mississippi, Missouri, Montana, New Jersey, New York, Oklahoma, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, South Carolina, South Dakota, Vermont, and Wyoming would be prohibited from establishing a client assistance program within a State agency. That list may change. It is a preliminary list. So the list I have just read may change after the final statute is analyzed and after the history of these States back to 1974 is reviewed. But the principle is the same. In those States that are not eligible, a Governor would be required to designate another separate public or private agency to administer the CAP, so long as it is not the vocational rehabilitation agency.

The prohibition provision may or may not pose significant administrative or service-related problems for these 23 States. However, it may be viewed as an example of unbalanced public policy, for it clearly gives one group of States broader discretion than other States.

If this conference report is adopted, it is my hope that the Commissioner of the Rehabilitation Services Administration will conduct a comprehensive evaluation of CAP's, and the Commissioner will then be able to determine whether there are any negative effects associated with this prohibition so that they may be remedied during the next reauthorization.

In closing, I would emphasize that although I am concerned about this one aspect of client assistance, I do support the conference report wholeheartedly and urge my colleagues to do the same.

● Mr. OTTINGER. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the conference report on the Rehabilitation Act amendments of 1983. The central focus of this legislation is the vocational rehabilitation program which assists handicapped individuals to become employable. I commend the chairman for his leadership in this area. Passage of this legislation means the reauthorization of a very successful Federal-State partnership that guarantees the handicapped a genuine opportunity to make full and meaningful contributions to our society.

In addition to expressing my support for this important legislation, I would also like to explain the circumstances under which the conferees chose to eliminate a House provision pertaining to the low-income home energy assistance program (LIHEAP). I, along with several of my colleagues from the Energy and Commerce Committee, participated as conferees on this section which would have increased the fiscal year 1984 authorization level for LIHEAP from $1.875 billion to $2.250 billion, and amended the State allocation formula. The Senate bill did not contain this provision.

First, I want to stress that the LIHEAP provision was eliminated for procedural, not substantive, reasons. It was the considered opinion of the conferees that prompt action on the Rehabilitation Act amendments could only be achieved by limiting the bill solely to measures bearing directly on the particular problems of the handicapped. As a result, both title IV and title V were eliminated. LIHEAP was contained in title IV.

Second, conferees on both sides expressed strong support for strengthening LIHEAP. The severity of this winter's weather has reached almost every corner of the Nation, leading to unprecedented demands for heating fuel and, inevitably, unprecendented demands for LIHEAP assistance. Recently, I wrote the President on this subject.

The Speaker and Representative CONTE have made a similar appeal to the Director of the Office of Management and Budget. The text of these letters are as follows:

JANUARY 27, 1984.

Hon. RONALD W. REAGAN,
The President.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I am writing to urge your immediate attention to a growing national crisis. Federal fuel assistance payments to low-income families are rapidly running out in the face of one of the most cold and bitter winters ever recorded, and we are not even half-way through the heating season. If prompt action is not taken, hundreds of thousands of needy families will suffer the life-threatening effects of utility shutoffs because they do not have the money to pay their bills. These people will be faced with a "heat or eat" predicament. Surely you would not force the poor to choose between an empty heating oil tank or an empty pantry.

The Low-Income Home Energy Assistance Program (LIHEAP) was established to give poor households a fighting chance against such situations. But this unprecedented cold spell is forcing more poor families than ever before to come forward and seek assistance, however, inadequate, from this critical source of emergency energy funds. In my own state of New York, for example 40 out of 62 counties have reported that they will exhaust their allotted funds by mid-February, and 9 counties are already so oversubscribed that they are refusing new applications.

LIHEAP is in desperate need of funds. Year after year you have sought to cut funds from this program and last Fall you succeeded in reducing the appropriation by $100 million over the previous year. However, last November, after strong congressional pressure on this issue, your director of the Office of Management and Budget committed the Administration to seeking supplemental additional funds if necessary. On November 9, 1983, Mr. Stockman wrote to the chairman of the Senate Subcommittee on Labor-HHS Appropriations pledging the reapportionment of $241 million in third and fourth quarter funds if necessary, and "a 1984 supplemental sufficient to restore" these funds in the event that judgment funds from United States v. Exxon, an oil overpricing case, would not be available.

The Exxon case is on appeal, and it is apparent that all Exxon funds are likely to remain the subject of litigation for the rest of this fiscal year. In any event, Exxon funds cannot properly be substituted for federally appropriated LIHEAP funds since oil overcharge funds are intended to remedy past overcharging. Victims of oil overpricing are owed those funds regardless of federal action on the LIHEAP program.

The time has come to act on these November commitments. To address the current emergency, I urge you to (1) immediately accelerate the disbursement of the $241 million reserved for the last two quarters of this fiscal year, and (2) seek immediately a supplemental appropriation to replace the early expenditure of these funds.

Your prompt attention to this matter is, without exaggeration, a matter of life and death. I look forward to your early reply.

Sincerely,

RICHARD L. OTTINGER,
Chairman.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., January 25, 1984.

Hon. DAVID STOCKMAN,
Director, Office of Management and Budget, Washington, D.C.

DEAR DAVE: This is to follow up on the concerns that we, along with members of the Appropriations Committee, have expressed concerning the steps that need to be taken to assure an adequate level of funding for low income home energy assistance this winter.

As you will recall, in a letter addressed to the Chairman of the Senate Labor, Health and Human Services and Education Appropriations Subcommittee dated November 9, 1983, you stated that the Office of Management and Budget continued to hope that Exxon funds would be available to supplement appropriated fuel assistance funds this winter, but should that not happen, you would reapportion $241 million currently held in reserve for certain states. In that letter, you stated: "If it becomes evident during the heavy heating months beginning in December that states need additional funds for the winter period, we will reapportion the third and fourth quarter money for immediate availability to meet those needs."

You also state in that letter: "Should it also be evident in this event that the Exxon case funds will not be available to the states for the third and fourth fiscal quarters, we will promptly seek a 1984 supplemental sufficient to restore the existing third and fourth quarter apportionments and thereby maintain program levels throughout the remainder of the year."

In acknowledgement of that letter, and in reliance on the intent that additional funds would be provided, the House and Senate conferees stated the following in the conference report to the second continuing resolution for fiscal year 1984, House Report 98-450, dated November 12, 1983: "The conferees direct that if the judgement funds from the case United States v. Exxon are not available for the low-income home energy assistance program by early February 1984, the Office of Management and Budget will re-apportion available 1984 funds and submit a request for supplemental appropriations for the low income home energy assistance program in the amount of at least $200 million."

As you know, this winter has been extremely cold. Depending on which agency you talk to, December was either the coldest or the second coldest on record. The nation's heating bill during the December 18-31 cold spell was 41% above normal, and cost the nation an additional $1.76 billion in heating costs. There has been an additional cold spell in January, and another is now been predicted. The cost of heating oil is now rising in response to the increased consumer demand, and the cost of natural gas continues its spectacular rise this winter following the trend of the past two years.

While you state in your letter that the low-income fuel assistance funds available in FY 1984 are equal to the amount available in FY 1983, due primarily to carryover funds, it must be noted that last winter was abnormally warm. In addition, your figures do not take into account the $200 million made available to the states last winter under the Warner amendment. Finally, carryover amounts vary from state to state. In fact, for states that traditionally have the heaviest demand for assistance, and have never built up any kind of funding cushion, like our state of Massachusetts, there is no carryover from FY 1983 and the amount available this winter is absolutely below what was available last winter.

In light of the weather and the state-by-state funding situation, it is to be expected that states will need additional funds. In fact, the signs are mounting quickly, both from the states themselves, and from information provided to us by our Colleagues, that there is indeed a need for such funds. Prompt action is required to provide the resources to meet this need.

Since it is now clear that Exxon money will not be available in the short-term, we urge you to immediately take the steps outlined in your letter.

As you know, simply advancing third and fourth quarter payments will not address the problems of cold weather states which fully exhaust their annual allocations during the first half of the year. Consequently, what needs to be done to address the problem seriously is for the Office of Management and Budget to submit the supplemental request of $241 million, as indicated in your November 9 letter, at the first available opportunity, which is likely to be when the Administration's FY 1985 budget proposal is sent to Congress on February 1. Pending action on the supplemental, the Office of Management and Budget should proceed to make immediately available to the states by whatever appropriate mechanism such as deficiency apportionment, the funds that will be provided through the supplemental. This would accomplish the two things that are needed, additional funds, and getting those additional funds out to the states to permit them to use the funds during the remaining months of winter.

This suggested course of action would be fully in accord with the conference report to the second continuing resolution for FY 1984, the letter referred to above, and conversations that occurred at the time with you and your staff.

We call on you, Dave, to take the steps that are necessary as a result of the freezing winter we are experiencing: Reapportion available FY 1984 funds; submit a supplemental of $241 million; and release the $241 million to the states immediately in anticipation of the enactment of the supplemental.

Please advise us of any action planned by the Office of Mangement and Budget by February 1.

With continued best regards, we are Cordially yours,

THOMAS P. O'NEILL, Jr.,
The Speaker.
SILVIO O. CONTE,
Member of Congress.

Mr. Speaker, it is clear that a supplemental request for the LIHEAP is urgently needed, and that action must occur in the very near future if we are to address this problem during this heating season. I understand that Mr. Stockman recently informed the Appropriations Committee that he would soon be forwarding a request to Congress. That is good news. But it should not be used as an excuse on our part for additional delay. I believe Congress should initiate action on a supplemental request immediately. At this point, delay is almost as harmful as total inaction. It is clear that the action of the conferees is dropping title IV in no way derrogates the need for these funds on congressional support for them.●

● Mr. MRAZEK. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to commend both the House and Senate conferees for the excellent work they have done in agreeing to this conference report on the Rehabilitation Act amendments of 1983. Passage of this major legislative initiative will enable thousands of mentally and physically handicapped individuals to continue to receive rehabilitation training and services throughout this Nation.

I am particularly pleased that the House-Senate conferees have agreed to establish a separate statutory authority and funding source for the Helen Keller National Center for deaf-blind youths and adults. Since the center was first authorized by Congress back in 1967, it has become recognized as the leading facility providing specialized services to deaf-blind Americans. With its 9 regional offices and 20 affiliates across the Nation, the center is mandated to provide the full range of training and research services to approximately 40,000 deaf-blind persons in the United States. The Helen Keller National Center is truly an irreplaceable national resource.

Unfortunately, the ability of the center to survive has been placed in jeopardy in recent years due to its statutory treatment under the Rehabilitation Act. While the center is widely considered an invaluable program administered through the Rehabilitation Act, annual appropriations bills have not specified funding levels for these programs. As a result, the level of funding provided to the center has been subject to ongoing fluctuations and uncertainly. By providing the center with an independent statutory authority, these uncertainties will be largely eliminated and the center will be able to better plan to provide these services in a stable and effective manner.

Mr. Speaker, once again I would like to commend the committee for the excellent job it has accomplished in approving this important piece of legislation and recognizing the invaluable service provided to our country by the Helen Keller National Center for deaf-blind youths and adults. It is my hope that this body will lend its full support to this important initiative and vote for final passage of the Rehabilitation Act amendments.●

● Mr. FORD of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the conference agreements on the rehabilitation amendments of 1984. The conference report (H. Rept. 98-595) which is before us today is an important step in reaffirming the commitment of the U.S. Congress to the Rehabilitation Act. The first Rehabilitation Act was adopted in 1918 to assist handicapped veterans returning from World War I. Since its creation the program has provided effective and efficient assistance to handicapped individuals who want to return to the mainstream of life despite their disability. The enormous success of the program over the past 60 years has resulted in strong bipartisan congressional support. That support should be continued by the adoption of the conference report.

Two provisions of these amendments are particularly important—the first of these gives specific directions to the Secretary of Education to follow through on evaluations of program effectiveness. To a large measure the efficiency of any Federal program is determined by the administration of that program at the Federal level. These amendments will insure that the Department of Education fulfills its responsibility in setting standards and evaluating how well the program is functioning. This type of information is vital to maintaining program performance and making informed judgments about necessary changes or adjustments.

Another real victory for rehabilitation is the maintenance of the entitlement nature of the State grant program. The heart of the rehabilitation program is State grants. Under this section of the law the Federal Government provides funding directly to States for the purpose of making services available to disabled individuals within the State. This particular portion of the act has always been treated as an entitlement. However, when the bill was under consideration in the House, efforts were made to eliminate the entitlement for the States and to make it a straight discretionary grant program. The Senate bill also eliminated the entitlement. But I am pleased to note that the importance of this provision was finally realized and efforts to alter the funding mechanism for the States were rebuffed. The Congress has once again affirmed that rehabilitation is a vital program that demands guaranteed funding.

Finally, I must say that I am very disappointed that titles IV and V of the House bill was not accepted or even discussed in the conference. Title IV would have provided increased authorization ceilings for many critical education programs. The increases were not budget busters. They were well thought-out levels which would have allowed programs under the jurisdiction of the Education and Labor Committee to be funded at levels allowable in the 1983 budget resolution. While the passage of the rehabilitation amendments is the most crucial issue here and the bill that has been agreed to is a sound one, I still find it appalling that the House was not allowed to even discuss titles IV and V during the conference. I am hopeful that this type of action will not recur in subsequent conferences and that we will still be able to achieve the goals of titles IV and V.

I urge my colleagues to adopt this conference report.●

Mr. ERLENBORN. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the conference report.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the conference report.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. ERLENBORN. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 384, nays 3, not voting 46, as follows:

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. MOAKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the conference report on S. 1340, just agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MITCHELL). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

PROVIDING FOR CONSIDERATION OF H.R. 2899, ENVIRONMENTAL RESEARCH, DEVELOPMENT, AND DEMONSTRATION ACT OF 1984

Mr. MOAKLEY. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 429 and ask for its immediate consideration.

H.R. RES. 429

Resolved, That at any time after the adoption of this resolution the Speaker may, pursuant to clause 1(b) of rule XXIII, declare the House resolved into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 2899) to authorize appropriations for environmental research, development, and demonstration for the fiscal years 1984 and 1985, and for other purposes, the first reading of the bill shall be dispensed with, and all points of order against the bill for failure to comply with the provisions of clause 5(a), rule XXI are hereby waived. After general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed one hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Science and Technology, the bill shall be considered for amendment under the five-minute rule, and each section shall be considered as having been read. At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. MOAKLEY) is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. MOAKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield the customary 30 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. QUILLEN), and pending that, I yield myself such time as I may use.

Mr. Speaker, House Resolution 429 is a 1 hour open rule providing for the consideration of H.R. 2899, the Environmental Research, Development and Demonstration Act for fiscal year 1984 and fiscal year 1985.

The rule waives clause 5(a) of rule XXI which prohibits appropriations in a legislative bill. This waiver is necessary because various provisions of the bill make funds available for expenditure without limiting those expenditures to the amount and the extent provided in advance in appropriations acts or allow funds appropriated for one purpose to be used for a new purpose. These provisions could be construed as an appropriation and therefore a violation of the rule.

Mr. Speaker, the bill will be read for amendment by section, with each section considered as read. Upon conclusion of consideration of the bill for amendment, one motion to recommit could be offered.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 2899 is a 2-year authorization which provides $283.5 million for fiscal year 1984 and $297.7 million for fiscal year 1985. This authorization would allow the Environmental Protection Agency to continue ongoing research and developmental activities. It would promote stability in continuing other programs dealing with environmental problems that are affecting our Nation. Such as acid rain, hazardous waste, and ground water contamination.

Mr. Speaker, I know of no opposition to the rule. I urge adoption of House Resolution 429 so that the House will have an opportunity to consider this legislation.

Mr. QUILLEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may use.

Mr. Speaker, the provisions of the rule have been ably explained.

The EPA, as we all know, is an important agency of this Government. Although some think it is bureaucratic, and I agree, the present Director is doing a good job.

Mr. Speaker, this authorization is necessary. There is some controversy on the bill, but, Mr. Speaker, I know of no controversy on the rule and I urge the adoption of the rule.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. MOAKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I have no requests for time, and I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the resolution.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. McGRATH. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members.

So the resolution was agreed to.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

DEFICIT DOWNPAYMENT COMMITTEE

(Mr. LOTT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday our so-called downpayment committee had its first meeting. Four Representatives from Congress, two from the House and two from the Senate, met with administration officials. The first meeting, I thought, went pretty well. We did not accomplish a lot, but we talked seriously and we agreed we would meet again, in a few days, hopefully.

The responses we have had initially, were not too bad, but I worry about some of the news accounts that I am now seeing. We are serious about trying to find some agreement on a "downpayment" that we can lock into our legislative process to reduce the deficit. But I hear in the press, first of all, the gentleman from the other body, Mr. BYRD. He pre-judges the whole process and says he does not think it will work.

I had an opportunity to be with the distinguished majority leader this morning on a program and he was very cooperative sounding, yet he comes right down here in the well and gives a 1-minute speech and starts out by saying we should not have any more meetings for a couple of weeks and we should only talk about defense.

There have been press accounts about how a $100 billion downpayment was a waste of time. Mr. Speaker, $100 billion in my neck of the woods is not a waste of time. And we start talking about, oh, we are going to accomplish that anyway. When you look at last year's record and what we did in the budget on reducing spending or raising revenue, we did not do too good.

Also, if you talk about just the defense area, you are not really looking at the whole prospect of what we should be doing. Are you serious about these negotiations or not? As evidenced by the enclosed letter from White House Chief of Staff James Baker, the administration is, and we are.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, February 9, 1984.

Hon. JAMES C. WRIGHT, Jr.,
Majority Leader, House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.
Hon. DANIEL K. INOUYE,
U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR JIM AND DAN: There are press accounts today of various statements attributed to you and to your colleagues representing the Democratic leadership. I do not know whether these accounts are accurate. But I trust you agree with me that if we are to be successful, we must communicate with each other directly rather than through the press.

In that spirit, let me respond here privately to some of the points raised by the news accounts:

With respect to the suggestion that a number of modest measures adding up to $100 billion in deficit reduction are a "waste of time," I'm sure you agree that it will be a sad state indeed if $100 billion is judged to be a waste of time.

With respect to the associated suggestion that Congress may enact such deficit-reduction measures in any case, I trust you agree that last year's record is not at all supportive of this conclusion; and that, whatever the record, our ability to reach agreement could substantially improve the chances of favorable Congressional action.

With respect to the suggestion that defense spending must be discussed at our next meeting, we are completely agreeable to that. We are analyzing now the suggestion you made at our first meeting, Jim; and we will be fully prepared to discuss that and other possible deficit reduction measures at our next meeting. You offered to provide specific proposals of your own—to complement or substitute for the specific proposals we have already put on the table. We look forward to the opportunity to consider any such proposals.

On the question of when we should next meet, I was disappointed to read that the Democratic leadership strategy may be to seek to delay until the end of the month. For our part, we are ready now to meet today, tomorrow, or at any other time that would suit your convenience. This has been our position since the President first requested that we meet on January 25. I'm sure you agree that the American people neither want nor deserve delay. And, in any case, there are practical considerations related to the Congressional calendar and to the effective date of potential deficit reduction measures which should lead us to meet at the very earliest possible date. My colleagues and I stand ready to meet with you and to continue our discussions in good faith. We do hope you will agree to meet within a week—as you suggested might be possible at the conclusion of our last meeting.

With best regards,
Sincerely,

JAMES A. BAKER III,
Chief of Staff and Assistant to the President.

ENVIRONMENTAL RESEARCH, DEVELOPMENT, AND DEMONSTRATION ACT OF 1984

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to House Resolution 429 and rule XXIII, the Chair declares the House in the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill, H.R. 2899.

IN THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 2899) to authorize appropriations for environmental research, development, and demonstration for the fiscal years 1984 and 1985, and for other purposes, with Mr. HUBBARD in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Pursuant to the rule, the first reading of the bill is dispensed with.

Under the rule, the gentleman from Florida (Mr. FUQUA) will be recognized for 30 minutes, and the gentleman from New York (Mr. MCGRATH) will be recognized for 30 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Florida (Mr. FUQUA).

Mr. FUQUA. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 3 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the bill, H.R. 2899, to authorize appropriations for environmental research, development, and demonstration for fiscal year 1984 and fiscal year 1985. The funds appropriated pursuant to this authorization are for the research programs of the Environmental Protection Agency.

I wish to express my appreciation for the leadership of Mr. SCHEUER, chairman of the Subcommittee on Natural Resources, Agriculture Research and Environment, and thank the ranking minority member of the subcommittee, Mr. MCGRATH, for his work on behalf of this legislation.

As reported by the Committee on Science and Technology, H.R. 2899 authorizes $283,510,000 in fiscal year 1984 and $297,686,000 in fiscal year 1985 for EPA research and development activities.

Mr. Chairman, few areas have been the subject of such intense debate and deep public concern as the area of environmental protection. I was personally gratified by the President's pledge, which he conveyed in his state of the Union address, of a renewed commitment to the environment. At that time, the President stated that he would ask for supplemental appropriations in fiscal year 1984 and increased funding in fiscal year 1985 for environmental programs. This authorization bill will allow this expansion in a manner agreeable to the Congress, since it is $37,510,000 above the $246,000,000 already appropriated for these programs in fiscal year 1984. The fiscal year 1985 authorization contained in the bill is $297,686,000 which is $19,638,000 above the President's request for fiscal year 1985.

Funds appropriated pursuant to this bill will be used for research projects which in turn will support the pollution abatement mission of EPA, the more publicized and frequently controversial mission of that Agency. In many cases the controversy and publicity arises when, in order to meet statutory deadlines, the Agency is called upon to make regulatory decisions on the basis of sparse information.

Two recently prominent cases of this situation involve dioxin and ethaline dibromide (EDB). It is, therefore, vitally important that EPA has a research program of the highest quality that is adequately funded and properly responsive to the environmental problems that threaten the Nation and that regards to the requirements of our environmental laws.

This 2-year authorization bill is intended to promote the kind of quality research program for the EPA. The bill is responsive to national needs and strikes a proper balance between research necessary to implement existing environmental laws and research needed to respond appropriately to emerging environmental problems such as acid rain, indoor air pollution, ground water contamination, and hazardous waste. The bill will also provide the continuity and stability necessary for EPA's research program to achieve the quality and credibility we expect from it. In addition the bill establishes a senior environmental assistance program to utilize senior citizens while carrying out environmental research programs.

Mr. Chairman, H.R. 2899 is the product of extensive oversight hearings and investigations of EPA's research and development activities and I urge its adoption.

Mr. McGRATH. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 2899.

The Environmental Protection Agency has enjoyed bipartisan support in the Congress since its inception under a Republican administration. That same bipartisan concern and support for environmental protection, exists in this Congress today.

The primary responsibility of the EPA is the protection of public health and the environment. I have a deep concern for the ability of EPA to fulfill this mandate. I believe the agency must be funded adequately if it is to succeed in doing quality research for the protection of the environment.

In his state of the Union address, the President emphasized the seriousness of the environmental problems facing us and promised funding increases for research into these problems. It is my understanding that the gentleman from Florida (Mr. FUQUA) intends to offer an amendment which will revise the budget figures in the bill to more closely reflect the priorities set forth in the EPA fiscal year 1985 request. The effect of the Fuqua amendment will be to bring the figures in the bill for fiscal year 1985, to the level requested by the administration for five areas, while retaining the total figure for fiscal year 1985 now in the bill.

I believe this funding level will enable EPA to continue its vital research in clean air, drinking water, hazardous waste disposal, pesticides, and ground water. This research is absolutely crucial if the agency is to be able to set standards for the protection of the health of the American people. In the past year two major threats, dioxin and EDB contamination have been identified. While there is general agreement that these compounds cause cancer in laboratory animals there is considerable controversy over the effects of human exposure to these potential carcinogens. If the EPA is to set the standards for human exposure to these substances, which the public is demanding, it must have the funds to conduct the necessary research. H.R. 2899 as amended will provide these funds, and I urge my colleagues to support this bill.

Mr. McGRATH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. COATS).

Mr. COATS. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, as the President said in his state of the Union address, there is great concern in this country and in Canada about the problem of acid rain. I share that concern and support the chairman's willingness to accommodate the request of the President to increase fiscal year 1985 EPA funding to $34 million for acid rain. Many questions remain unanswered about the causes, effects, and methods of mitigating or controlling acid rain. Congress recognized this in December 1980, when it passed title VII of the Energy Security Act, authorizing a 10-year research program on acid deposition. The national acid precipitation assessment program is now underway and we only have had 2 years of research under that program. Progress is being made and we are benefiting from the research being done by both the Federal Government and private sector. The President's increase in funding will enable EPA to develop the necessary data to fully understand the sources and characteristics of acid rain; to define the extent of damage caused by acid rain; develop new technology and most importantly, to determine the strategy for mitigating measures. The administration included $67 million for developing new technology and $5 million for an experimental program to restore buffering capacity.

This funding plus the $55 million for interagency acid rain research will total an increase of $127.5 million for fiscal year 1985 for efforts to address this problem.

This clearly demonstrates the commitment of the President to restore our lakes and to develop new technology to reduce pollution that causes acid rain.

In my own State of Indiana, we are funding or participating in research and development of new technologies to reduce SO_2 and NO_x emissions. Some examples are: Pressurized fluidized bed combustion, steam stripping of coal and most recently in the development of a unique flue gas scrubber, which will produce marketable fertilizer rather than sludge as a byproduct.

These and many other potential technologies lie on the verge of assisting us resolve the problem of acid rain. We should continue to move forward in developing our scientific knowledge to its greatest potential before mandating expensive cleanup measures.

Mr. FUQUA. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Kansas (Mr. GLICKMAN).

Mr. GLICKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I applaud the chairman, the gentleman from Florida; the gentleman from New York (Mr. SCHEUER); and the gentleman from New York (Mr. MCGRATH) for bringing a very good bill to the floor.

I would like to talk for a moment about solid wastes and hazardous waste disposal, particularly land disposal of hazardous wastes.

Last fall the House approved amendments to the RCRA bill—Resource Conservation and Recovery Act. One of the objectives of that bill was to minimize the generation of hazardous waste and particularly the land disposal of hazardous wastes by encouraging process substitution, materials recovery, properly conducted recycling, and reuse and treatment, and other alternatives.

That bill, as approved by the House, provides a system of land disposal of hazardous wastes. The House has spoken. And later today I will offer an amendment to earmark moneys in this bill for alternatives to land disposal, storage, and containment; alternatives to the present system of land disposal of hazardous waste in this country.

A number of States, including my own State of Kansas, in an effort to protect the health of the residents have or are discussing ways to restrict land disposal of hazardous wastes. My own State is considering legislation which would eventually ban land disposal.

The State of New York has devised a plan where hazardous waste generators have to commit themselves to moving away from land disposal. Other States are acting to ban land disposal on certain hazardous wastes.

If both Federal and State policy are moving away from land disposal, like the Times Beaches of this world, alternatives need to be made available. Moneys should be spent by the EPA not to promote land disposal, or to make it more acceptable, but to make alternatives available all over this country, not only to protect the health and safety of millions of Americans who live near the sites, but also to provide some certainty to businesses in this country as well.

Therefore, we need to be proceeding now with adequate research and development on alternatives to land disposal.

The earmarking is necessary I believe—that I will have in my amendment—because according to the Office of Technology assessment of the March 1983 study, only about 10 percent of EPA's current R&D efforts for hazardous waste are devoted to alternatives to land disposal. OTA's report on technologies and management strategies for hazardous waste control says: "Emerging thermal, physical, and chemical treatment technologies are at a point where they could substantially benefit from more R&D support." Right now, Mr. Chairman, it seems that a great deal of EPA effort are going to make existing land disposal technologies more feasible, that is not the way we should be going.

The purpose of my amendment, Mr. Chairman, will be to insure that there is a threshold point, a minimum point, whereby the Administrator of EPA is going to move away from the current system of land disposal sites and encourage more research and development into hazardous and solid waste alternatives.

Mr. FUQUA. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri (Mr. YOUNG).

Mr. YOUNG of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I would like to engage in a colloquy with the gentleman from Florida (Mr. FUQUA).

It is my understanding, section 2(a)(4) of the bill contains provisions that increase funding for the development of disposal technologies for hazardous wastes. Is this correct?

Mr. FUQUA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. YOUNG of Missouri. I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. FUQUA. I thank the gentleman for yielding. Yes; the gentleman is correct.

Mr. YOUNG of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, it is also my understanding that a portion of these funds is to be spent on research in the area of the destruction of dioxin. Is this true and if so what is the monetary figure?

Mr. FUQUA. Yes; the gentleman is correct. The amount to be spent on such research is $2 million.

Mr. YOUNG of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, the committee report specifies that moneys should be used in the more promising technologies, like detoxification and advanced thermal incineration. Is this evidence that the intent of the committee is to move away from landfills as the only option for disposal and move EPA toward a more technological and permanent solution for the destruction of dioxin?

Mr. FUQUA. Yes; this is the intent of the committee.

Mr. YOUNG of Missouri. With that understanding of the committee intent, Mr. Chairman, I would respectfully submit that there is no greater concern in the area of dioxin contamination that the contaminated city of Times Beach, Mo.

I strongly concur with the intent of the committee that additional funds be directed and specifically earmarked toward research and development of a permanent technological solution for the destruction of dioxin. There is no question that only until a method of destruction is discovered that is feasible and cost effective, there will be no permanent solution. I am strongly opposed to the practice of landfilling our hazardous wastes. This practice only delays the problem and sets a hazardous waste time bomb ticking, as evidenced by Love Canal.

Mr. Chairman, I feel that research on the permanent destruction of dioxin at Times Beach would transfer as a solution to hundreds of smaller sites across the Nation. Is it the intent of the committee that a portion of these funds be designated for research of a permanent solution at Times Beach?

Mr. FUQUA. The gentleman from Missouri and my distinguished colleague has been a leader in the search for an exceptable and effective way to destroy dioxin. A solution to the problems at Times Beach would certainly aid the Nation in reaching a permanent solution for the cleanup of dioxin. Indeed, it is the intent of this legislation that some of these funds would be used for research on destruction technologies at Times Beach, Mo. Research performed in this manner will produce the most useful results.

Mr. McGRATH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from New York (Mr. MOLINARI).

Mr. MOLINARI. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of this legislation. The Environmental Protection Agency's research and development program is a vital component of the Agency's regulatory network. Indeed, almost all decisions made by EPA are based upon the knowledge gained through R&D pursuits.

Today, we witness new chemicals entering the environment, increasing waste disposal problems, life-threatening ground water contamination and rising levels of public health ailments linked to toxic pollutants. Accelerated research and innovation will be crucial to meet these challenges.

Mr. Chairman, we have heard mention today about the problem of dioxin. What has not been mentioned, and I think it is very significant, is that the serious problem of garbage disposal in this country has been held up to a large extent because of the fear of the unknown, how dangerous dioxins are. I think when we can come to grips with that problem and be able to insure the public that we can build resources-recovery facilities that are safe from this threat of dioxin we will be able to get on with the job.

I am also pleased to see that we are putting money into the acid-rain budget. That is a problem that has become a big political issue and we have States suing each other. Canada is threatening to sue the United States. And we are mad at Canada. New York State has sued nine other States.

It is time that the Federal Government is taking a hand here and to provide some of the answers that we need.

This is a good start. I urge my colleagues to support it.

Mr. Chairman, we rely heavily upon the scientific community to research long-term health effects and the dynamics of the environment. The administration has repeatedly called for improved scientific data prior to implementing new regulations. I place great faith in the ability of vigorous research to develop new solutions to prevent any future environmental hazards. However, I cannot stress enough the importance of allocating funds and resources in a careful manner. Simply throwing additional moneys at the Agency will prove costly and ineffective. Through conscientious allocation of our resources, we will get a great deal more value for our dollar. This bill is designed to authorize funds in the most effective manner and it is my hope that EPA will follow this legislative direction by implementing these funds wisely.

I commend the committee for its diligent work and careful evaluation in drafting this legislation. It addresses every major division in EPA's R&D program and provides continuity in the program by authorizing funds for 2 fiscal years. I especially applaud the committee's attention to the issue of resource recovery. Many localities are faced with a dilemma similar to my own. Municipal refuse is building up to uncontrollable proportions and alternative disposal methods are urgently needed. Resource recovery can provide an effective solution. I am, therefore, pleased to see the committee addressing the problems incurred by the Hempstead plant so that plans and construction for future resource-recovery facilities can go quickly forward.

Sufficient funding for EPA's R&D is long overdue. If we are to avoid the mistakes of the past and safeguard public health and the enviroment, control technology will have to meet the challenges posed by the ever-growing, waste-producing technology. I urge my colleagues to support this legislation.

● Mr. KOLTER. Mr. Chairman, the bill authorizing appropriations for the Environmental Protection Agency's Office of Research and Development for fiscal years 1984 and 1985, provides several very important opportunities. Most significant is the 124-percent increase in acid deposition research funding.

All evidence seems to indicate that acid deposition causes substantial damage to our air, water, and land. Numerous sources are responsible for increased sulfur dioxide in the atmosphere, but a large portion is emitted from coal-burning facilities.

Development of control technology is essential to properly utilize the billions of tons of higher sulfur coal located throughout the United States. Coal beneficiation is one method that Congress must seriously consider before it embarks on any sulfur dioxide emissions program. Electrostatic precipitators and other post ignition technology represents only a part of the total solution. More work is needed on front-end technology. Tremendous strides have been made in removing organic and pyritic sulfur from coal, but much more work needs to be accomplished.

This legislation represents a positive step toward that goal. It increases funding for our commitment to learn more about the acid deposition question. Enlargement and enhancement of the existing body of knowledge on acid deposition will help Congress choose a rational solution.

I urge my colleagues to support passage of H.R. 2899 and commend the committee for its work.●

● Mr. SCHEUER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of H.R. 2899.

As chairman of the Subcommittee on Natural Resources, Agriculture Research, and Environment, it has been my privilege to work closely with many of my colleagues on this bill.

I especially want to thank the chairman of the full committee, Mr. FUQUA, for his strong support and efforts in bringing this legislation to the floor.

I also want to express my respect and appreciation for the contributions made by the ranking minority member of the subcommittee, the gentleman from New York (Mr. MCGRATH).

Mr. Chairman, while the administration has requested a substantial increase for research and development in fiscal year 1985, it is still insufficient to protect the environment and to safeguard the health of our citizens. The 1985 request is $278 million, which is $33 million, or 13.5 percent, over the 1984 appropriations.

This is a step in the right direction for which Mr. Ruckelshaus is to be congratulated. Realistically, however, this amount is just slightly above the 1982 appropriation, which was $272 million, and significantly below the 1981 appropriation of $365 million.

It is essential that the EPA research budget preserve a basis for developing rational environmental policies, for issuing sound environmental regulations, and for developing for industry technologies to meet these regulations. To do otherwise would undermine EPA's ability to fulfill its mission.

Sound standards would not be promulgated in a timely fashion, and once issued, they would doubtless be subject to court challenges.

The net result would be more pollution and, consequently, a deterioration in environmental quality and public health. Clearly, the American public would not favor this sort of scenario.

The committee responded to these concerns by reporting H.R. 2899, which is now before the House.

As noted by the chairman of the full committee, the gentleman from Florida (Mr. FUQUA), we have increased the President's requested funding level for EPA research and related activities of $205.5 million in fiscal year 1984 and $278 million in fiscal year 1985 to $283.5 million in fiscal year 1984 and to $297.7 million in fiscal year 1985. This recommendation provides fiscal year 1984 funding at a level slightly higher than fiscal year 1982 levels.

The fiscal year 1985 authorization essentially maintains the same support and direction with a 5 percent across-the-board increase over fiscal year 1984. Included with the increases supported by the committee are funds to restore the Great Lakes research program at the fiscal year 1982 level of funding.

Other increases would support monitoring activity and ecological effects on toxic pollutants contaminating many of the Nation's waterways.

Another area of particular concern to the committee was long-term environmental research, which is essential for detection of new environmental threats such as EDB and, ultimately, an effective EPA.

Fund are to be used exclusively for grants or block grants to universities conducting long-term environmental research and would greatly enhance the credibility and usefulness of the entire EPA research program.

This bill also contains an authorization for a research effort on indoor air pollution. The committee has held a number of hearings on this issue and believes research in this area should be supported.

In addition to these budgetary actions, H.R. 2899 contains a provision creating a senior environmental assistance program, which is intended to facilitate the use of services of senior citizens by all levels of government in carrying out the programs authorized under this act.

Although reprograming between research programs authorized in this bill would be permitted, such reprograming in excess of 5 percent of appropriated funds must be preceded by congressional notification. This requirement is intended to prevent program terminations and to maintain program continuity.

In closing, I would note that the fiscal year 1985 administration's request for acid rain is $34,033,000 which is approximately $20 million higher than the fiscal year 1984 appropriations. I support this effort to increase our research in acid rain.

It is reassuring that the administration has finally recognized the importance of a strong acid rain research program. However, this is only part of the program, an additional effort must be made to control the pollutants at their source.

The time has long since passed when we can accept the administration's unbroken refrain now echoed by Mr.

Ruckelshaus, that we do no know enough to act and that we need more research, more studies, more delay. We are being told that since we do not know everything about acid rain, we cannot do anything.

Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that, and neither do the American people. How many more lakes will have to die in the Adirondacks and throughout the Eastern United States and Canada? How much of our fragile environment will have to be lost forever?

How much of our precious natural resources must be laid waste before the White House stops pandering to the giant utility interests and begins to protect the health and well being of the American people?

Finally, I would like to say that the Nation is confronted with serious environmental as well as economic problems that demand viable and effective solutions.

Part of the answer to these problems lie in a strong environmental research program. This bill will provide such a program and I urge its adoption.●

● Mr CORRADA. Mr. Chairman, I am pleased to rise in strong support of H.R. 2899, legislation which authorizes appropriation for research, development, and demonstration for fiscal years 1984 and 1985 for the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA).

The use of a 2-year authorization bill is welcomed as a way of providing more long-range direction to the programs as well as saving time in these efforts. I am also encouraged by the 7-percent increase in the administration's fiscal year 1985 budget request. Although over half of the total increase was allocated to one program, the Superfund available for the cleaning of hazardous wastes, I am hopeful that increase in other key areas of the EPA budget will take place during deliberations by the Congress.

The clean-up and protection of our environment—the air we breathe, the water we drink, and the soil on which we grow our food—are of utmost concern to all citizens. Any damage done to the environment creates a problem with consequences which are both long-range and expensive to repair.

Specifically, the legislation addresses the following major programs and seeks to increase specific funding for their R&D:

First, clean air: $3 million for health effects research on toxic air pollutants, particularly for accelerated investigation of the 37 airborne pollutants listed as hazardous. There are also increased funding for control technology and studies on the effect of air pollutants on agriculture.

Second, clean water: There is a comprehensive research program to develop the scientific data necessary to achieve the goals of the Federal Water Pollution Control Act. An increase of $11.5 million in water quality is aimed, among other things, at the control of nonpoint sources of pollution, a comprehensive research of the health and ecological effect of toxic pollutants, and additional research to improve reliability and cost-effectiveness of municipal wastewater treatment plants.

Third, hazardous waste: This increasingly important area requires a comprehensive research and monitoring program to identify areas of the country with particular problems and to develop the most effective ways of cleaning up the problem. I am hopeful that President Reagan's fiscal year 1985 budget request increases will signal a new commitment to address this serious health hazard.

Total levels of authorization under this bill are $283.5 million for fiscal year 1984 and $297.7 million for fiscal year 1985. I urge my colleagues to support the amendments that will be offered by Chairman FUQUA of the Science and Technology Committee. I commend him and his staff on their work on this legislation and urge its passage.●

Mr. McGRATH. Mr. Chairman, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. FUQUA. Mr. Chairman, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. Pursuant to the rule, each section is considered as having been read for amendment under the 5-minute rule.

The Clerk will designate section 1.

The text of section 1 is as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SHORT TITLE

SECTION 1. This Act may be cited as the "Environmental Research, Development, and Demonstration Act of 1984".

The CHAIRMAN. Are there any amendments to section 1?

Mr. FUQUA. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the remainder of the bill be printed in the RECORD and open to amendment at any point.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

The text of the bill following section 1 is as follows:

GENERAL AUTHORIZATIONS

SEC. 2. (a) There are authorized to be appropriated to the Environmental Protection Agency for environmental research, development, and demonstration activities:

(1) $61,380,000 for fiscal year 1984 and $64,449,000 for fiscal year 1985 for activities authorized under the Clean Air Act;

(2) $39,750,000 for fiscal year 1984 and $41,738,000 for fiscal year 1985 for activities authorized under the Federal Water Pollution Act: Of which, $2,500,000 is authorized in each fiscal year for the Great Lakes Research Program to be administered exclusively through the Environmental Protection Agency's Large Lakes Research Station, Grosse Ile, Michigan; and of which, $1,500,000 is authorized for fiscal year 1984 for research on the accumulation, environmental impact, and source of toxic substances in the Narragansett Bay and surrounding estuaries and $1,500,000 is authorized for fiscal year 1984 for research on the accumulation, environmental impact, and source of toxic substances in the Puget Sound and surrounding estuaries;

(3) $23,400,000 for fiscal year 1984 and $24,570,000 for fiscal year 1985 for activities authorized under the Safe Drinking Water Act;

(4) $39,889,000 for fiscal year 1984 and $41,883,000 for fiscal year 1985 for activities authorized under the Solid Waste Disposal Act;

(5) $6,063,000 for fiscal year 1984 and $6,366,000 for fiscal year 1985 for activities authorized under the Federal Insecticide, Fungicide, and Rodenticide Act;

(6) $1,233,000 for fiscal year 1984 and $1,295,000 for fiscal year 1985 for radiation activities authorized under section 301 of the Public Health Service Act;

(7) $27,144,000 for fiscal year 1984 and $28,501,000 for fiscal year 1985 for interdisciplinary activities;

(8) $23,769,000 for fiscal year 1984 and $24,957,000 for fiscal year 1985 for activities authorized under the Toxic Substances Control Act;

(9) $21,492,000 for fiscal year 1984 and $22,567,000 for fiscal year 1985 for energy activities;

(10) $14,038,000 for fiscal year 1984 and $14,740,000 for fiscal year 1985 for acid rain research activities authorized under the Energy Security Act; and

(11) $16,381,000 for fiscal year 1984 and $17,200,000 for fiscal year 1985 for hazardous waste activities under the Comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation, and Liability Act (Superfund).

(b) There are authorized to be appropriated to the Environmental Protection Agency, Office of Research and Development, $9,160,000 for fiscal year 1984, and $9,618,000 for fiscal year 1985, for program management and support.

(c) When the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency finds it in the public interest, the Administrator may utilize funds authorized in subsection (a) or (b) for the purpose of conducting appropriate scientific and professional reviews of research and development grant, contract, and cooperative agreement applications and to enter into cooperative agreements to conduct such reviews.

(d)(1) No funds may be transferred from or to any category listed in subsection (a) or (b) of this section or in subsection (a) of section 4, for any purpose, except as specifically permitted under paragraph (2).

(2) Funds authorized for any fiscal year in any category listed in subsection (a) or (b) of this section or subsection (a) of section 4 may be transferred (for the same fiscal year) from that category to any other category so listed; except that no funds may be so transferred from any particular category to another category if the total of all amounts so transferred from that particular category for the fiscal year involved would exceed 10 per centum thereof, or if the total of all amounts so transferred to such other category for such fiscal year would exceed 10 per centum thereof, unless—

(A) a period of thirty legislative days has passed after the Administrator (or the Administrator's designee) has transmitted to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, the President of the Senate, and appropriate committees of the House and Senate a written report containing a full and complete statement concerning the nature of the transfer involved and the reason therefor; or

(B) each committee of the House of Representatives and the Senate having jurisdiction over the subject matter involved, before the expiration of such period, has transmitted to the Administrator written notice to the effect that such committee has no objection to the proposed action.

(3) If any funds are transferred from one category listed in subsection (a) or (b) of this section or subsection (a) of section 4 to another category so listed, and the transfer of such funds or any part thereof is not in full compliance with the requirements of paragraph (2), then (from and after the date of such transfer) none of the funds otherwise available for the fiscal year involved in the category to which the transfer is made (including but not limited to the transferred funds themselves) may be obligated, expended, or otherwise used, for any purpose, until such time as all of such requirements have been fully complied with.

(e) No funds appropriated pursuant to this Act shall be used by the Administrator for any payment for a reduction-in-force in any fiscal year, and no such reduction shall be finalized, unless at least thirty days prior to issuing any general notice of such reduction the Administrator informs the appropriate legislative and appropriation committees of the Senate and House of Representatives in writing of the reasons for such reduction, the impact of such reduction on carrying out the provisions of this Act, the details of such reduction, and other pertinent information.

(f) Appropriations made pursuant to the authority provided by this Act shall remain available for obligations for expenditure, or for obligation and expenditure, for such periods as may be specified in the Acts making such appropriations.

(g) No funds authorized for appropriation pursuant to this Act may be used for any activities other than those authorized by this Act.

SUPERFUND RESEARCH

SEC. 3. Of the funds appropriated from the Hazardous Substance Response Trust Fund for fiscal year 1984 and fiscal year 1985, $15,000,000 shall be expended for research and development activities for each fiscal year. It is the sense of the Congress that the costs of those research and development activities associated with or necessitated by the actual or threatened release of hazardous substances, as those terms are defined under Public Law 96-510, be paid for out of the fund created by Public Law 96-510, the Comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation, and Liability Act of 1980.

LONG-TERM RESEARCH

SEC. 4. (a) The Administrator shall establish and maintain a separately identified program of continuing, long-term environmental research and development that will support and contribute to each research category authorized in section 2(a) of this Act. Unless otherwise specified by law, at least 20 per centum of the total funds appropriated to the Administrator under authority provided by section 2(a) of this Act shall be obligated and expended for such long-term environmental research and development under this subsection.

(b) The Administrator shall take whatever steps are necessary and appropriate to ensure—

(1) that the program established under subsection (a) of this section is planned, organized, and managed for maximum benefit to all the programs administered by the Environmental Protection Agency,

(2) that the research funded through the program established under subsection (a) of this section is of high scientific quality and relevant, whether directly or indirectly, to the mission of the Environmental Protection Agency, and

(3) that the results of the research funded through the program established under subsection (a) of this section are widely disseminated to those who would benefit therefrom.

(c) The Administrator shall prepare an annual report on the performance of the program established under subsection (a) of this section and shall submit the report to the appropriate legislative and appropriation committees of the Senate and House of Representatives at the time the President's budget is submitted to Congress. The report shall include—

(1) a strategic plan that includes clearly defined objectives and performance measures for the program,

(2) a list of funded research projects by category of research,

(3) the nature, status, and major results of funded research projects,

(4) how the results of the research projects are likely to be used and what steps are being taken to foster their use, and

(5) other pertinent information on the performance of the programs listed in subsection (a).

ENERGY RESEARCH

SEC. 5. (a) Appropriations authorized for energy research under section 2(a)(9) shall be used for environmental research associated with (1) synthetic fuels production; (2) the extraction, processing, transportation, and combustion of coal, oil, natural gas, and other fossil fuels; and (3) other energy development activities and their related problems that may pose a threat to public health and environmental quality.

(b) In complying with subsection (a) the Administrator is directed—

(1) to establish and thereafter maintain a long-term health and ecological effects research program on energy-related pollutants whose aim shall be to identify those pollutants most harmful to public health and environmental quality and to elucidate, for those pollutants found most harmful, the relationship between exposure and health and environmental effects;

(2) to take whatever steps are necessary and appropriate to ensure that the research program called for in paragraph (1) is effectively coordinated with related research programs of the National Institutes of Health, the Department of Energy, the Department of Commerce, and other Federal agencies involved in such research; and

(3) to establish and thereafter maintain a monitoring program on energy-related pollutants which includes development of remote and proximate methodologies for measuring pollutants emanating from energy sources specified in section 5(a).

(c) The Administrator shall continue to be responsible for conducting, and shall continue to conduct, fundamental research, evaluations, and assessments of environmental engineering technologies to quantify reliability of their performance and cost and to identify classes of energy-related pollutants to establish emission factors for risk and environmental assesssments as necessary to fulfill the requirements of the Clean Air Act, the Federal Water Pollution Control Act, and other pertinent pollution control statutes.

SENIOR ENVIRONMENTAL ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

SEC. 6. (a) To carry out the purposes of this Act, the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency is directed to develop a Senior Environmental Assistance Program, designed to assist Federal, State, and local environmental agencies in carrying out programs authorized under this Act.

(b) In providing assistance under subsection (a), the Administrator shall utilize, to the fullest extent possible, existing older American employment programs, as provided for in section 105(b)(4) of Public Law 95-478.

(c) The Administrator shall not make any grant to, or enter into any agreement with, any State or local environmental agency for funding of any activities under this section unless such agency certifies that such activities will supplement and not supplant any existing jobs.

SCIENCE ADVISORY BOARD

SEC. 7. (a) Section 8(b) of the Environmental Research, Development, and Demonstration Authorization Act of 1978 (Public Law 95-155) is amended to read as follows:

"(b)(1) The Board shall be composed of at least nine members appointed by the Administrator from nominees recommended to the Administrator by a nominating committee. The nominating committee shall include representatives from Federal research agencies including but not limited to the National Institute of Occupational Safety and Health, National Institute of Environmental Health Sciences, National Cancer Institute, National Science Foundation, National Academy of Sciences, and current and former members of the Science Advisory Board. The nominating committee shall be established, chaired, and managed, in consultation with the Administrator, by the National Institute of Environmental Health Sciences. The nominating committee shall solicit from the general public, through notice in the Federal Register, candidates for nomination to the Board. The Administrator may require such information from the nominees to the Board as the Administrator deems necessary, and the Administrator shall publish in the Federal Register the name, address, and professional affiliation of each nominee.

"(2) Each member of the Board and nominee to the Board shall be qualified by education, training, and experience to evaluate scientific and technical information on matters referred to the Board under this section. The Administrator shall select persons nominated for the Board to ensure that Board membership is fairly balanced in terms of the points of view represented and the functions to be performed by the Board.

"(3) The terms of the members of the Board shall be three years, and shall be staggered so that the terms of no more than one-third of the total membership of the Board and its committees shall expire within a single fiscal year. Each member of the Board shall serve the full length of that member's term unless that member is unable, for involuntary reasons, to discharge his or her duties as set forth in this section or has violated the regulations promulgated pursuant to paragraph (5).

"(4) If a vacancy on the Board is not filled by the Administrator within ninety days of the occurrence of that vacancy, the nominating committee established under paragraph (1) shall meet and appoint, within sixty days, a member of the Board to fill that vacancy from the list of nominees recommended to the Adminstrator under paragraph (1) in accordance with the selection criteria set forth in paragraph (2).

"(5) In order to ensure the objectivity of the Board, the Administrator shall promulgate, within one hundred and twenty days after the date of the enactment of this paragraph, regulations regarding conflcts of interest with respect to the members of the Board.".

(b) Section 8(e)(2) of such Act (Public Law 95-155) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following: "The Board's advice and comments and the response of the Administrator shall be included in the record with respect to any proposed rule and published in the Federal Register in accordance with the requirements of the environmental statutes and the authority of the administrator.".

RESEARCH PROGRAM CONCERNING INDOOR AIR QUALITY

SEC. 8. (a) The Congress finds, on the basis of reports prepared by the General Accounting Office and the National Academy of Sciences, that due to the absence of a statutory mandate for a single Federal agency to undertake and coordinate research, development, and demonstration efforts concerning indoor air pollution—

(1) Federal programs in this field are fragmented and underfunded; and

(2) an adequate information base concerning potential indoor air quality problems is not being developed by the Federal Government.

(b) The Administrator shall carry out a research program under this section with respect to indoor air quality. Such program shall be designed to (1) gather data and information on all aspects of indoor air quality in order to contribute to the understanding of health problems associated with the existence of air pollutants in the indoor environment, and (2) coordinate Federal, State, local, and private research, development, and demonstration efforts relating to the improvement of indoor air quality.

(c) The Administrator may establish such committees, comprised of individuals representing Federal agencies concerned with various aspects of indoor air quality, and such advisory groups, comprised of individuals representing the scienitific community, industry, and public interest organizations, as may be necessary to assist the Administrator in carrying out the research program required by this section. The Administrator shall also consult and coordinate with State and local officials and other interested parties having concerns related to the program carried out under this section.

(d) The research program required under this section shall include, but not be limited to—

(1) reserach, development, and demonstration concerning the identification, characterization, and monitoring of indoor air pollution sources and levels (including research, development, and demonstration relating to (A) the measurement of various pollutant concentrations and their strengths and sources, (B) high-risk building types, and (C) instruments for indoor air quality data collection);

(2) research relating to the effects of indoor air pollution on human health;

(3) research, development, and demonstration relating to control technologies to prevent or abate indoor air pollution (including the development, evaluation, and testing of individual and generic control devices and systems); and

(4) the dissemination of information to assure the public availability of the findings of the Administrator pursuant to the research, development, and demonstration activities under this section.

(e)(1) Not later than one year after the date of the enactment of this Act, the Administrator shall submit to the Congress a plan for the implementation of the research program required under this section.

(2) Not later than thirty-six months after such date of enactment, the Administrator shall submit a progress report, including an assessment of future research needs.

(3) Not later than fifty-four months after such date of enactment, the Administrator shall submit to the Congress a final report setting forth the results of the program, assessing the state of knowledge concerning the risks to human health associated with indoor air pollution, assessing the need for further research, and making such recommendations as may be appropriate.

(4) The progress report and the final report submitted under this subsection shall be submitted to the National Academy of Sciences within a reasonable period before the dates required for submittal to the Congress and, when submitted to Congress, such reports shall contain any comments provided by the National Academy of Sciences.

(f) Nothing in this section shall be construed to authorize the Administrator to carry out any regulatory program or any activity other than research, development, and demonstration and the related reporting, information dissemination, and coordination activities specified in this section. Nothing in this section shall be construed to limit the authority of the Administrator or of any other agency or instrumentality of the United States under any other authority of law.

(g) Of the funds appropriated pursuant to the authorization contained in section 2(a)(9) of this Act for each of the fiscal years 1984 and 1985, the sum of $4,000,000 is authorized to be appropriated to carry out this section.

COMMITTEE AMENDMENTS

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the first committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: On page 2, line 11, strike out "$61,380,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$61,191,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: On page 2, line 12, strike out "$64,449,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$64,251,000.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. FUQUA TO THE COMMITTEE AMENDMENT

Mr. FUQUA. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FUQUA to the committee amendment: On page 2, line 12, strike "$64,251,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$65,212,300".

Mr. FUQUA. Mr. Chairman, this is an amendment that raises the funds for air quality research to that requested by the administration. I do not think there is any opposition to the amendment, and I urge its adoption.

Mr. McGRATH. Mr. Chairman, the minority has no objection to this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida (Mr. FUQUA) to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the committee amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment, as amended.

The committee amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

COMMITTEE AMENDMENT

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the remaining committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

(c) Section 8(h)(2) of such act (Public Law 95-155) is amended to read as follows:

"(2) Members of the Board shall be compensated at a rate to be fixed by the President but not less than $100.00 per day of service and not more than the maximum rate of pay for grade GS-18, as provided in the General Schedule under section 5332 of title 5 of the United States Code."

Mr. FUQUA (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the committee amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. FUQUA

Mr. FUQUA. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FUQUA: Strike out section 3 (page 7, lines 4 through 15) and redesignate succeeding sections accordingly.

Mr. FUQUA. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is to remove section 3 from the bill which would authorize the EPA to utilize moneys from the Superfund trust fund to support research projects on hazardous waste.

This trust fund, established from taxes levied on industry, is intended to support hazardous waste cleanup activities.

Section 3 would have implemented the concept that industry should bear some of the cost for hazardous waste research performed by EPA.

The Committee on Energy and Commerce has raised objections over this approach and, in response we have agreed to remove this section from the bill with the understanding that it will be further considered at the committee level.

This amendment reflects this agreement and I urge its adoption.

Mr. McGRATH. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, the minority has no objection to this amendment, and we support it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida (Mr. FUQUA).

The amendment was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. FUQUA

Mr. FUQUA. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FUQUA: Strike out section 7 (beginning on page 11, line 14 and ending on page 14, line 5) and insert in lieu thereof the following new section:

"SEC. 7. Section 8(h)(2) of the Environmental Research, Development, and Demonstration Authorization Act of 1978 (Public Law 95-155) is amended to read as follows:

"(2) Members of the Board shall be compensated for each day or service rendered at a rate to be fixed by the President but not less than the daily equivalent of the rate of pay payable for step 4 of grade GS-11 and not more than the daily equivalent of the maximum rate of pay payable for grade GS-18, as provided in the General Schedule under section 5332 of title 5 of the United States Code."

Mr. FUQUA (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

Mr. FUQUA. Mr. Chairman, the amendment I offer would remove language in section 7 of the bill that establishes a procedure for selection of members of the EPA Science Advisory Board and retains language, with minor technical changes, authorizing compensation for members who serve on the Board. This provision was developed to insure that qualified individuals were appointed to the Science Advisory Board.

The Board advises the EPA Administrator on vitally important matters, including the scientific justification of proposed regulations, and we feel it is essential that the qualifications and credibility of the Board reflect the highest standards.

Section 7 was a response to questionable practices of the past in the selection of SAB members that threatened the integrity of the Board. We have, however, reached an agreement with the new EPA Administrator to work more closely together on this issue and reexamine the provisions of section 7 within our committee.

As for compensation of SAB members, this authority is provided by the amendment at the Agency's request.

Mr. Chairman, this amendment is offered in the spirit of cooperation and I urge its adoption.

Mr. McGRATH. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, as I understand it, this amendment just fixes compensation for members of the Science Advisory Board, and the minority has no objection to this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida (Mr. FUQUA).

The amendment was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. FUQUA

Mr. FUQUA. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FUQUA: On page 2, line 15, strike "$41,738,000" and insert in lieu thereof, "$32,701,300".

On page 3, line 5, strike "$24,570,000" and insert in lieu thereof, "$23,920,000".

On page 3, line 8, strike "$41,883,000" and insert in lieu thereof, "$38,534,000".

On page 3, line 11, strike "$6,366,000" and insert in lieu thereof, "$8,038,500".

On page 3, line 15, strike "$1,295,000" and insert in lieu thereof, "$2,121,500".

On page 3, line 19, strike "$28,501,000" and insert in lieu thereof, "$23,702,100".

On page 3, line 22, strike "$24,957,000" and insert in lieu thereof, "$27,103,200".

On page 3, line 25, strike "$22,567,000" and insert in lieu thereof, "$17,813,400".

On page 4, line 2, strike "$14,740,000" and insert in lieu thereof, "$34,032,500".

On page 4, line 11, strike "$9,618,000" and insert in lieu thereof, "$9,453,700".

Mr. FUQUA (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

Mr. FUQUA. Mr. Chairman, this amendment would maintain the fiscal year 1985 authorization amount contained in this bill. To accommodate various aspects of the President's fiscal year 1985 funding request, the amendment would increase the authorization levels for the air, pesticides, radiation, toxic substances, and acid rain research programs to the levels requested by the administration and make corresponding adjustments in the other programs.

While several funding changes are made by this amendment, the program goals and direction which are explained in the committee's report still reflect the intent of this legislation.

Mr. Chairman, this is a responsible amendment which imposes no new funding obligations and I urge its adoption.

□ 1400

Mr. McGRATH. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida (Mr. FUQUA).

As I understand it, it just realines some money within the present authorization in the bill to conform with some administration requests on acid rain, pesticides, radiation, and toxic substances research.

Mr. Chairman, I feel it is a worthy amendment.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. WINN TO THE AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. FUQUA

Mr. WINN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WINN to the amendment offered by Mr. FUQUA: On page 2, line 15, strike "$32,701,300" and insert in lieu thereof "$26,768,000".

On page 3, line 5, strike "$23,920,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$23,124,000".

On page 3, line 8, strike "$38,534,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$34,756,700".

On page 3, line 19, strike "$23,702,100" and insert in lieu thereof "$20,418,100".

On page 3, line 25, strike "$17,813,400" and insert in lieu thereof "$14,471,000".

On page 4, line 11, strike "$9,453,700" and insert in lieu thereof "$9,268,600".

Mr. WINN (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. WINN. Mr. Chairman, the amendment that I am offering is simply an attempt to bring this authorization in line with the administration's request for EPA research and development which we received a little over 1 week ago. My amendment would reduce the fiscal 1985 authorization by $19.7 million. It would not affect the fiscal 1984 authorization. In addition, my amendment reorients the fiscal year 1985 authorization figures contained in the committee version of H.R. 2899 to reflect new priorities. This reallocation is the same as in the Fuqua amendment. The only difference is that when you add up the figures for each category, my amendment would be $19.7 million less.

Mr. Chairman, the reason for my amendment can be explained in two words: the deficit. We have heard a lot of talk in this body and in the media over the past month or two about the projected size of the fiscal 1985 deficit and the potential effect that the expected large deficit will have on our Nation's economy.

I do not believe that there is a single Member of this House who does not share that concern over the deficit. Our honest differences of opinion come when we, as individual Members, try to decide what the best course is to reduce the deficit or, at worst, hold it steady. I know that a sizable number of the freshmen from the other side of the aisle took a stand in the first session of this Congress to demonstrate their concern over the deficit. I commend them for that act and share their concern.

Today, with this amendment, there is another opportunity to show your concern for the deficit problem. While we each may disagree on the best way to tackle the deficit, I do not think that there is any question that adding $20 million to this EPA bill is not the right way to go about it.

I want to lay to rest any fears that this is an attempt to gut EPA's research and development funding. My amendment would leave intact an authorization $33.2 million above the fiscal year 1984 appropriated level for the Agency. This would mean that these EPA research and development programs would still receive a very solid 14 percent increase in their funding. Let me point out just some of the things that would receive very strong funding under this amendment.

Research would be accelerated to understand the causes and effects of acid rain. As the President pointed out in his state of the Union message, funding for acid rain research is doubled from fiscal year 1984 to fiscal year 1985. We would increase the research into understanding the risks posed by hazardous and toxic chemicals. We would enhance our research to assess technologies which control pollutants. We would provide funding to improve the scientific basis for estimating human health consequences of environmental pollutants. The increases in research are widespread, reflecting the importance attached to adequate research to implement effective regulatory programs. In nearly every area, the research programs are increased to reflect the importance of EPA's scientific and technical activities.

I am sure that in rebuttal to this amendment we will hear scare stories that reducing this authorization to the administration's request will do substantial damage to EPA's efforts. Do not believe it. EPA will still receive substantial and adequate funding to carry out their programs that we all realize are important. At the same time, by supporting this amendment we can strike a blow for fiscal integrity. It is still early in the second session, and if we do not begin to dig in a little bit now, the looming deficit monster will be completely uncaged by the end of this year.

Mr. Chairman, I urge support of this amendment and yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. FUQUA. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I would note from the outset that this bill was reported unanimously out of the subcommittee. The recommended authorization levels were the product of a strong bipartisan cooperation and a commitment that the authorization levels contained in this bill are necessary if the EPA is to fulfull its environmental research mission.

I would additionally note that no substitute was offered when this bill was considered by the full committee, and it was reported out of the full committee by a voice vote.

This authorization bill represents fiscally sound and responsible legislation. Increases in the bill, a scant 7 percent above the administration's request last year will provide EPA with the flexibility to convert new and emerging threats to our health and environment. This need has been very amply demonstrated in the past year with the realization of the severe problems associated with EDB, dioxin and hazardous waste disposal.

In the last fiscal year, the administration realized the need for the flexibility only late in the year, with a $41 million supplemental increase. The Senate committee has already recognized the need for renewed commitment to environmental research by reporting out a $300 million authorization bill for fiscal year 1984. That is $3 million more than we have in this bill.

Mr. Chairman, the amendment that I have offered does not increase the total amount of the bill; it just readjusts some of the figures within the request, and in some of the areas that we feel are so critical, should the administration or the Administrator of EPA determine that somewhere in the year they would need some additional supplemental appropriations, by our authorization request we would take care, I think, of most any type of request that they would make.

I think this is a sound approach. It gives flexibility to the committees involved, and the administration, and as I pointed out, the other body, controlled not by this party but another party, has reported out a bill $3 million more than what we are attempting to get the House to pass here today.

So, Mr. Chairman, I urge the defeat of the amendment offered by my good friend, the gentleman from Kansas, and the adoption of the amendment that I have offered, which does not raise any additional funds above the $297 million that we have, but readjusts those figures in some very critical areas that the Congress has provided leadership for and which, even in the supplemental request, the administration recognized those needs and asked for those increases in that supplemental request.

Mr. Chairman, I urge the defeat of the amendment.

Mr. McGRATH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I regret that I cannot support the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas (Mr. WINN). While I generally applaud his efforts to bring authorization bills down to the administration's request, in the instance of the EPA I cannot support such a move.

H.R. 2899 contains funding for fiscal year 1985 which is about 7 percent above the request. I prefer to give this agency the additional flexibility in its budgeting. For example, in the state of the Union address of the President, he stated that the EPA intends to seek a supplemental appropriation for the current fiscal year to support additional acid rain research, and I might point out that that additional supplemental request for acid raid research will be $5.5 million.

With the authorization contained in H.R. 2899, I believe we are providing the agency with the option to request additional funds at a later date without having to seek additional authorization.

While I would not and I do not normally support such moves, in the case of EPA I feel it is justified. It seems that every few months a new environmental hazard is identified, and I believe H.R. 2899 allows the agency the flexibility to respond to new threats to our health and environment as they are identified.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, regretfully, I must oppose the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas (Mr. WINN).

Mr. LEVITAS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas (Mr. WINN) and in lukewarm support of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida (Mr. FUQUA) because I am not sure Mr. FUQUA goes far enough.

Let us put this subject we are talking about in a little perspective before we get to the horror stories. In 1981 the Congress appropriated for that fiscal year approximately $350 million for research and development at the Environmental Protection Agency. In the first year of the Gorsuch administration, $306 million was actually spent for this purpose. The next year the administration requested $250 million for research and development, and then for the next year, $206 million.

Overall, taking into account inflation and other additional costs, in the 3 years of the Gorsuch administration, the research and development budget was effectively cut approximately 50 percent, and what we were cutting were not frills, not unnecessary efforts, but really the heart and soul of what the agency is set up to do. Without this research and development capability, EPA cannot go foward with the development of the very standards that are necessary to make judgments and decisions about what regulatory levels should be permitted. Without the research and development capability, we cannot address cost-effective means of abating pollution, and the difficult and complex problems of toxic chemicals and their disposal. And yet it was in exactly this area that there was a 50-percent reduction. This reduction translated into many disasters, whether they were in determining dioxin levels and how to deal with that, or dealing with the problems of PCB's, or dealing with the most recent problem of the EDB's. If we had prevented this decrease in funding, and gone ahead of this curve, these problems could either have been avoided, minimized, or addressed more quickly and in return the public's health would have been better protected. That is what we are talking about—public health.

My good friend, the gentleman from New York, quite correctly pointed out that the Environmental Protection Agency was originally created under a Republican administration and for 10 years had operated in a bipartisan partnership because the public health was paramount. With the advent of Ms. Gorsuch, we saw a reversal of that policy. Not only did we see a reversal of the policy, but the agency in many ways was turned to ashes. We saw people who had to leave because they no longer had opportunities to do their professional work in such areas as R&D. They will never come back. They are gone. We are going to have to rebuild this capability, and now I hope, like the Phoenix bird, EPA will rise from its ashes once again.

But we cannot do that by simply giving lip service to this problem. We have got to deal with it by giving back the monetary resources and backing up our words with action.

Now, when Mr. Ruckelshaus came in, I believe he came in to change the direction of EPA. At this point he has simply stopped EPA from going in the downhill direction it had been going. It has not turned around yet, because I am advised that this budget we are now looking at is still about 50 percent of what Mr. Ruckelshaus thought he needed for the Environmental Protection Agency. This 14 percent increase is only beginning to touch the 30 percent reduction.

Now, I will address the deficit question because I think we should—it is an important one. I am prepared to say that we should go to a pay-as-you-go budget for everything. Whether it has to do with health care, the environment, defense, entitlements or taxes, we ought to go to a pay-as-you-go budget. But that is not the question we are facing today. The question here is: Where are your priorities?

If we had a pay-as-you-go budget, Mr. Chairman, then I would say that anything that goes above the baseline should not be authorized unless we pay for it by increasing taxes, or make reductions elsewhere. What we are talking about here are our priorities. Even with the $297 million, that does not get us back to where we were in 1981. And it is obvious to this Member what direction we need to be going in.

Mr. Chairman, I, therefore, ask my colleagues to vote against the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas (Mr. WINN).

Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I support the Winn amendment because, as I understand it, it does not violate priorities. It establishes priorities, and in many respects, unless I am incorrect, it reflects the priorities set in category by the committee amendment itself.

What we are talking about here is another opportunity to meet our obligations to the environment and at the same time couple it with our obligations to start working on these deficits.

I am glad to see that the gentleman from Georgia touched upon pay-as-you-go because we have given this House an opportunity on several occasions to start adopting that principle, and even though he iterates that we should wait for the proper time, we have been saying that for a year and a half, since I have been in the Congress, and never has that opportunity arisen. When debate was offered on these varieties of individual bills on pay-as-you-go, I do not know whether he supported them or not.

Mr. LEVITAS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GEKAS. But he seems to indicate that he is in favor of pay-as-you-go.

I am going to enlist him in the overall efforts for pay-as-you-go consciousness for this body, and I am glad that he got up and used those very same phraseologies which we consider to be more than mottoes but a need for this body.

Mr. LEVITAS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GEKAS. I will certainly yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. LEVITAS. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

First of all, let me assure the gentleman that I am not a Johnny-comelately in this matter, and I do not know who is going to be joining us in this effort. I was a sponsor of the pay-as-you-go effort when it was first introduced. I am a cosponsor of the legislation, and I hope that we can put together a bipartisan coalition in this House and, if necessary, enroll the White House and enroll the leadership of this House to get a pay-as-you-go budget. I voted against the rule that stopped us from offering it the last time.

So that is not the question. I am for pay-as-you-go, and I am willing to pay for this. But what I am suggesting is that we do not have a pay-as-you-go budget. We have got to have one, and when we have one, I would hope that one of the priorities that we and the American people are willing to pay for—and every poll shows the American public is willing to pay for protection of their health—will be this priority. We need it, we ought to pay for it, but we have got to have it.

Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Chairman, if I may reclaim my time, the gentleman has just said in effect that after we go bankrupt, then we are going to get together and try to meet our obligations. I consider him enlisted in the cause of pay-as-you-go, and I will float memo after memo to the gentleman from Georgia until we can establish a plan overall for pay-as-you-go.

But I think we should start now today preserving the priorities of EPA and preserving our commitment to EPA, recognizing that EPA under its new leadership is committed to the environmental concerns, and we should blend in with this bill our care for the environment and our concern for the deficits.

Mr. Chairman, I support the Winn amendment.

Mr. MOLINARI. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words and I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I rise only for the purpose of asking the gentleman from Georgia to engage in a brief colloquy with me, if the gentleman would.

I think those of us that are on the floor at the present time all share the same view with respect to the budget and a desire to keep the budget down to a minimum.

But is it not a fact that had we spent more money in the right places, and I am talking about the subject we are talking about here today, research and development, that indeed we could have saved this Government a great deal of money. The committee hearings, I think, bore out the extraordinary sums we have expended because we failed to spend money properly in research and development.

Mr. LEVITAS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOLINARI. I would be happy to yield.

Mr. LEVITAS. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

The gentleman is absolutely correct and his memory is flawless in this regard.

The hearings that we have conducted on this matter have demonstrated that is we had developed the appropriate technologies when it was possible to do so, the cost of cleanup, either in the Superfund program or the cost to the private sector through RCRA could have been slashed demonstrably. If we do not have the new technologies for recycling or for incineration, we are going to continue to put the stuff in the ground. It is going to continue to pollute the aquifers and we are going to continue to see communities threatened economically and otherwise.

The investment we make in R&D is one of the greatest returns on investment that we get and one of the greatest savings. Our hearings have borne that out. We are being penny wise and pound foolish to scrimp on trying to get ahead of the toxic chemical curve.

Mr. MOLINARI. I thank the gentleman for his comments.

I just would like to conclude by mentioning one example, Mr. Chairman. The gentleman from Missouri (Mr. YOUNG) mentioned before the Times Beach problem. We learned that for less than $100,000 annually with the present state of the art that dioxin could have been properly disposed of.

It cost EPA and the taxpayers and those in industry $33 million for one buy out at Times Beach. We are told that the total cost of buy out is going to exceed $100 million; so we look at that as a clear cut example of how foolish we have been, and if we spend some dollars now we are going to save much more in the future.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there further debate on the Winn amendment?

If not, the question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas (Mr. WINN) to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida (Mr. Fuqua).

The question was taken; and on a division—(demanded by Mr. WINN)—there were—ayes 4, noes 10.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida (Mr. FUQUA).

The amendment was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. WALKER

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WALKER: on page 7, after line 15, insert the following new subsection:

SEC. . It is the sense of the Congress that, in the process of selecting hazardous waste sites and the placement of hazardous waste materials, the Environmental Protection Agency shall give priority to full cooperation with local citizens groups who are trying to protect and preserve the environmental quality of their communities.

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan (Mr. DINGELL) reserves a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is merely a sense-of-Congress amendment that goes to the EPA, stressing the fact that what has happened all too often in agencies of the Government that are concerned with the environment is that they have become somewhat captive, unknowingly at times, but somewhat captive to the lobbyists and lawyers of big firms that can find entry into the agencies, make their points felt, whereas small citizen groups within communities that are trying to protect their communities against hazardous waste dumps find themselves shut out of those deliberations; so all this amendment really is saying is that we would like to see the Environmental Protection Agency show a little more cooperation toward those citizen groups, allow those citizen groups to have the cooperation of EPA in developing the information that they need in order to protect the environmental quality of their own communities.

I think this makes sense. I would hope that we would recognize that in local areas the people of those areas also have something to contribute to these deliberations about hazardous waste dumping.

So all this amendment does, it simply says that it is the sense of Congress that the EPA should cooperate with those kinds of efforts.

Mr. FUQUA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALKER. I would be very glad to yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. FUQUA. Mr. Chairman, I would like to say that we have had a chance on this side to examine the amendment. We have no objection to the amendment and urge its adoption.

Mr. McGRATH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALKER. I would be glad to yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. McGRATH. Mr. Chairman, we have examined the amendment also. We have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from New York.

POINT OF ORDER

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. DINGELL) insist upon his point of order?

Mr. DINGELL. I do, Mr. Speaker.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. DINGELL) to state his point of order.

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Chairman, I want it known that there is no lack of affection or respect for the author of the amendment when I make the point of order and also that I do not really have any problem with the substance of it.

There are several problems, however, with regard to the rules of the House. The first is that the amendment is not germane to the bill nor is it germane to the place in the bill to which it is offered.

The bill is entitled, "To Authorize Appropriations for Environmental Research, Development, and Demonstration for the Fiscal Years 1984 and 1985, and for other purposes."

The amendment is offered at page 7 following section 2(g).

Section 3, which related to Superfund research, has been stricken.

The provisions of section 2(g) are in a section entitled "General Authorizations." It says, "There are authorized to be appropriated to the Environmental Protection Agency for environmental research, development and demonstration activities:"

The next section which appears is section 4(a), which is entitled, "Long-term Research."

Immediately prior to the point where the amendment is offered appears the language, "No funds authorized for appropriation pursuant to this Act may be used for any activities other than those authorized by this Act."

Section 4(a) authorizes the administrator to establish and maintain a separately identified program of continuing, long-term environmental research and development that will support and contribute to each research category.

As mentioned, the title of the bill is, "To Authorize Appropriations for Environmental Research, Development, and Demonstration for the Fiscal Years 1984 and 1985."

The amendment is a sense-of-Congress resolution, in a sense, that the Environmental Protection Agency will give priority to full cooperation with local citizen groups who are trying to protect and preserve the environmental quality of their communities.

Now, this is an unexceptional section. It is one that most anyone can agree with as a matter of substance.

But I observe that it does not belong in this particular legislation, nor does it belong in the particular place where it is offered.

Provisions relative to Superfund research were just stricken, but those were provisions relative to Superfund research and not with regard to any sense of Congress or sense of Congress instruction to the Environmental Protection Agency.

The rules of the House require that the language of the amendment must be germane to the bill and germane to the portion of the bill to which it is offered. It must seek to do the same thing by the same purposes.

One of the tests of the amendment for germaneness, but only one, is that the rules of the House require or, rather, have as a test that the jurisdiction to which the measure would be referred is one of the criterion that is used by the Chairman in determining whether or not the matter is germane.

First of all, the purposes of the bill are for research. The purposes of the amendment are essentially a congressional expression of intent or instruction to EPA with regard to with whom the EPA shall be cooperative and in what order of priority.

I observe that the fundamental purposes of the bill are different than the fundamental purposes of the amendment, as are the fundamental purposes of the sections immediately before or immediately after that.

It is clear that were this language offered to the bill it might conceivably go to quite a different committee than that which is now handling the legislation on the floor. And for that reason, Mr. Chairman, I do insist on my point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. WALKER).

Mr. WALKER. I thank the Chairman.

I appreciate the learned discourse of the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. DINGELL) on the procedures of the House with regard to this amendment. The gentleman from Pennsylvania would be loathe to interfere in the jurisdictional areas of the gentleman from Michigan, but I would suggest to the Chair that this amendment does not at all. This amendment is, in fact, directed at the Environmental Protection Agency, the exact agency which is covered by this bill.

It is merely a sense of Congress resolution. It requires no new duties of the Environmental Protection Agency. It has no obligations upon this Congress or upon the House.

It is strictly a matter of expressing our will with regard to a matter of some importance in the whole matter of hazardous waste, and I suggest to the Chair that the matter is entirely germane in this bill that speaks purely to the agency to which the amendment is directed.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HUBBARD). The Chair has heard both the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. DINGELL) and the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. WALKER).

However, the Chair is going to rule that because this bill, although open to amendment at any point, is limited to authorizing appropriations to environmental research, development, and demonstration for the fiscal years 1984 and 1985 regarding the Environmental Protection Agency, that the particular amendment introduced by the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. WALKER) has to do with the selection of hazardous waste sites and their regulation, indicating that it is the sense of Congress that in the process of selecting hazardous waste sites and the placement of hazardous waste waters, the EPA shall give certain priorities. The Chair does sustain the point of order of the gentleman from Michigan that the particular amendment by the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania is not indeed germane to this bill.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. ANDREWS OF TEXAS

Mr. ANDREWS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ANDREWS of Texas: At the end of the bill, add the following new section:

"REPORT ON ALTERNATIVES TO EDB

"SEC. 9. The administration shall, within 120 days after the date of enactment of this Act, conduct an investigation and submit a report to the Congress and the President on the feasibility of available alternatives, such as irradiation, to the use of ethylene dibromide (EDB) as a citrus, soil, and grain fumigant. This report, which shall include assessments in areas that are severely impacted, particularly those in citrus-producing States, shall also include recommendations concerning alternatives to such use that the Administrator determines to be the most reasonable and prudent. The Administrator pursuant to section 28 of Public Law 95-346 (FIFRA) shall take appropriate steps to carry out the purposes of this section in coordination with the Secretary of Agriculture's research and implementation program."

Mr. ANDREWS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, the amendment I have at the desk is very simple and very limited. It directs the EPA to report to Congress and the President within 4 months on the feasibility of alternatives to the use of EDB as a citrus, soil, and grain fumigant.

By now most everyone in this body has read at least some newspaper clippings about EDB. This poisonous chemical has received widespread attention in every major newspaper in the country as well as hundreds of local ones over the past several months. EDB is short for ethylene dibromide and has been described by EPA as one of the most dangerous carcinogens they have ever encountered. Last September, the Agency estimated that a lifetime of exposure in our foods would cause cancer in 3 out of every 1,000 persons. This is an alarming ratio, made more alarming by the fact that our exposure to EDB has extended over 35 years. The chemical was registered as a pesticide in 1948 and it has been in use almost ever since to fumigate stored grain, milling machinery, soil, and citrus fruit. The EPA estimates that half of the Nation's grain stockpile is tainted. About 30 percent of the packaged grain products tested by various sources show contamination; 10 States so far, beginning with Florida, pulled products off their shelves.

Citrus presents an even grimmer prospect. EDB is used as a fumigant on imported fruit and vegetables and on fruit and vegetables intended for the fresh market among citrus-producing States like Texas, Florida, Hawaii, Louisiana, California, Arizona, and New Mexico. These States fumigate to various degrees for their fruit fly quarantine program. In the past, Texas has fumigated about 20 percent of its citrus although it has been able to reduce that percentage over recent years.

Unfortunately, the residue levels of EDB in fumigated citrus can be very high, and these high levels are not dissipated by baking or other processing before they are eaten. In issuing voluntary guidelines to the States in determining "safe" residue levels in certain foods, EPA said that 30 parts per billion (ppb) in ready-to-eat foods was "safe." Recently, California officials have reported Florida citrus pulp to contain as much as 5,000 ppb of EDB and an average of 200 ppb over the last 5 years. That random Florida citrus sample was about 170 times more toxic than the level EPA considers safe. The Washington Post reported this morning that a random sample of Mexican citrus imported to Texas showed a level of EDB 70 times higher than EPA's recommended 30 ppb level. Citrus-producing States like Texas and Florida have increased portions of EDB-treated citrus fruit in their diets and suffer a greater risk of cancer.

We know we are being exposed to a dangerous chemical, but we do not know exactly what the danger is. We just do not know. EPA has known for a decade—since 1974—that EDB causes cancer in rats and mice and most likely in humans. EPA has known since the early 1970's that EDB does not dissipate in food, as was assumed in earlier years. EPA knows that EDB had been produced in the United States since the 1920's and used as a pesticide in the United States for almost 40 years. EPA know that about 15 million pounds of EDB had been used as a fumigant every year in this country. Yet, this administration has refused to act, despite the Carter EPA's formal recommendation in 1980 that its use be canceled. EPA has refused to act. To this day, no tolerance levels have been set. We know our food supply is contaminated, but we do not know how much. And, frankly, until very recently, EPA has been more of a hindrance than a help.

Now, finally, EPA is moving. Use of EDB as a soil fumigant was suspended late last year and just last week its use as a grain fumigant was suspended after the State of Florida set tolerance levels of its own and started pulling products off the shelf. EPA is waiting until alternatives are developed before suspending its use on citrus.

The problem is that there are no ready alternatives for EDB treatment of citrus. Yet, it is EDB residues in citrus that pose the highest and most dangerous concentrations. EDB has been popular because it is effective, easy to use, and versatile. It has been heavily relied upon. States that export fruit to other countries—as Texas does to Japan—have met USDA regulations in the past through the use of EDB. But, despite the fact that the handwriting has been on the wall for a long, long time, the USDA has not properly anticipated this inevitable outcome. And now we are in a bind. Research has not been pursued aggressively and applications have not been developed.

There are basically four chemical alternatives to EDB but all of them have acute and long-term adverse health effects quite similar to EBD. While two of these chemicals are known to cause cancer in mice and rats, tests pertaining to the carcinogenic nature of the other two have not ever been undertaken. That is a good example of a research gap in this area. Intensive testing of these chemicals could hasten a determination of their safety.

Some nonchemical alternatives exist as well. A method called gamma irradiation is a very promising prospect. This is where fruit is exposed to gamma rays. But irradiating fruit in this way may produce dangerous chemicals in the fruit. This is another example of a gaping hole in our research effort. The safety of these chemical byproducts can be determined by intensive testing which has just not yet been done.

Another possible method is known as long-term cold storage. Long-term cold storage of citrus bound for Japan has been attempted on a limited basis, but questions remain concerning the costs and availability of cold facilities.

Engineering research could yield more efficient means to achieve the necessary temperature. Enhanced efficiency could mean lower costs and improved availability. This is an engineering problem. But we just have not devoted to it the resources necessary to come up with an answer.

In 1980, the Texas Department of Agriculture established a sterile fruit fly program that has reduced by more than 80 percent the amount of EDB used to fumigate citrus. The program controls fruit flies through the release of sterile Mexican fruit flies along with a careful program of insect trapping and fruit cutting. EDB is used as a last resort only in Texas. In fact, last year 98 percent of Texas fruit was shipped without EDB fumigation.

That program saved Texas citrus producers $500,000 last year in fumigation costs and managed to displace more than 15,000 pounds of EDB. This is the kind of alternative that needs serious looking into if we are to ever put EDB behind us.

Science magazine recently reported that since 1977, the GAO has twice advised USDA to develop an agency-wide plan for R&D in the area of EDB alternatives, but to no avail. According to the article, studies by USDA have been "limited to short-term research projects * * * (which have) * * * resulted in the postponement of broader scoped, long-term research." Perhaps research like this only gets done when it is forced by stringent pesticide regulation. In this case, EPA has hardly forced the technology.

There are serious trade problems that have arisen in the wake of EDB's suspension. For example, we require Caribbean countries to fumigate with EDB the tropical fruit that they export to the United States. Their fruit exports are among the most important of their U.S. exports. If we suspend EDB as a citrus fumigant without a ready alternative, we have denied them access to our markets. This, of course, should be viewed in light of the recently approved Caribbean Basin Initiative in which we agreed to dramatically ease restrictions to U.S. markets for Caribbean nations. I read in the Washington Post on February 2 that many Caribbean countries have been erecting EDB fumigation chambers, with U.S. help, in anticipation of increased exports resulting from the CBI.

Apparently, the Soviet Union has expressed concern about the level of EDB contamination in the grain that we sell to them as well.

The possible suspension of EDB's use as a citrus fumigant poses a number of trade and regulatory problems that need to be addressed in the report that this amendment orders. And they need to be resolved soon.

I urge my colleagues' support for this amendment.

Mr. FUQUA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDREWS of Texas. I yield to the chairman of our committee, the gentleman from Florida (Mr. FUQUA).

Mr. FUQUA. I appreciate the gentleman yielding. I want to commend him for his amendment. I think it is a very constructive addition to the bill. We have examined it and we support the amendment.

Mr. PICKLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDREWS of Texas. I yield to my distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. PICKLE. Mr. Chairman, I support the amendment offered by my colleague, the gentleman from Texas (Mr. ANDREWS), which requires the administration to submit to Congress within 120 days a report on alternatives that are available to replace the use of the chemical EDB.

The State of Texas has been in the forefront of recent efforts to detect the presence of EDB in food products and has taken a lead in bringing this issue to the attention of concerned consumers throughout our Nation.

Scientists and health experts have known for years that EDB is a dangerous pesticide that has been found in some cases, to cause cancer, mutations, and sterility in laboratory animals. In spite of this known danger, action on removing this chemical from the market has been delayed for years. The result is that we will continue to see traces of EDB in our food products for several years to come, even now that restrictions have been imposed on its use.

I share the concern of some of the officials in the State of Texas who believe that the recently announced voluntary guidelines developed by EPA may be "too little, too late." Fortunately the State of Texas has moved quickly, not only to adopt the guidelines but to go beyond the EPA guidelines to impose restrictions on citrus as well.

I am confident that the officials in my State are working as diligently and as quickly as possible under the circumstances to remove products with EDB from the market.

At the Federal level, we must now look beyond the current crisis to insure that a safe and effective alternative pesticide is approved to replace the use of EDB. We must be sure that whatever chemicals or practices are employed to replace EDB are not found to be hazardous to consumers 5, 10, or 20 years down the road.

I commend the gentleman from Texas for his foresight in this regard by offering this amendment and I urge my colleagues to support his amendment so that Congress can be assured that work is progressing quickly on finding a suitable alternative to this dangerous chemical.

Mr. McGRATH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDREWS of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. McGRATH. The minority has looked at this amendment. We find it to be a worthy amendment that really costs no money. Perhaps we will take away some of the confusion that reigns around the country on this issue at the present time, particularly in the State of New York, as well as Florida, Texas, and California.

We accept the amendment and ask for its adoption.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas (Mr. ANDREWS).

The amendment was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. VOLKMER

Mr. VOLKMER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. VOLKMER: On page 3, line 9, after the words "Solid Waste Disposal Act" insert the following: ": Provided, That $1,000,000 is to be expended in fiscal year 1985 for fate studies and research into enhanced degradation of 2,3,7,8 tetrachlorodibenzo-p-dioxin."

Mr. VOLKMER (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard.

The Clerk will continue reading the amendment.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the amendment.

Mr. VOLKMER. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is self-explanatory.

This amendment directs the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) to conduct research into fate studies and the degradation of dioxin. Presently the agency is not placing enough emphasis in this area.

When the appropriations bill was before us in early June, I engaged in a colloquy with Mr. BOLAND of Massachusetts, and we agreed that research in the area of destruction and natural degradation would be allowed. Also, the report language of H.R. 2899 directs EPA to expend funds under this program in amounts necessary to determine the properties and half-life of dioxin in soil.

To further emphasize this, my colleague in the Senate, Senator EAGLETON, succeeded in adding $2 million for dioxin research on the EPA appropriations bill. The House then approved this addition as part of the conference report.

How much of this $2 million is EPA spending on this research? They are not sure—EPA could not give us an exact figure. But we do know that at most they are spending $130,000. That $130,000 is all of the $2 million that is being spent to study the natural transport and degradation of dioxin in the environment. This figure shows the agency is ignoring one of the primary purposes for which the money was appropriated.

Ron Kucera, deputy director of the Missouri Department of Natural Resources, testified before the Science and Technology Subcommittee on Investigations and Oversight that through basic research we may learn that there are effective methods for enhancing and accelerating natural dioxin degradation. Missouri has approximately 500,000 tons of dioxin-contaminated soil and even though incineration has been proposed as a treatment method, it is estimated that the total cost for this treatment would be $2,000 per ton or more than $1 billion.

Basic research would allow us to make confident predictions about the behavior and half-life of dioxin in Missouri soils. Progress is being made regarding accelerated degradation using enzymes, but further research is needed. We cannot afford to base multimillion dollar remedial action decisions on nickel-and-dime research.

My amendment would simply authorize the appropriation of $1 million for fate studies—how dioxin reacts and breaks down in the environment, what happens to it as it sits there in the soil—and for research into speeding up the degradation process.

Citizens in Missouri need this research, as do citizens of States like Michigan, New Jersey, Arkansas, California, Illinois, Kansas, New York, Ohio, Oregon, and Pennsylvania, States which have discovered dioxin problems. As this list indicates, the kind of research I advocate is important to the entire Nation. I urge the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. FUQUA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOLKMER. I am glad to yield to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. FUQUA. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, we have had a chance to examine the amendment. We think it is a good amendment. We have no objection. We urge the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. McGRATH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. VOLKMER. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. McGRATH. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, the minority has examined the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri and in view of the fact that it just directs a portion of the money in the bill without increasing the total amount so that it is directed toward the degradation problem, we support it and urge its adoption.

Mr. VOLKMER. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri (Mr. VOLKMER).

The amendment was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. GLICKMAN

Mr. GLICKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GLICKMAN: At the end of the bill add the following new section:

ALTERNATIVES TO LAND DISPOSAL

SEC. 9. From the amount appropriated pursuant to the authorization for fiscal year 1985 under section 2(a)(4) of this Act for research, development, and demonstration on control technologies, the Administrator shall expend not less than 25 percent of such amount on control technologies which may serve as feasible alternatives to land disposal, storage, and containment.

Mr. GLICKMAN (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. GLICKMAN. Mr. Chairman, this amendment would not add any money to the bill at all. This amendment would direct the Administrator of EPA to spend not less than 25 percent of the funds authorized for control technologies research and development under section 2(a)(4) of this bill on R&D on feasible alternatives to land disposal. Last fall, this House approved amendments to the Resource Conservation and Recovery Act which significantly restricted the use of land disposal and clearly stated, as an objective, "minimizing the generation of hazardous waste and the land disposal of hazardous wastes * * *." That is clearly a shift away from land disposal, and it is one that is also being pursued by a good number of the States.

Those decisions have been sound ones. Some 86 percent of the sites designed for cleanup under the Superfund legislation were land disposal or storage sites. In my district, such a landfill—the Furley site—is a potential time bomb that we are trying to grapple with right now. The seeping contamination from the Furley site, I am sure, will be repeated time and again around the country from land disposal sites that are already out there. I would lay odds that nearly every one of us has at least one land disposal site in our district, and they will all eventually need serious and expensive cleanup work.

Now that we have decided to move away from land disposal, it is essential that we see that the necessary research and development proceeds so that alternatives to land disposal can be vigorously pursued. Not to do so would mean that we have told American businesses to move away from land disposal without effectively moving them toward responsible alternatives.

As it stands now, the Office of Technology Assessment tells us that only about 10 percent of EPA's research and development on control technologies is directed toward land disposal alternatives. Given the concerns that have developed, the policy enunciated in the RCRA legislation by the House, and the wide ranging consensus among technical experts that land disposal is a flawed and risky technology, that falls far short of what is needed. This amendment merely directs that we focus on the needed R&D work on these alternatives. It modestly calls for commitment of 25 percent of these funds to bringing these alternatives on line. I, personally, think we could go much higher, but, in the interest of reaching a consensus, this amendment will send EPA a message about the direction they need to follow.

Mr. FUQUA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GLICKMAN. I yield to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. FUQUA. I appreciate the gentleman yielding to me.

Mr. Chairman, I want to commend the gentleman from Kansas (Mr. GLICKMAN) for his amendment. I know of his longtime concern with respect to the problem of hazardous waste disposal. I think his amendment makes a significant contribution to the bill and we support the amendment.

Mr. McGRATH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GLICKMAN. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. McGRATH. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, the minority has had an opportunity to examine the gentleman's amendment. We find it is in conformity with our wishes.

Mr. Chairman, we support the amendment.

Mr. GLICKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the gentleman's comments.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas (Mr. GLICKMAN).

The amendment was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. WALKER

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman, I offer a modified amendment to the one offered previously.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WALKER: On page 17, after line 16, insert the following new subsection:

SEC. 10. It is the sense of the Congress that, with respect to authorities contained in this bill, the Environmental Protection Agency shall give priority to full cooperation with local citizens groups who are trying to protect and preserve the environmental quality of their communities.

Mr. FUQUA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALKER. I yield to the committee chairman.

Mr. FUQUA. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I would like to reiterate that under the revised germane conditions of the amendment, we again have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. WALKER. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. McGRATH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALKER. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. McGRATH. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I want to just say, Mr. Chairman, that the minority has had an opportunity to examine this most germane amendment and we urge its adoption.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from New York. It is nice to be loved and germane at the same time.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. WALKER).

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EVANS of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of this bill, H.R. 2899, the Environmental Research, Development, and Demonstration Act.

Mr. Chairman, as Members of this body will remember, a few years ago, a very successful demonstration project under the Environmental Protection Agency, the Administration on Aging, and the Department of Labor established the senior environmental employment program in 10 States.

H.R. 2899 contains a reauthorization for the senior environmental employment program and would authorize the Administrator of EPA to continue and expand this vital program. The reauthorization contained in H.R. 2899 would achieve the same goal—the continuance of the SEE program—as a bill which I introduced early in this session—H.R. 569, which currently has 32 cosponsors.

This demonstration conducted a few years back was a project which hired over 200 senior citizens for a variety of activities. Examples of these activities include a statewide survey of hazardous-waste generators, and implementation of a hazardous-waste manifest system in New Jersey, and an Illinois program to monitor the quality of the State's water supplies.

SEE is a direct-employment program under which the EPA hires elderly individuals. The primary task of these participants is to assist State and local governments with environmental-control programs. They have in the past helped to implement various programs such as ECHO—Each Community Helping Others—a State and local program which helped to transfer local noise-control expertise from one town to another with little or no financial assistance from EPA.

During the demonstration period, the Foundation for Applied Research, an independent contractor to the AOA, examined the results of the program—they concluded that the demonstration was a great success—not only because it helped environmental programs in a way that cannot be measured in dollars and cents—or because the program provided cost-beneficial employment to a segment of the society which is too often presumed to be unproductive and too often is underemployed—but also because of the benefits that the program provided to its participants to engage are not only socially beneficial but provide for community interaction for a group which too often isolated.

Mr. Chairman, even against a tough, analytic yardstick, the SEE program is productive. During the demonstration project, the evaluation revealed that employment of senior citizens in environmental areas resulted in a cost savings of 16.4 percent of labor costs. The demonstration was so successful that the final evaluation recommended that it be expanded to all 50 States—this is just what this legislation will accomplish.

The Environmental Research, Development, and Demonstration Act authorizes expanded use of senior citizens in both EPA national and regional offices. It will allow the employment of eligible older Americans to work on such activities as air monitoring and emission testing, pesticide inventory and control, water-supply sampling and monitoring, technical libraries and public information, carcinogenic surveys and followups, hazardous-waste-materials routing surveys, rural health screening, and noise abatement and control programs.

This program allows enviromental agencies to tap a highly motivated, highly skilled, and experienced work force. Approximately 1.4 million older Americans are unemployed and seeking work. Older Americans already possess a broad range of skills and extensive on-the-job training. Older workers also have excellent records of hard work, reliability, and low absenteeism. Second, our system actively discriminates against the older worker. The U.S. Commission on Civil Rights concluded that employment discrimination against the elderly was widespread in Federal jobs programs. The Commission said:

> We are shocked at the cavalier manner in which our society neglects older persons who often desperately need federally supported services and benefits.

In addition to the older Americans who are seeking work, there are hundreds of thousands or workers over the age of 55 who are so-called discouraged workers—people who have given up looking for a job but would take one if it were offered. Many of these citizens are economically disadvantaged. And yet the demonstration project showed that these older workers, if given the chance, can be more productive per dollar of Federal cost than other workers in the same fields of endeavor.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to point out to my colleagues that when I had the opportunity to offer an amendment—which was substantially the same in nature—to the EPA research and development bill last year, this amendment was endorsed by a wide variety of national organizations. Those endorsing my efforts are: the Natural Resources Defense Council, the Sierra Club, and the Friends of the Earth. In addition, in a recent letter, the Administrator of the EPA has urged the quick passage of a authorization for this program and, last year, the President included a special note praising the worthiness of the SEE program in the veto message of S. 2577, the Environmental Research, Development, and Demonstration Act of 1983, introduced in the 97th Congress. As Members of this body remember, the bill was vetoed for reasons unrelated to this program.

In closing, I say that this program will help the EPA stretch its already lean budget and assist older Americans to obtain productive and meaningful employment by allowing them to give future generations the benefits of cleaner and safer environment. I urge the passage of this legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there further amendments to the bill?

Under the rule, the Committee rises.

Accordingly the Committee rose and the Speaker pro tempore (Mr. DURBIN) having assumed the chair, Mr. HUBBARD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that, Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 2899) to authorize appropriations for environmental research, development, and demonstration for the fiscal years 1984 and 1985, and for other purposes, pursuant to House Resolution 429, he reported the bill back to the House with sundry amendments adopted by the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered.

Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them en gros.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. EDWARDS of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 362, nays 9, not voting 62, as follows:

Mr. DANNEMEYER changed his vote from "yea" to "nay."

Mrs. LLOYD and Mr. ARCHER changed their votes from "nay" to "yea."

So the bill was passed.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. FUQUA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks and to include extraneous matter on H.R. 2899, the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

FURTHER MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A further message from the Senate, by Mr. Sparrow, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 1340) entitled "An act to revise and extend the Rehabilitation Act of 1973 and to extend the Developmental Disability Assistance and Bill of Rights Act, and for other purposes."

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

The SPEAKER pro tempore The Chair lays before the House the following message from the Senate. The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the concurrent resolution from the House of Representatives (H. Con. Res. 255) entitled "Concurrent resolution providing for an adjournment of the House from February 9 to 21, 1984, and an adjournment of the Senate from February 9 or February 10 to February 20, 1984," do pass with the following amendment:

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

SEC. 2. The Speaker of the House and the Majority Leader of the Senate, acting jointly after consultation with the minority leader of the House and the minority leader of the Senate, shall notify the Members of the House and the Senate, respectively, to reassemble whenever, in their opinion, the public interest shall warrant it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the Senate amendment.

The Senate amendment was concurred in.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

(Mr. FOLEY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, I take the time to inform the Members that this concludes the business for today and for the remainder of the week. We will be announcing the program for the week beginning on February 22 next week, and Members will be advised of that schedule through their offices.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOLEY. I yield to the distinguished Republican whip.

Mr. LOTT. I take it that our offices will be notified in writing the first part of next week as to what the schedule will be for the following week?

Mr. FOLEY. That is correct.

Mr. LOTT. Could the gentleman give us any information about the first part of the week? I understand we will be coming back in on Tuesday. Are we to expect suspensions and recorded votes on that first day, or do we know at this time?

Mr. FOLEY. If the gentleman will yield, I would suggest to the membership that on Tuesday, February 21, we will, in all likelihood, have no legislative business scheduled. Because the House will be in session that day, it is possible that there could be a procedural vote; but we do not intend to schedule any legislation at this juncture. It is, therefore, unlikely that legislative business will be scheduled until Wednesday, the following day.

Mr. LOTT. Do we anticipate then, on that Wednesday, that we come in at 3 o'clock, as I believe our schedule calls for?

Mr. FOLEY. Yes; our current plan is to come in on Wednesday at 3 o'clock, as the normal procedure would indicate.

Mr. LOTT. Do we have any idea at this point whether or not we will have legislative business on Friday?

Mr. FOLEY. I am sorry, I cannot definitively advise the gentleman on that, but it is my strong presumption that there will be no legislative business on Friday. The schedule will be announced next week, as the gentleman has indicated.

Mr. LOTT. I thank the gentleman.

AUTHORIZING THE SPEAKER TO APPOINT MEMBERS TO REPRESENT THE HOUSE AT GEORGE WASHINGTON BIRTHDAY CEREMONIES

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that it shall be in order for the Speaker to appoint two Members of the House, one upon the recommendation of the minority leader, to represent the House of Representatives at appropriate ceremonies on February 22, 1984, the birthday of George Washington.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

AUTHORIZING THE SPEAKER TO ACCEPT RESIGNATIONS, AND TO APPOINT COMMISSIONS, BOARDS, AND COMMITTEES, NOTWITHSTANDING ADJOURNMENT

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that, notwithstanding any adjournment of the House until Tuesday, February 21, 1984, the Speaker be authorized to accept resignations, and to appoint commissions, boards, and committees authorized by law or by the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

DISPENSING WITH CALENDAR WEDNESDAY BUSINESS ON WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 22, 1984

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the business in order on Calendar Wednesday, February 22, 1984, may be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. DONNELLY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks and to include therein extraneous material on the subject of the special order today by the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. SHARP).

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

SELECTION OF MEMBERS TO BE ACCREDITED BY THE PRESIDENT AS OFFICIAL ADVISERS RELATING TO TRADE AGREEMENTS DURING 2D SESSION OF THE 98TH CONGRESS

The SPEAKER. Pursuant to the provisions of section 161(a), Public Law 93-618, and upon recommendation of the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, the Chair has selected the following members of that committee to be accredited by the President as official advisers to the U.S. delegations to international conferences, meetings, and negotiation sessions relating to trade agreements during the 2d session of the 98th Congress: Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI of Illinois; Mr. GIBBONS of Florida; Mr. JONES of Oklahoma; Mr. VANDER JAGT of Michigan; and Mr. FRENZEL of Minnesota.

FURTHER MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A further message from the Senate, by Mr. Sparrow, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill of the House of the following title:

H.R. 1557. An act for the relief of William D. Benoni.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments in which the concurrence of the House is requested, a bill of the House of the following title:

H.R. 4336. An act to make certain miscellaneous changes in laws relating to the civil service.

LEGISLATION TO UPDATE THE COMMUNICATIONS ACT OF 1934

(Mr. GORE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. GORE. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing today for myself and Mr. WAXMAN, Mr. SWIFT, Mr. BATES, Mr. MOORHEAD, Mr. RINALDO, and Mr. OXLEY H.R. 4840, a bill to update the Communications Act of 1934 by making restrictions limiting alien ownership of broadcast and common carrier licenses applicable to the new video technologies that are rapidly overtaking the television marketplace. The purpose of this bill is to prohibit control of major television networks which do not directly own licenses and large cable television systems by foreign entities or aliens. The bill also would relieve the Federal Communications Commission of the burden to examine, on a case-by-case basis, whether the "public interest will be served by the refusal or revocation" of a common carrier or broadcast license to an alien or foreign entity.

When the Communications Act of 1934 was enacted, Congress established a basic policy against granting radio licenses to aliens. The rationale for these restrictions was the recognition that the airwaves were a limited resource and the congressional desire that they be held in public trust for use by and for the benefit of the American people. An equally important concern giving rise to the alien ownership restrictions were national security considerations. In the event that the security of the United States was ever in jeopardy, a strong and united response required close coordination between U.S. communication systems. The Congress found that such coordination would be facilitated by preventing aliens from owning common carrier and broadcast licenses.

The bill that I am introducing today would simply reaffirm this longstanding congressional policy and extend it to new video technologies and distribution media that were neither in existence at the time of passage of this act nor contemplated by its authors.

It is important to recognize that alien ownership restrictions are not unprecedented in Federal law. Indeed, many of the basic U.S. industries regulated by the U.S. Government are subject to such limitations and prohibitions.

Examples of industries in which Federal laws either prohibit or limit foreign ownership or investment include, among others: energy and natural resources, aviation coastal shipping, fishing, national defense service industries, and broadcasting.

Moreover, the United States is not alone in the world in restricting foreign ownership and investment, especially in the communications area. No other country allows the degree of foreign ownership in its broadcast and cable television companies that is possible in the United States. Although we in the United States take pride in the fact that our telecommunications media are privately owned, we must be careful to insure that the public airwaves continue to be held in the public interest and for the benefit of American viewers.

My bill addresses the problem of bringing the Communications Act up to date with the virtual explosion in video technologies for distributing programing to the viewing public. When the 1934 Communications Act was enacted, cable television was an unknown technology. The cable industry has grown to the point where 38 percent of all television households are penetrated by cable with more than 30 million basic cable subscribers. It is apparent that the cable industry will continue to grow until its penetration of TV households competes directly with existing broadcast media.

The Congress has monitored this explosion in new video technologies with a vigilent eye but, in the case of cable television, a light regulatory touch. At present, the cable industry generally has been deregulated by the FCC. I applaud this policy.

I believe my bill is completely consistent with the goal of deregulation. However, I also believe that it is essential to our national security, the health of our economy which is becoming increasingly information based, and the ability of the United States to compete throughout the world that we impose a minimum requirement that only U.S. citizens have the unquestioned control of these new video technologies.

I urge my colleagues to carefully consider this bill and that the Committee on Energy and Commerce reports it favorably to the full House.

FARMERS LOAN REFORM

Mr. SPEAKER. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Arkansas (Mr. ALEXANDER) is recognized for 20 minutes.

● Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing legislation to speed up the procedures for approving farmer's loan applications.

My bill would require the Farmers Home Administration to make a final decision on farm operating loans, economic emergency loans, and economic disaster loans, within 60 days of the time county offices receive an application.

I represent the First Congressional District of Arkansas, which is not a wealthy part of the Nation.

We have some 20,000-plus farmers, and many of them are suffering economic pain today.

They are suffering from a cycle of Federal policies that is creating a cycle of problems.

The $200 billion budget deficits have kept interest rates high. When farmers need money to survive, money is hard to find and the cost of borrowing money is unfairly high.

While budget deficits have pushed interest rates upward, high interest rates have contributed to a dollar that is overvalued by over 20 percent. This overvalued dollar has made American exports less competitive.

The result is a trade deficit that may reach $100 billion. America's farms, which are the most competitive farms in the world, are rendered less competitive to the degree the dollar is overvalued.

Sales are lost and farmers are victimized again.

Meanwhile, while our Government delays when farmers come for help, many foreign governments do not. Foreign governments provide subsidies that give foreign farmers an unfair advantage.

The domestic recession, high budget deficits, and high interest rates have hurt farmers at home. An overvalued dollar, unfair foreign competition, and a slow world economy have reduced our sales abroad.

The domestic and international problems were compounded by drought this past summer.

The damage was devastating.

In 1983, Arkansas alone suffered over $400 million damage.

Many counties in eastern Arkansas have suffered losses of 50 percent in sorghum, soybean, and cotton crops.

Clay County, one of the major cotton producing areas in the State, lost almost three-fourths of the 1983 cotton crop, as well as some 65 percent of the sorghum crop, 45 percent of the soybeans, and 25 percent of the corn.

Nationwide, soybean production in 1983 was down 28 percent from 1982. The average yield was down over 30 percent.

Cotton production was down 35 percent from 1982. In the delta States, it was down almost 50 percent.

Rice yields averaged over 100 pounds an acre less than in 1982.

I urge my colleagues, particularly those from nonfarming districts, to understand the devastating consequences to America's farms.

Mr. Speaker, these are not just numbers. The numbers reflect people in trouble. The numbers reflect family farms endangered, others foreclosed. The numbers reflect years of hard work that are jeopardized by factors beyond the farmers' control. The numbers reflect families struggling to survive.

These people deserve, and pay taxes to support, a Government that understands their problems and responds fairly to their needs. Yet too often they find a Government in Washington that is uncaring, distant, or slow to respond in times of crises.

The bill I introduce today is simple. It would require that decisions be made, on operating loans, emergency loans, and disaster loans, within 60 days of the time that applications are received by the county office.

I believe that this limit is fair and reasonable. I believe that farmers deserve a response from their Government within a fair and reasonable period of time.

Our farmers are competing against farmers from abroad who receive far greater support from their government. It is about time that the American Government take care of American farmers as foreign governments take care of foreign farmers.

One way to do this is to respond in a humane and efficient manner when our farmers come for help in times of trouble.●

NATIONAL COIN WEEK RESOLUTION INTRODUCED

The SPEAKER. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. ANNUNZIO) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation to designate April 15 to 21, 1984, as National Coin Week. More than 8 million Americans share an interest in collecting coins. This year's theme, "Numismatics: A Foundation for Friendship," is illustrative of part of the joy of being a coin collector. As coins are a thing of value, so are friendships. And many friendships are created over discussing and comparing coin collections.

We all recognize the intrinsic value of a coin. But coins are symbolic as well. We have all thrown a penny into a fountain, wishing for good luck in life for ourselves and our friends. We have donated coins to charities to exercise good will toward our fellow man. Even flipping a coin to resolve a dispute between friends is a common occurrence.

Coins encourage friendship by promoting the study of different cultures. As the numismatist examines ancient coins, he also studies the civilizations that produced those coins. This study of coins and their historical significance leads to an increased understanding among nations and among people.

The spirit of camaraderie is apparent throughout numismatic circles. Through publications and conventions, coin collectors gather to share friendship and examine coins of value. National Coin Week encourages collection by publicizing a wonderful hobby and occupation. National Coin Week serves a marvelous purpose, and it is a privilege to be introducing this legislation to honor numismatics.

Over 800 local coin clubs are scattered across the 50 States and the overseas military installations. The membership of these clubs attests to the basic interest in, and value of, coin collecting. Friendships are formed as people meet through these clubs, and members benefit from long and sincere friendships based upon a common interest in numismatics. The interest in numismatics is worldwide, and the bonds of friendship produced by coin collecting are strong.

Congress has issued commemorative proclamations for National Coin Week on several occasions in the past. Legislation authorizing National Coin Week 1983 was cosponsored by 232 of my colleagues. I hope that National Coin Week 1984 will again be the subject of such widespread congressional support. This year, National Coin Week will promote the value of friendship. I believe that we should once again recognize National Coin Week, and I urge my colleagues to join me as cosponsors.●

SINGLE AUDIT ACT OF 1984

The SPEAKER. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Texas (Mr. BROOKS) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing the Single Audit Act of 1984. This legislation is designed to assure greater accountability in the use of the more than $90 billion in Federal financial assistance provided to State and local governments each year. It is also intended to enable these governments to audit their Federal assistance funds in a less costly and more efficient manner.

My bill will require each State and local government receiving $100,000 or more per year in Federal financial assistance to obtain a single, annual, organizationwide, financial and compliance audit in lieu of the many grant-by-grant audits now required. Such governments will also be responsible for seeing that any Federal funds they pass through to subrecipients are properly audited.

To help assure that Federal funds have been spent as Congress intended, auditors conducting single audits must perform compliance tests on all major Federal programs and a sample of other programs. In addition, when an audit reveals that a government has not complied with important grant requirements or has not maintained adequate management controls over Federal funds, the recipient must submit a plan for appropriate corrective action.

To assist State and local auditors in obtaining reimbursement for the costs associated with conducting single audits, my bill specifies that Federal funds may be used to pay for a portion of the single audit and directs the Office of Management and Budget to set standards for determining the appropriate Federal share of the costs incurred.

Finally, my bill provides for Federal agencies to conduct additional audits of Federal assistance funds if such audits are necessary to fulfill their responsibilities under Federal law. Furthermore, my bill contains provisions intended to assure that small and minority accounting firms are afforded the maximum practicable opportunity to perform single audits. Without these protections, such firms might be adversely affected by the transition from grant-by-grant auditing to the single audit.

Mr. Speaker, hearings held by the Government Operations Committee in 1979 revealed that the traditional grant-by-grant approach to auditing Federal assistance programs is uncoordinated, inefficient, and ineffective. As a result, the Committee recommended the adoption of a single audit approach. Grant recipients would be audited on an organizationwide basis rather than a grant-by-grant basis. Responding to the Committee's recommendation, the Office of Management and Budget has tried to implement this approach through administrative action. Its regulations are contained in an attachment P to its circular A-102, which prescribes administrative requirements for grants to State and local governments.

In 1982, the committee held hearings to review the implementation of the attachment P single audit requirements and to consider proposals to make the single audit statutory. The committee found that because of numerous problems, the single audit approach had not been widely implemented. It, therefore, recommended that Congress defer action on single audit legislation.

Mr. Speaker, over the past 2 years, the pace of single audit implementation has been slow and problems persist. Moreover, it now appears that legislative action is necessary to secure the potential benefits offered by this approach. The Single Audit Act of 1984 is a carefully balanced proposal designed to assure adequate oversight of Federal grant funds at a reasonable cost. I urge colleagues to support it.●

FREEZING THE NUCLEAR ARMS RACE

The SPEAKER. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. HAYES) is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Speaker, as I am certain every Member of this body knows, the U.S. Congress, as a whole, has yet to go on record in favor of freezing the nuclear arms race. The existence of thousands upon thousands of nuclear warheads—in the United States and in the Soviet Union—makes it quite clear that neither side will ever achieve nuclear superiority over the other. Rather than posing a deterrent to attack, the increased production and deployment of these weapons systems has only brought us closer to annihilation as a people. There is no more dangerous threat to the very existence of mankind than the existence and proliferation of nuclear weapons.

It is in this context that I wish to share with my colleagues the following letter from over 200 members of the faculty of the University of Chicago:

[From the Chicago Maroon, Friday, May 27, 1983]

AN OPEN LETTER TO THE U.S. CONGRESS FROM MEMBERS OF THE FACULTY OF THE UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO

We need a pause in the nuclear arms race.

The United States Congress can take the lead.

We need a pause before the United States and the Soviet Union take the fateful, irrevocable steps to counterforce, "limited nuclear war" arsenals.

The recent proposals for defensive weapons based in space must not distract our attention from the crucial issue of what to do about the extreme danger posed by the proliferation of nuclear weapons systems. Indeed if these proposals were implemented they would initiate a new round in the arms race.

We ask Congress to put "on hold" the building, testing, and deployment of new weapons systems with destabilizing counterforce capability. These include the MX, Cruise, Trident, and Pershing missiles. We suggest that an initial pause lasting one year would be an appropriate action. It would give evidence of our desire to end the arms race, and would focus immediate attention around the world on the Soviet Union. The Russian government would be placed under enormous pressure to match or to exceed our action. If it did, the two superpowers would have succeeded in taking the difficult first steps toward a nuclear freeze and eventual arms reduction.

The proposed pause would not endanger our nation or its allies. Our ability to deter attack would not be compromised. The United States would retain the power of its existing vast arsenal, an arsenal whose retaliatory capability is invulnerable to any foreseeable attack.

We the undersigned respectfully urge you to take this bold step. It would not endanger our nation, and it could help avert nuclear catastrophe:

RESOLUTION IN SUPPORT OF FOREIGN LANGUAGE STUDIES

The SPEAKER. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California (Mr. PANETTA) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Speaker, the security and prosperity of the United States have come to depend more than ever on our ability to communicate with other nations. The revolution in Iran, the continuing cycle of violence in Lebanon, and the threat of upheaval in Central America have been unwelcome reminders that our national security does indeed depend on events outside our national control. International economic competition from Japan, West Germany, and the nations of the developing world threaten our ability to export American products and further illustrate the need to improve our understanding of other cultures, languages, and economic systems. Yet in the face of a world becoming more closely intertwined economically, politically, and militarily, the President is attempting to eliminate for the second time the most critical foreign language and international studies program in this Nation.

I oppose President Reagan's fiscal year 1985 budget proposal to eliminate the Office of International Education and Foreign Language Studies in the Department of Education. I believe the President's proposal is extremely shortsighted and if accepted by Congress, would be detrimental to the national security and economic prosperity of the United States. Accordingly, I am today introducing a resolution which expresses the sense of the Congress that fiscal year 1985 funding levels for Federal foreign language and international education and exchange programs should be maintained or increased above fiscal year 1984 levels.

Many leading members of the education and defense-security communities have voiced their opposition to the elimination of this vital program. Last year, when the President first proposed the elimination of the Office of International Education, Secretary of Defense Caspar Weinberger wrote to Secretary of Education Terrell Bell requesting that he restore or increase funding for this program. More recently, Secretary Bell's own National Advisory Board on International Education concluded that the programs conducted by the Office of International Education "play a crucial role in insuring the availability of an adequate capacity in this country for foreign languages and international studies. The Board commends the aims, objectives, and accomplishments of these programs and strongly endorses their continuation."

According to some of our Nation's leading defense and intelligence experts, the crucial shortfall in the foreign language proficiency of our diplomatic and intelligence communities is cause for both alarm and immediate action. In 1981, Adm. Bobby Inman, former Deputy Director of the Central Intelligence Agency, testified that "the importance of adequate foreign language capability in the intelligence community cannot be overstated. The foreign language capability of our country is poor and getting worse." Admiral Inman went on to document the importance of foreign language proficiency to U.S. intelligence activities, and the growing problems the CIA, the NSA, and other intelligence agencies are having in recruiting qualified linguists. He said that "decisive action should be taken on the Federal level to insure improvement in foreign language training in the United States."

Craig Wilson, Special Assistant to the Secretary or Defense for Intelligence and Human Resources, has testified that of the 13,000 positions in the Department of Defense which require foreign language capability, only half are filled by individuals with the necessary language competence. This critical lack of foreign language skills in our Armed Forces could have dire consequences in the event of war. As the former Commander in Chief of the U.S. Army in Europe—Gen. George Blanchard—once wrote:

> Language interoperability is not just a nice-to-have professional skill. In time of war, it may prove to be a decisive element on any potential NATO battlefield.

Perhaps the greatest impact of our lack of proficiency in foreign languages has been in the field of international diplomacy. In 1980, when a Soviet soldier in Afghanistan sought asylum in the American Embassy, none of the Embassy staff could speak to him in Russian. Only 6 of the 60 American diplomats in Iran in 1978 spoke the local language, and when the Embassy was seized, only 2 of the remaining staff could communicate with their captors. Before the Vietnam war, this country did not have even five American-born experts who could speak the Vietnamese language. What a difference a few more experts might have made.

Our most critical shortfall in the field of diplomacy is in the less commonly taught languages, Russian, Arabic, Chinese, and Japanese, which together, comprise 80 percent of the world's spoken languages. The State Department's overall compliance rate in filling Foreign Service positions that require minimum language competence is a sad 66 percent. However, in the less commonly taught languages, the compliance rate is much lower, only 35 percent in Chinese and in Arabic. Furthermore, according to a study prepared for the President's Commission on Foreign Languages and International Studies, less than half of the Federal positions requiring proficiency in Russian are actually filled by individuals competent in that language.

While there are no easy solutions to correct our lack of foreign language skills, the Office of International Education is one of the best means we have of improving the language capabilities of our intelligence and diplomatic communities. The Office's primary function is to help fund the 91 National Foreign Language and Area Studies Resource Centers around the country, 14 of which focus on the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe. These National Centers are our primary source of candidates for Federal positions in the fields of intelligence, diplomacy, and national defense. In addition, the National Centers are virtually our sole source of specialists in the less commonly taught but strategically important languages and cultures. While the Federal contribution to the national centers constitutes only a portion of their total operating budgets, the Federal funds represent seed money which encourages private donations and symbolizes our Nation's commitment to improving our foreign language capabilities.

The Office of International Education funds several other programs which are essential to the improvement of our communications skills in this interdependent world. The foreign language and area studies fellowship program offers full year and summer scholarships to graduate students and teachers in order to improve their language competence and knowledge in interdisciplinary fields. The Office also provides grants for undergraduate international education and for the Nation's entire research program devoted to the development of teaching materials for over 170 foreign languages. Most important, the Office funds four essential Fulbright-Hays programs including foreign curriculum consulting, faculty research abroad, and group projects abroad. This last program helps to fund the Overseas Resource Centers where American graduate students study Arabic, Russian, Chinese, Turkish, Indonesian, and other languages while living in these various countries.

Mr. Speaker, the fiscal year 1984 budget for the Office of International Education is just $30.8 million, less than 2 percent of the total budget for the Department of Education. Yet in spite of the obvious contribution the Office makes to our national security and economic potential, President Reagan attempted to cut funding for the program by over 50 percent in fiscal year 1983, and he proposed the elimination of the program in fiscal years 1984 and 1985. Thankfully, Congress has consistently rejected the President's proposals in this area, and approved funding increases for the Office of International Education for fiscal years 1983 and 1984. My resolution expresses the sense of the Congress that for 1985, the program conducted by the Office of International Education should be funded at least at 1984 levels.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that through the Office of International Education and Foreign Language Studies, the Federal Government can play an important role in the preparation of our Nation for the decades to come. Federal policy in this area can set an important precedent for the actions of State and local governments, businesses, foundations, and individuals. But in the final analysis, the Federal Government holds the ultimate responsibility for the Nation's security and well-being. This responsibility involves guaranteeing that our Nation has the talent necessary to protect our vital national interests, at home and abroad.

I believe that we need to produce diplomats, intelligence experts, military personnel, and corporate executives who are competent in foreign languages and knowledgeable about world affairs. The programs conducted by the Office of International Education can help provide us with these essential human resources. The cost is small and the benefits for our Nation will be great. I urge my colleagues to support this resolution, and I hope that we will continue to advocate a strong Federal role in American foreign language and international education. The resolution follows:

H. CON. RES. 258

Concurrent resolution expressing the sense of Congress that funding levels for Federal foreign language and international education and exchange programs should be maintained or increased

Whereas a number of national education task forces and commissions, including the National Commission on Excellence in Education, have outlined a serious decline in the study of foreign languages in the United States and have recommended increased second language training at all educational levels;

Whereas leading members of the defense and intelligence communities have expressed concern about America's lack of expertise in international studies and in foreign language proficiency;

Whereas the United States has produced insufficient numbers of qualified area studies and foreign language specialists during the last decade to meet our future defense, diplomatic, and intelligence needs;

Whereas the study of the less commonly taught but strategically important languages and cultures such as Japanese, Chinese, Arabic, and Russian is extremely limited in the United States;

Whereas new programs in the combined study of business, foreign languages, and international relations would make a significant contribution to the reversal of America's declining economic competitiveness in international trade;

Whereas in comparison with the investments of America's allies and potential adversaries, the United States Government's investment in foreign language and international education historically has been quite small;

Whereas approximately 80 percent of the Nation's foreign language training in the less commonly taught languages takes place at federally funded National Resource Centers for Foreign Languages and International Studies;

Whereas for fiscal years 1984 and 1985 the present Administration has recommended zero budget funding for the Office of International Education and Foreign Language Studies, which funds the National Resource Centers and the Fulbright-Hays Scholarship program; and

Whereas Congress has consistently rejected the Administration's proposals and fully funded the Office of International Education and Foreign Language Studies for fiscal year 1984: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That it is the sense of the Congress that the fiscal year 1985 funding levels for Federal foreign language and international education and exchange programs should be maintained or increased above fiscal year 1984 levels.●

LEGISLATION PROMOTING METHANOL AS AN AUTOMOTIVE FUEL

The SPEAKER. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. SHARP) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. SHARP. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing today, with my colleagues Mr. BROYHILL, Mr. DANNEMEYER, Mr. HEFTEL, and Mr. WYDEN, a legislative proposal to promote the use of methanol as an automotive fuel. It is the result of 2 years work by the Fossil and Synthetic Fuels Subcommittee, including hearings, an investigation, and a report.

I believe the course of action it suggests can reduce America's oil imports, improve the air quality of our cities, and help restore the health of our coal industry. Methanol offers an opportunity to turn our most plentiful energy resource—coal—into our most needed form of energy—liquids for transportation. Doing so will reduce our energy dependence, balance of trade deficits, air pollution, and unemployment.

In recent years we have become increasingly aware of the importance of solving the problems of energy, the environment, trade imbalance, and chronic unemployment in certain regions and industries. Unfortunately, we also learned that solutions proposed to resolve one of these problems often exacerbated one or more of the others. Proposals to produce more energy or burn it more efficiently, for example, often threatened additional environmental difficulties, and environmental safeguards appeared to increase oil imports and further depress the coal industry.

Methanol as an automotive fuel can make significant contributions to the resolution of all of these problems. It will allow us to put U.S. coal in our cars, and to burn it cleanly.

An alcohol fuel that can be produced from coal, gas, or other sources, methanol has long been used as a racing car fuel. Although other alternative fuels are in various stages of development, methanol is considered by most experts consulted during our investigation—including representatives of auto and energy companies—to be the alternative most likely to replace gasoline.

Market forces alone will probably lead to the widespread use of methanol in cars and buses sometime in the future. The transition will be delayed, however, and the lost benefits to the Nation will be large if preparation does not begin during the current world oil surplus.

The benefits of replacing gasoline and diesel fuel with methanol made from domestic coal are enormous. Gasoline accounts for over 40 percent of the Nation's oil use—more than the amount of oil we import. Conversion of just 20 percent of our cars to a coal-based fuel would reduce oil imports by approximately 470 million barrels per year, resulting in a reduction of roughly $15 billion in the balance of payments deficit.

If the methanol is produced from coal, 20 percent of U.S. cars would create a market for an additional 300 million tons of coal per year—an increase of 36 percent over 1982 domestic production. This would mean the creation of 10,000 to 20,000 jobs directly in the coal industry, with additional jobs created indirectly in related jobs. Because higher-sulfur coal can be converted to methanol, many of these jobs could be created in areas where the coal depression is most severe and the future bleakest.

Environmental gains will also be substantial. Converting diesel-fueled buses to methanol, for example, can reduce nitrogen oxides by as much as 50 percent and particulates and smoke by 90 to 100 percent. Methanol-fueled cars also emit lower quantities of currently regulated pollutants, although the potential tradeoff of improved emissions for improved fuel economy makes it impossible to quantify the gains.

Will the motorist have to pay for all of these national benefits, No; methanol made from natural gas already costs less than gasoline on a miles per dollar basis. Oil and gas prices in the long run are expected to rise faster than coal prices, so methanol from coal will eventually be cheaper than gasoline or methanol from gas.

In the short run, demand for fuel methanol will be met with methanol made from natural gas. The price is currently artificially low because of excess capacity and the existence of old, low-priced contracts for the gas used as a feedstock.

The technology for producing methanol from coal exists, but it has not been proven on a commercial scale. The first coal-to-methanol plant in the United States went into production late last year. Although at least one coal-to-methanol project is under consideration for assistance by the Synthetic Fuels Corporation, large-scale commercial development of the industry will not occur until foreseeable demand for methanol exceeds current capacity.

With all of these advantages, why is not methanol already taking over the automotive market? Why does Government need to become involved, even on a very limited and temporary basis such as I am proposing?

Government is needed as a catalyst during the infant industry stage to help reach the threshold at which methanol and gasoline can compete evenly without subsidies, and in a few areas Government needs to level the playing field where it is now tilted against methanol.

The principal obstacle to the widespread adoption of methanol as a fuel is a chicken-and-egg problem. Manufacturers will not mass produce methanol-fueled vehicles until there is widespread demand, which requires a distribution and sales system for fuel methanol. Marketers will not establish the retail fuel distribution system, however, until there are a sufficient number of cars equipped to use the fuel. Consumers, of course, want both competitively priced cars and convenient methanol sales outlets before they will buy a methanol car.

One part of the legislative proposal I am introducing, therefore, is designed to overcome this chicken-and-egg problem. It provides temporary and strictly limited incentives for the purchase of methanol-fueled cars to bring their price down close to that of gasoline-fueled cars. This will partially compensate the first few thousand methanol motorists for the higher initial cost and inconvenience.

All of these incentives would be limited by an early expiration date or a strict sunset provision, triggered by the manufacture of a given number of methanol-fueled cars. This will strictly limit revenue losses. Methanol will not need, and should not receive, a permanent subsidy. It merely needs to be helped to the starting line so that it can compete with gasoline in the marketplace.

A second part of my legislative proposal is intended to remove some legal and regulatory barriers that now discriminate against methanol as a fuel. Highway fuel taxes and automobile fuel efficiency standards are now based on the volume of fuel consumed rather than the fuel's energy content. This penalizes methanol, which has only half of gasoline's energy content per gallon.

Because the highway tax should be based on the number of miles driven and the amount of energy consumed, not the number of gallons consumed, my proposal would set the tax for methanol at 4½ cents per gallon. Because two gallons of methanol contain the energy content of one gallon of gasoline, this would make the tax on the two fuels approximately equal.

A third part of the proposed legislation would have the Government establish demonstration fleets of methanol cars and buses.

Although several hundred methanol cars are in operation in the United States, principally in California, bulk purchases are needed to allow auto manufacturers to bring the cost of production down. Fuel outlets established for Government fleets would be made available to private motorists, helping to overcome one barrier to private purchases of methanol cars.

Methanol buses offer tremendous potential for reducing urban air pollution, but additional demonstration experience is needed before cities will buy or convert whole fleets. Only three methanol-fueled buses are now in operation in the United States, and two of these are converted diesel buses.

In addition to the proposals contained in the legislation I am introducing, the subcommittee's investigation resulted in several recommendations for actions that can be taken administratively. I have communicated these to the President, the Secretaries of Energy, Transportation, and Interior, and the Administrator of EPA.

Mr. Speaker, I will reintroduce this legislation in the near future. I invite those of my colleagues who share its energy, environmental, and economic goals to join us in cosponsorship. To assist them in analyzing it, I include at the conclusion of my statement a summary and explanation of the bill's provisions and the text of the bill.

SUMMARY AND EXPLANATION

Section 1 is the short title, the Methanol Energy Policy Act of 1984.

Section 2 states findings and purposes.

Section 101 requires the Secretary of Energy to acquire 1,000 methanol cars during 1985 for use by various government agencies, and to make available to the general public the methanol fueling outlets established to fuel the government fleet.

These cars are intended as substitutes for, not additions to, the normal fleet of government cars to be purchased in the coming year. Other agencies are authorized to reimburse DOE for up to the cost of the gasoline-fueled cars that would otherwise have been purchased. The only additional cost to the government would be the incremental cost of a methanol engine and fuel system and the cost of monitoring the demonstration program.

The purpose of the provision is to allow a bulk purchase of methanol cars that would allow a lower production cost, and to establish a network of methanol fuel outlets. Fleet cars that return to a central depot each day are an ideal place to begin the use of methanol vehicles.

The order for the cars is to be announced far enough in advance to allow private parties and other government agencies—federal, state or local—to piggyback on the order.

Section 201 requires the Secretary of Transportation to help finance 20 methanol buses in fiscal year 1985 for testing and demonstration.

The positive experience and extremely favorable emission test results are based on a very limited number of buses in actual passenger service. This provision is not intended to add to the appropriation for the Urban Mass Transit Administration but rather to require 20 of the buses they will finance out of their fiscal year 1985 appropriaton to be methanol-fueled.

Section 301 establishes an Interagency Methanol Commission to coordinate the government's methanol activities and requires periodic reports to Congress.

The Commission, chaired by the Secretary of Energy, would include representatives of the Department of Transportation, Environmental Protection Administration, the General Services Administration, the Synthetic Fuels Corporation, the Department of Treasury, the Department of Defense, and the Postal Service. It will help coordinate the necessary research, regulatory, purchase, and informational activities of the various agencies.

Section 401 requires the Secretary of Transportation to study and report to Congress on any problems relating to the transportation of methanol by pipeline.

Methanol has an affinity for water, and there is some concern that oil product pipelines will have to be kept drier than they currently are. Any other efficiency or safety issues should be identified before large-scale pipeline transportation of methanol is needed.

Section 501 ensures that states will not lose allocations from the Highway Trust Fund as a result of tax exempt methanol sales.

In certain states the allocation from the Highway Trust Fund is set at 85 percent of their estimated payments into the fund. Widespread use of methanol exempted from the highway tax would lead to a reduction in the funds available to that state for highway construction and repair and could lead to opposition to methanol as a fuel.

This provision states that for purposes of determining a state's estimated payments for this allocation formula, methanol will be presumed to have been taxed at the rate which will be effective after the expiration of the exemption in 1988.

Section 601 allows a $1,000 credit to taxpayers purchasing a domestically produced methanol-fueled car, until 10,000 per year are manufactured.

Until methanol vehicles are mass produced, they will cost as much as $1,600 more than conventional vehicles. This extra cost will prevent demand for methanol cars from reaching the level at which mass production could bring the cost down to the level of gasoline-powered cars.

The proposed tax credit will help offset this difference. The sunset provisions triggered by the number of methanol cars manufactured will set a ceiling on the potential revenue loss resulting from this provision. Section 602 sets the highway tax for methanol at 4½ cents per gallon and exampts all methanol fuel from the entire highway tax until September 31, 1988.

The Btu or energy content of methanol per gallon is approximately one half that of gasoline, so methanol is effectively taxed at twice the rate of gasoline on a cost per mile basis. Setting the tax at half the current rate for gasoline will remove an important disincentive to methanol's use. This step has already been taken in California.

In 1982 methanol made from coal or biomass was exempted from the highway tax until 1988. The purpose was to provide an incentive for people to purchase methanol cars while their price was still higher than gasoline cars and while it was inconvenient to find retail methanol outlets.

The exemption was limited to methanol made from coal or biomass because of the fear that giving the exemption to methanol made from natural gas could increase natural gas prices. That fear is unfounded. Even if the manufacture and sale of methanol cars booms between now and 1988, and 50,000 cars are sold, the amount of natural gas needed to produce methanol to fuel them would add less than one one-hundredth of one percent (.01%) to a normal year's demand for natural gas.

Eventually methanol will be made primarily from coal, but creating the demand that will call forth a coal-to-methanol industry requires giving the incentive to methanol made from gas.●

● Mr. WYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join in this bipartisan effort to shape a comprehensive national policy to stimulate broader use of methanol—America's most promising fuel.

The potential benefits of methanol in transportation often focus on its energy security, energy efficiency and cost advantages over petroleum-based fuels.

But that leaves out a significant advantage of methanol: Its contribution to cleaner air in our cities.

Not surprisingly, California—home to 1 of every 10 automobiles in this country—has been the pioneer in examining the emission characteristics of methanol. Their results to date are well-worth our attention.

The California Energy Commission found methanol-powered vehichles to emit significantly less carbon monoxide, hydrocarbons, and nitrogen oxides—the most pernicious pollutants our cities face—than gasoline-powered vehicles.

The consumer benefits too. California's results indicate these emissions can be achieved with catalytic converters that are much less expensive than conventional ones because fewer scarce precious metals are needed.

Tests on diesel engines fueled by methanol are equally compelling.

The Energy Commission found diesels operating on methanol to have the lowest nitrogen oxide and hydrocarbon emissions of any engine tested, and particulate emissions were virtually eliminated.

It is with these tantalizing emission traits in mind, as well as the other benefits associated with methanol, that I join in this effort to tap the tremendous potential of methanol to clearing up our air.

Our legislation marshalls the combined forces of the public and private sectors to broaden the use and familiarity with methanol. There are compelling reasons to do so.

First, a fundamental obstacle preventing widespread use of methanol in the transportation sector is the chicken and the egg situation that exists with respect to supply and demand.

Fuel producers are reluctant to build plants or provide transportation-grade methanol until the automobile market develops.

Auto manufacturers are reluctant to undertake mass production of methanol-fueled vehicles until the fuel is widely available.

The conversion of government and commercial fleets to methanol offers the best hope of breaking this stalemate. Our bill provides a roadmap to reach this objective.

Another compelling reason to stimulate commercial/governmental fleet conversions is the very fact that these fleets operate in urban areas. All of our cities in whose air quality is worse than the Clean Air Act standards for nitrogen oxides, hydrocarbons, carbon monoxide, and particulates have a substantial number of commercial and governmental fleets.

Widespread conversions can only contribute to enhanced air quality.

Finally, let me point out that methanol is not an exotic fuel of the future. It is produced today for a variety of industrial purposes. The change from industrial to transportation grade methanol is simple. The current spot market price for methanol is about 90 cents per gallon, on an energy equivalent basis with gasoline.

And, much to OPEC's chagrin, it can be produced from virtually anything—from coal to wood.

Our bill blends action with some creative thinking to push us in the right direction of weaning ourselves from the foreign crude.●

● Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. SHARP), the chairman of the Subcommittee on Fossil and Synthetic Fuels, in introducing the Methanol Energy Policy Act of 1984.

This legislation is an outgrowth of the hearings held by the subcommittee in the 97th Congress on methanol as an alternative to gasoline-powered vehicles. It represents a bipartisan initiative on an important energy and environmental issue.

The use of methanol, which can be produced from either natural gas or coal, has the advantage of reducing our use of petroleum and thus has an energy benefit. However, my particular involvement stems from the important environmental benefits of using methanol in cars and buses.

I took an active role in the subcommittee hearings and have been keenly interested in this subject because I represent a region of the country that is a nonattainment area under the Clean Air Act. The staff of the South Coast Air Quality Management District in southern California has determined that the air in and around Los Angeles will never meet Federal standards without a shift away from petroleum and motor vehicles to alternative fuels for industry and transportation. Methanol is just such an alternative. In fact, the Institute of Gas Technology Highlights of September 12, 1983, reports one study in which the replacement of gasoline vehicles with methanol models could cut smog in the Los Angeles basin by 70 percent.

The State of California has led the Nation in the field of methanol. Both the California Energy Commission and the Bank of America testified before the subcommittee on their joint methanol vehicle project. In fact, last year the State took delivery of the largest fleet of methanol vehicles in the world, 506 Fords. The cars will be operated by 15 city and county governments, 6 State agencies and 2 private companies. However, this experiment needs additional assistance to continue.

While we are far from mass use of methanol, it is clear we will never get there without taking further steps. The California experience has been a good one, but more must be done. The legislation we are introducing today includes an important statement of congressional policy. This is necessary since other Federal actions can unintentionally thwart the methanol conversion effort. For example, I found during action on the Clean Air Act in the 97th Congress that the antitampering provisions of existing law make it difficult to convert standard gasoline vehicles to alternative fuels. With this in mind, the Committee on Energy and Commerce adopted my amendment to permit vehicle engines to be more readily converted to methanol, methane, propane, or other fuels that would result in lower emission levels.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I look forward to working with my colleagues on this initiative as a member of both the Subcommittee on Fossil and Synthetic Fuels and the Subcommittee on Health and the Environment of the Committee on Energy and Commerce. Chairman SHARP and I have worked closely on this issue and we will continue to do so with the goal of passing methanol legislation in the 98th Congress.●

● Mr. BROYHILL. Mr. Speaker, along with Congressman PHIL SHARP, I am today introducing the Methanol Energy Policy Act of 1984.

It is imperative for the Federal Governmenroduction of a broad range of industrial chemical products. Although most of the world's current methanol capacity is based on surplus natural gas, methanol can be produced from a variety of other raw materials, including coal, petroleum and biomass.

Methanol has real advantages over conventional fuels used in transportation and industrial applications. As a transportation fuel, it is currently being used in both public and private fleets in California, with encouraging results. I am equally excited about the significant environmental advantages being experienced. Methanol burns cleaner and at a lower temperature than gasoline or diesel fuels, producing less nitrogen oxides, and negligible particulate and hydrocarbon emissions. This means improved health for the American people and hope for areas such as southern California and Houston, which experience a great deal of smog caused by automobile-related polluants.

I wish to make clear, however, that I do not believe that this bill goes far enough in encouraging methanol use. Therefore, I plan to introduce an additional methanol bill later in the month along with Congressman DICK OTTINGER. In addition to Federal demonstration projects similar to those contained in this bill today, it will phase in mandated purchases of Federal passenger vehicles and urban buses. Congress must send a strong message to the American people that we will work to lessen our dependency on foreign oil supplies and we will work to cleanup our environment through the use of cleaner fuels.●

THE U.S. MISSION IN LEBANON

The SPEAKER. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Texas (Mr. GONZALEZ) is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. GONZALEZ. Mr. Speaker, the news reports within the last 36 hours indicate that there has been some change in strategy with respect to whatever it is we could call properly the military posture of the country in Lebanon. However, I think that from what I have read, both from utterances by leaders in the Congress and spokesmen of the administration, thus far the indications of what it is that is being changed seem to me to be that it is more of the same, that is, an evasion of the questions that need to be answered. And that can be done only by the Commander in Chief, the President of the United States, upon the demand of the Congress and not until the Congress demands it.

The question is the same that I raised a little better than 14 months ago in a letter addressed to the President. Unfortunately, of course, this President does not accustom himself to answering Members of Congress or at least the House. I have had the honor of serving in this Congress with six different Presidents, and this is the first President that does not reply to a letter from a Member of the House. That is fine.

The point is that I followed what I feel to be the channels and the procedures that I think are incumbent upon us to follow, and when I did not receive an answer in January a year ago, I then addressed a letter to the chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee, who was then our highly thought of, beloved, and late and to be lamented Clem Zablocki of Wisconsin.

But in the interim period, between the time I wrote the letter to the President and the letter to the chairman, the President in a way, in a manner of speaking, addressed one of the questions or two aspects of one question during a question-and-answer period that he had with some members of the press, and he was asked the same questions I raised.

First, what is the mission of the Marines? And, second, for how long will the marines be in Lebanon?

To the first, the President answered that the main objective was to preside over the removal of those foreign powers and their troops that were in possession of some segments of the territory known as Lebanon today; and, second, as peacekeeping. Or, maybe one was involved in the other. It was hard to discern from the answer.

The second answer was that the Commander in Chief had no idea as to how long the marines would be serving in Beirut. He said further that that would depend—and I quote directly—"on the Lebanese Government."

This, of course, aroused me very much because anybody who was conversant with the situation would know that when you tried to define the Lebanese Government, it boiled down to the Gemayel regime, which is one faction and has been only one faction before, and a government, if such it can be called, that never has had, much less now, even total jurisdiction over the city of Beirut, much less the country of Lebanon.

So then I addressed my letter to the chairman. About 6 weeks after that I still had not received a reply or an acknowledgment in writing from the chairman, but he intercepted me one day on the House floor—and I believe it was exactly a year ago this month—and he said that he had received my letter, and that the counsel and all of his aides considered it the most perceptive and the most knowledgeable that they had received or that they had in communications from any Member of Congress, including members of the committee.

But then, in this words—and I quote directly—he said, "But, HENRY, there is nothing we can do. We can't do anything now until something happens."

I asked, "What do you mean, something happens?" I said, "The only thing that can happen is that marines are going to be killed."

He as much as agreed by the nod of his head.

Then I really became disturbed, and I acted as I have done in all of my career, not only in this body but in the State senate and on the city council where I have had the honor of serving. And I want everybody to know that I feel I am one of the most privileged of Americans because I have been highly honored to serve in the local legislative body, in the State legislative body, the State senate, and in the Congress for 22 years and 1 month tomorrow. So that when I do take to this forum, it is not because I have some strong strategic reason, political or legislative, but because this is the only forum available to a Member by the use of his voice; and, as I have said before, all a Member has is two things: his voice and his vote, and that is it, in a body of this kind.

I glory in that, because I feel that through attribute and preparation and background, as I have discovered, not ever having had the intention before of being in politics, much less ever in the Congress; so as I have gone along I have developed what I call the legislative advocacy, which I think is a profession or should be.

I do not envy the gavel. I certainly do not envy any office, such as the Presidency. I do not wish the Office of the Presidency on my worst enemy; so I do not have that kind of ambition, never have had. I would not be happy in an administrative or executive position. I am as happy as anybody could be in human existence in this that I call the legislative advocacy, the give and take of the forum.

No one man can do anything alone, whether he is a member of a committee or a subcommittee or a member of a body such as this, which consists of 435 Members; so I believe in the open market of competition, of ideas, of programs, of attempting to be presumptuous enough to call myself a representative of a pluralistic cosmopolitan body, socially, economically; so that what I am saying and the reason I am saying it is that I approach this as I have for 22 years.

I have not been here 1 month before I had a crisis as a new Member and I took to the floor. I ended up over a period of 2 years addressing myself to that subject matter.

Certainly there were no TV cameras covering us then, and even today I tend to forget that there is such a thing.

The reason that I am speaking is that because I believe that this privilege being available to a Member through what we call special orders should be addressed presentially, physically, and not inserted into the RECORD, because I think then the main purpose is that I am sure the Members of Congress had in the initial periods of this program and procedure and privilege were that they be used for the direct communication and if possible, the clash of ideas; any Member wishing to come on the floor and challenge an utterance is free to do so, because I certainly will yield as I have; but on this issue at this point, the motivation has been the same, and that is that we are dealing in areas in which Americans and their lives and well-being are involved. This, I think, calls for a very extra exertion from each and every one of us, whether we are members of the committee that has jurisdiction or not members.

At this point, the thing that motivates my continuing the subject matter, yes, over the course of 14 months I have pleaded with the President not only to define clearly and coht in avoiding the unnecessary deaths of these almost 300 marines and especially the massacre of October 24.

It has been one of the most demoralizing and saddening experiences of my career in public elective office.

Heretofore, whether it was the State senate or even here, I felt that we might have had some impact. I know that I made 55 addresses on special orders; but finally, the Deputy Attorney General for criminal matters was kicked out, even though the administration in charge then was doing the same thing. He would not even answer letters, the Attorney General. To this day I am waiting for a reply to letters I have addressed to him; but the 55 speeches did focus attention on the malodorous situation, on the questionable behavior of the Deputy Attorney General and it did directly lead to his being ejected from that office.

So that up to now I felt that way, but when I have seen that we continue and persist in what should be obvious and, as I say, remains uncontroverted, I have never been rebutted. I have just been ignored and others who later joined in a similar outcry were similarly ignored; but the Congress, my associate now, as I said in December, Mr. Speaker, in my special delivery letter to the Speaker are now coequally responsible with the President.

The fact that at this point the marines may be removed from the airport to onboard ships in my opinion does not lessen their exposure to death or serious bodily harm, because for 5 months I have been pointing out that those ships offshore that we have there under the battleship class, maybe perhaps not the New Jersey, but everything else underneath, is highly vulnerable to the antiship missile gun emplacements in those hills where the firing has come down against the marines, fully capable up to a range of 50 miles of sinking everything short of the battleship class.

Now, those marines aboard those ships are just as vulnerable and perhaps more disastrously.

I have been and one of the reasons I asked you to consider joining the Senate leaders in calling us back into session in December to consider, in light of the President's new commitment in Lebanon in the first weeks of December, wherein he ordered the bombardment both through the air as well as from ships of those positions, variously labeled or described as either being Druze or Syrian and at this point, I think the issue is still not clarified.

All it proves is the bankruptcy of whatever it is that the President has tried to define as a policy.

Now, under those conditions, what now? What now is the situation and what now should be done?

I feel that the least the Congress can do is to do what it has not done. I feel sadly that the Congress has abdicated its high responsibilities as a coequal, separate, and independent branch of the Government, and one above all that has deposited in its sovereignty the only exclusive constitutional power and prerogative of declaring or defining war.

The President is continuing to make war. The Congress has not declared war. There is nothing unconstitutional that I can see in what I have been demanding, and that is that we advise the President, "Mr. President, the Congress has not declared war. You stop making war, because the Congress has not declared war." That is all. I do not see anything unconstitutional about that; but at this point it is urgently needed that we define whatever it is that the President will do to make up for an absolutely dismal bankrupt—policy I would not call it, but course of action that he has taken through deed and action.

What is the policy now? What is the mission of our military, whether they are on shipboard or on land? Are we going to fight the Syrians? Who are we going to fight?

The great absurdity, the insanity of a President telling the world and this country that the marines in Beirut were peacekeepers—peacekeeping is a political, a diplomatic chore. The marines are warriors. The Joint Chiefs of Staff were unanimous. This is the thing that kept motivating me to ask, what is the mission?

The Joint Chiefs of Staff from the beginning, ad initio, as they say in law, have been against the marines in Beirut. But the Commander in Chief, of course, is the Commander in Chief so that is was not particularly magnanimous in the month of December when it was decided that the military would look into why, why were not more precautions taken when 240 marines were murdered.

That, to me, I thought, was so heinous because who would be the scapegoat anyway you want to shape it? It would be our military. But the military experts, the ones that we spend millions and millions and millions of dollars to be the experts in the military were all from the beginning against that. And if they are now being evacuated it is because the obvious military imperative need is to evacuate.

In the light of the turn of events and the complete demotion of the so-called Gemayel government or faction, now, though, who are we going to fight? The President talks blaming Syria. Well, not too many weeks ago, and I praised him for that from my city of San Antonio, he sent a message to the head of state of Syria, Assad, thanking him for his great act of statesmanship in allowing the release of the American aviator that the now-aspirant to the Democratic nomination, Jesse Jackson, went over and apparently facilitated. But now the President says it is those Syrians that are to blame for everything that has happened since and in the defeat, elimination of the Gemayel government.

So at this point the question remains the same. Mr. President, what is the mission, in clear, coherent terms, of our military onshore, offshore, in the air? But, more importantly, Mr. Speaker, and this is even a matter of greater concern to me, is the fact that the President has been just as unable, or I do not want to accuse any President of being evasive deliberately with respect to the mission of our military in Central America. What is their mission?

Never before in the history of our military, even the statutes reveal the fact that no such thing as a 6-month, 8-month training exercise is considered as defined in our military rules, regulations, and even the statutes. As a matter of fact, I have had to introduce legislation in order to try to soften, assuage some of the rather bitter injustices perpetrated on some of these very noble Army, especially, and professionals like doctors, medics, who since the very first week of assignment on a tour that they were told would last from 6 to 8 months lost their basic living quarters allowance.

What does that mean? It means that some of them are being deducted every month at least $650. That means that some of them are having problems saving the mortgage on the home that they are living in in San Antonio, because at Fort Sam Houston, where they are located, we have always had an inadequacy in housing for those that are defined as permanently based.

So when you go on a training mission there is nothing in the procedures or the manuals that allow for more than a 30-day period and, therefore, if you are, well, then, initially you lose that status and you lose that basic quarters living allowance. It is one of the injustices.

These crevices that when Presidents, Commanders in Chief take sudden, tempestous, unpredictable, and unprepared actions will always develop in these poor, unfortunate Americans that are brave, heroic, loyal, efficient, to fall through crevices. We saw that during Korea, during Vietnam, but never with such a vengeance as in Lebanon where the President indulged in this fantasy land concept that the Marines were not in a hostile environment, they were not under combat situations, they were peacekeepers and therefore I hope no Member has had experiences as I have had during the break in December and November of pathetic calls from a couple of parents way out of my State. One was from Philadelphia and the other was from Florida. These are about some of these dead marines. One of them, the one in Philadelphia, was very anguished and was calling me all the way long distance. These are just little, average, American families. They do not have money for long distance calls.

This call was wanting to know if I could help him answer some questions somehow or other. He had heard, I think the reason he bandied my name around, that I had introduced legislation that would provide $50,000 to the surviving next of kin, or beneficiaries, or dependents of service men or women killed in an undeclared war, for the very reason of the fantasy land that a warrior, a man, a woman that we train to do one thing, to defend us, to serve as military, not as politicians, not as diplomats, which they are not equipped to do, and then place them in a situation like we did during Vietnam, as we have continued to do in Central America, as I have reported here where these soldiers are exposed to serious bodily harm or death, but you are not allowed to even carry arms in that case.

In the case of the marines, as I pointed out to the President in successive letters, they are there with full combat gear. They are equipped with combat equipment. How can you tell us they are there only as peacekeepers with no possibility of hostility or consequential harm to their lives and persons, even to this day?

So here is this father saying, "Mr. Gonzalez, I heard you are the only one." I said, "Well, I am not the only one, but maybe I am the only one that has bothered to introduce legislation like this," that, incidentally, I have not been able to get any kind of priority consideration either in the basic quarters allowance, which I think is a terrible injustice that none of us in Congress ought to hold ourselves responsible for for 1 minute, much less these months; and also in this case of the definition of what should be our responsibility in defining the role of these servicemen in an undeclared war, in an area in which if the President dares hint that they are in an area of hostility or combat, that then he has to come to the Congress under the War Powers Limitation Act and give some kind of accountability.

But here is a parent that says, "Mr. Gonzalez, can you tell me—the President sent the message, the Secretary of Defense sent the message on the death of my son, and my son was the one whose body was the last one to be dug out of that rubble in Beirut. Now he is young, very young, a fine man. The Marine Commandant that came to the funeral said so. But they are telling me that my son died in an accident. In an accident? He did not die in defense of his country? He did not die on behalf of the service of his country? In an accident?"

I have to say "Well, look, this is what we have, too; this is what the debate is all about. Some of us are trying to figure out."

I did my best to say, "Look, the main thing is to do that which ought to be done to safeguard the lives of every one of the men."

If we have arrived at a point in our national development, as I have said here, too, before, of those decadent, obsolete societies that the forefathers who built this country escaped from, and with the purpose and intent of escaping forever and trying to grasp the destinies of their own fate back into the hands of the people, after all, our Constitution, the most revolutionary words even in today's world, are those first seven "We, the people of the United States." It does not say we, the Congress; I, the President; or We, the courts. It says "the people" are the sovereign power from which all of us come, and we forget that.

When I remind some of my fellow Americans they think I am a socialist, that I dare think that we, we the people, are the real source of power.

That is how far we have strayed. But it is reflected even in these gyrations and convolutions and trampoline-like bouncing up and down in the forging of our policy that involves the life and death of our fellow Americans.

I say if we reach that point of these decadent societies that we have always associated with that which we do not want ever to be associated with, where lives are expendable, where life is cheap, I say I do not think the average American ever wants to look upon it that way. Every single life is valuable, every single one. None of the marines should be expendable on a higher game of political chess that has yet to be reported to the American people by a President that I do not think even he has appraised the dimensions involved.

But we, the Congress, should not escape that responsibility which was placed upon us by the Constitution. We are or are supposed to be still separate, equal, not subordinate to the President, equal and independent. And I say, Mr. President, whether those men are on that ship or not, they are not safer, they are still exposed, but their mission is still not explained.

I pointed out and I have used a reference to that which, through biblical times, is very appropriate and that is: "If the trumpet give an uncertain sound, then who is prepared to do battle?"

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SEIBERLING). Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Florida (Mr. MACKAY) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. MACKAY. Mr. Speaker, I was unable to be on the House floor for the recorded vote on final passage of H.R. 2899, the EPA research and development authorization.

Had I been able to be present for the vote, I would have voted "yes."

As a cosponsor of the bill, and as a member of the Science and Technology Committee which prepared and reported it, I strongly support the bill.

I appreciate having this opportunity to state my position on this bill for the RECORD.●

THE TRAGEDY OF VIOLENCE IN LEBANON AND IN EL SALVADOR

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentlewomen from Ohio (Ms. OAKAR) is recognized for 10 minutes.

Ms. OAKAR. I thank the Speaker.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to address two issues. One is the situation in Lebanon and our Government's participation there. The other relates to the so-called classified document of Judge Tyler concerning the American missionaries who were brutally murdered in El Salvador some years ago.

First of all, I would like to tell a little bit about Lebanon. It is true, as the previous speaker indicated, as we all know to our great sorrow, that more than 200 of our marines are dead as a result of their presence in Lebanon and the Lebanese people have suffered, themselves, immeasurably from external and internal forces.

The tragedy of violence is that in war the people who suffer the most are usually innocent. They are the civilians, the children, the elderly, the men and women who really do not want to be involved in the conflict.

I want to suggest to this body that most of the people in Lebanon fit that category. The American people ought to be extremely concerned about what is going on today and in the future. At the same time that the President announced the pullout of our marines which some felt was a good sign, the President also announced the escalation of the conflict, punctuating his decision with hundreds of rounds from the New Jersey's 16-inch guns, the heaviest American naval bombardment since the Vietnam war. This bombardment which began yesterday afternoon and went into the evening has led to the tragic deaths of many Lebanese civilians living in small villages. Many of these people were not terrorists, were not part of the conflict, did not desire to be part of a conflict. They want to live in some kind of tranquility. Many of them were women and children.

This morning my office received a phone call from an American of Lebanese heritage. One of the villages that was destroyed yesterday, he said, was his family's village. "I am a disabled American veteran," he sobbed, "I served my country in the Navy in World War II and now they have gone and killed my family."

This individual's tragedy has been repeated many hundreds of thousands of times in Lebanon in the past decade, some of which was brought about by the use of American weapons.

Now we have become active participants in the mayhem under the guise that we are striking back at this religious group or that religious group.

What is really the difference in a person's religion, Moslem, Christian, or what have you? A child is a child. The bitterness of this particular gentleman is magnified many thousandfold in Lebanon, in the Middle East and in other parts of the world.

This has ominous implications for our country. The day-long shelling yesterday put the United States into direct conflict with other parties.

To what end? They, the United States, at times unfortunately has been inflaming extremists in the area while shifting policies on a weekly basis.

The tragic, despicable terrorist bombing of our marine position last October demonstrated the ability of shadowy enemies to match any damage we inflict from our formidable naval task force.

I hope the President is setting aside some time during his vacation in Santa Barbara to think deeply of the broader implications of what he has ordered this week in Lebanon.

He and his advisers have to come to grips with what is really going on in the Middle East, and they must begin now to develop and apply a policy of diplomacy. This business of reacting to events instead of helping to shape them has already gotten us in deep trouble.

Now is the time for statesmanship, not politics. The President ought to be using our superpower status for peace and diplomacy, not war.

Let us quit looking at military solutions to everything, foreign aid in the form of cluster bombs and tanks, military personnel, our ships off the coast striking at little villages in this country.

Why do we not as a country strive to unite this once great country, this Middle Eastern area of great heritage and ancient tradition? Why do we not put as one of our priorities the use of diplomacy to reconcile this Nation and the rest of that region and let us quit using excuses to kill children and women in that sad, devastated country.

In another area, I would like to comment on the Tyler report and the fact that the State Department asked that it be classified, which means that most Americans will never know unless they get some form of deep classification, the ability to know what really took place in the murders of our own American citizens and whether or not, indeed, the higher ups in the military that we give aid to, that our people, our tax dollars are used for, really indeed did commit the offensive act of killing individual missionaries, religious and lay people.

I think that that report ought to be declassified. Published reports have indicated that there was a coverup, that indeed the highest ranking individual in the military—and these are published reports. I have read the report but because it is classified I cannot comment on it, on my thoughts. But I will talk about what has been in the papers. Published reports have indicated that the highest person in the military was involved from day 1 in a coverup.

If this is true then the American people might want not to give aid to that individual who we think at times is involved in death squads and all kinds of things that relate to the killing of innocent people in the villages of El Salvador.

But I think the frosting on the cake in terms of the insensitivity of the State Department is when some of us asked, along with the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, Mr. FASCELL, along with myself and others, that they at least declassify the report for the families of the missionaries, that the State Department insisted that these individuals be given access to the classification only after they had a clearance by the State Department to obtain classified information.

I do not know if many Americans know what is involved to get a clearance to read classified information, but it is a long involved process. It involves the investigation of your background and so on.

These are the families. This is the mother and father of Sister Dorothy Kazel from my district in Cleveland, Ohio, who was an Ursuline sister. Her parents are the finest Americans in the country. Now why they have to go through that tedious process which is so demeaning, do a background check that very often takes months, is beyond my comprehension.

Can you imagine asking that there be a background check on the Mother Superior of the Ursuline Order of Cleveland, Ohio, Mother Bartholomew?

I mean this is just another insult to the families of the murdered missionaries.

I serve as a kind of liaison to those martyrs and their families in terms of the State Department. The reason I got involved was that when the families would call to ask what was being done about apprehending the murderers of their members of the family, the missionaries, at times the State Department did not even return their phone calls. So that has been at times the cavalier attitude of the State Department toward the deep sorrow that the families and, indeed, the American public has experienced.

So I say to the State Department and to the administration, what do we have to hide? Why do you not declassify that 101-page report so that the American people can know the truth, not only about the missionaries, but it is a larger issues in terms of how they want their tax dollars to be used in the form of foreign aid.

And I have a feeling, and I have great faith in the American people, and I am proud to represent a good portion of the people in my district, in my area, I really believe that the majority of Americans do not want their tax dollars to be used to kill people, whether it is the people in the villages of Lebanon or the people in the villages of El Salvador or, indeed, our own American citizens.

HEARINGS TO BE HELD ON DISABILITY REFORM BILL

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Texas (Mr. PICKLE) is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. PICKLE. Mr. Speaker, the reason I take this time is to advise the Members that the Social Security Subcommittee and the Senate Special Committee on Aging are holding a series of reviews and hearings around the country regarding the disability reform bill that is now pending.

Members will remember that some 4 years ago the administration was mandated by the Congress to conduct continuing disability reviews for people receiving disability benefits, and to do it over every 3 years. In response the administration started a crash program of continued review of disability cases. In the process many people were removed from the rolls who should not have been on there, and it served a good purpose.

But, we will remember that these reviews were done some 8 months in advance of the time that we had set and they were done in such a crash manner that many thousands of people throughout the country were terminated improperly.

For the past 2 years the subcommittee has tried to come up with some way to correct the extremely harsh results that occurred.

Finally we have passed a bill out of the subcommittee and the full committee. That bill now is one of the titles of the pending tax bill before this House. I am hoping that bill can now be advanced without delay because the disability aspect is one section that certainly should be passed.

Now a couple of weeks ago we were all dismayed to hear administration officials testify that they would not support any disability reform legislation this year, that it was going to cost way too much money, some $5 or $6 billion, and that it was unnecessary because the administrative review procedures that have been established by the Department of Health and Human Services (HHS) will insure that these cases are properly handled.

Well, in the first place, we have had our staff review those cost figures. The administration is not correct. The higher figures quoted by some in the administration can only be supported by assuming that the portion of the bill relating to the medical improvements standard will be applied retroactively. The language in this legislation makes it clear that no such retroactive application is intended or desired. According to the Congressional Budget Office (CBO) this bill costs, with respect to the social security trust funds, about $1.7 billion over a 5-year period. The cost of the legislation actually proposed can be handled within the disability trust fund. There will not be an extra tax involved.

Second, the administration has said that the stabilizer might be triggered, and if it was the cost-of-living (COLA) might be affected.

Now the administration has since testified that the stabilizer would not be triggered. Because concern about triggering the stabilizer is an integral part of this issue, and indeed may be of more importance than the cost estimate for the bill itself, I have had the subcommittee staff prepare a report on the subject. This report is quite exhaustive and detailed and I recommend it to any Member who wishes to fully understand this complex area.

The main point of the report is that according to the Social Security Administration actuaries under either present law or enactment of the disability bill, OASDI reserves could fall below 15 percent in January 1985, which could trigger the stabilizer. However, all sets of economic assumptions currently in use, including the CBO baseline, the President's budget, and the 1983 trustees' report II–B assumptions as revised in November, show wage increases outpacing price increases for the appropriate measuring period in 1984 and 1985. Therefore, no change in the COLA would be made even if the ratio drops below 15 percent. After 1985 the reserves increase steadily so that in no later year would they be low enough for the stabilizer to be triggered.

As for the contention that this matter can be dealt with through administrative reforms, we have to admit to ourselves that administratively they have not handled this situation. Twenty States now are conducting disability reviews on the basis of court orders which mandate a medical improvement standard and nine other States have already voluntarily imposed moratoriums on the review of cases. The disability program in the States is in absolute disarray.

For the administration now to say that we do not need this bill and that it is going to cost too much, and that it might trigger our trust fund, is just not the truth. We know it and I think the administration knows it.

Senator HEINZ in the other body announced that he was going to go to Chicago to hold a hearing on the disability legislation, which he favors very strongly.

We are going to take this issue to the American people. It is grossly unfair to say to the disabled that we are not going to pass corrective legislative reform when it is urgently needed.

Two sections of that bill are vitally important to disabled people. One, that we establish guidelines for medical improvement. That is needed. The program is in disarray throughout all the States, and therefore, we need to have uniform guidelines that we all have agreed to.

Second, we have extended in this legislation benefits to the ALJ level so that if someone is determined to be no longer eligible to remain on the disability rolls they can at least appeal the initial decision and continue to receive benefits until the ALJ level. The subcommittee and the full Committee on Ways and Means have approved this legislation unanimously.

There are many other valuable parts of this bill. Every disability organization in America is for this legislation. I do not know anyone who is against it. My friend Dave Stockman may be the only one who wants to say that he does not want to have this legislative reform passed, even though it would eliminate some terrible inequities, because it might cost a little money.

This is a good bill. It is a fair bill. It is needed. And therefore, our subcommittee, along with the Committee on Aging in the Senate and have joined together to hold these public hearings. And these hearings are demonstrating once again how urgent the need is for this legislation and how widespread the support for it is among all segments of our population.

A CALL FOR TRUTH IN CENTRAL AMERICAN POLICY

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California (Mr. MARTINEZ) is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. MARTINEZ. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to address a tremendous error, a misconceived idea which has run amuck in our approach to major foreign policy problems. Traced back through history, this error has been repeatedly made resulting in repeated failures. I am referring to the belief that the presence of our Nation's military forces aid the process of peace in Central America. To me it is simple and clear, the most peaceful use that can be made of our military personnel is not to deploy them at all. Of all the incongruent, dogmatic, flag-waving slogans that are heard being echoed by the President and his supporters, not one truthfully addresses the issue of what benefits have been gained from the placement of U.S. troops in that region.

For all the good and the bad produced by the Kissinger report, I must comment on one very important point. It is stated in this report's introduction that "ultimately, a solution of Central America's problems will depend on the Central Americans themselves." No truer words have been spoken in the entire Central American debate. The citizens of the United States have been beaten over the head with Presidential rhetoric concerning the necessity of maintaining our armies in El Salvador, Honduras, and by proxy in Nicaragua. We have been led down the narrow path of bipolarity, spoon-fed the view that all confrontations between the revolutionary Government of Nicaragua and rebels of El Salvador are to be seen as continuations of the ideological battles between East and West superpowers.

At first the revolution in Nicaragua was welcomed by the leaders of this country. But when the Nicaraguan leaders looked beyond the American style of democracy, to establish a unique, indigenous form of government tailored to accommodate the needs of that nation, the revolution was declared as having been lost to Soviet-Cuban ideology and subsequently targeted for U.S.-supported subversion and terrorism. I say that this perception is wrong. Revolutions take time to mature. Our Nation is in a position of power and leadership that can afford to let Nicaragua work off the frustrations of hundreds of years of economic suppression and political disenfranchisement. How can we expect cooperation from a nation, whose government we work to defeat in warfare and are now crippling economically?

President Reagan and his fellow Republicans in the House and Senate would do well to remember their American history. The American Revolution was born out of the frustrations and injustices brought on by the actions of a superpower which attempted to impose itself, its institutions and government upon another people. I believe that now we must change our tract in our dealing with Central America. We must follow the suggestions of the Contadora nations by removing our troops from the area, halting the military maneuvers in Honduras, attempt sincere negotiations with the Government of Nicaragua, force the promotion of human rights in El Salvador by the use of economic persuasion, and above all, allow these nations to determine their own destinies. I believe that if this were to occur the area would refute communism and develop along guidelines that are best suited to its needs. If the President cannot see the wisdom of these actions, then it is urgent that the Congress recognize its duty and implement these changes.

PERMANENT RESIDENT STATUS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. RODINO) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation that will give lawful permanent resident status to a number of aliens who have lived in this country in a legal limbo for many years. I refer to those Cuban and Haitian nationals who came to the United States to seek a safe haven from poverty and abuse.

Most of these people arrived in 1980 and were given the classification of Cuban/Haitian entrants—status pending. That was an entirely unique classification having virtually no precedent in our immigration law. The classification was devised because no other category was appropriate. Technically, they were not refugees; technically they were not immigrants since they had no visas. More importantly, however, they were not and never have been illegal aliens. They were invited by Presidential declaration to come to our shores and they have been here ever since.

This legislation would provide a remedy to the tragic plight of those Haitian boat people, many of whom were imprisoned for up to 18 months. Federal court decisions have found this detention program to have been illegal and discriminatory and like the Cubans, the Haitians have accumulated significant equities and become productive members of our communities.

This proposal will therefore adjust their status to permanent residents and permit them to become full-fledged members of our society.

This bill also seeks to rectify an unjust policy the administration has been following in refusing to issue visas in Havana to Cuban nationals for whom petitions have been approved, thus preventing the reunification of families. This runs counter to the fundamental basis of our immigration policy—family reunification must remain our primary consideration.●

DO ONLY THE UNBORN MATTER?

(Mr. SEIBERLING asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

● Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, night after night, an almost empty Chamber hears a small minority of ultraconservative members going on at great length to voice their complaint that the House leadership and the majority will not take up their agenda of issues. These include the so-called social issues of antiabortion, compulsory school prayer, and others dear to certain constituencies to which the speakers relate.

Since the group is a small minority out of the main stream, one may be inclined to dismiss their perennial polemics as the price paid for freedom of speech. However, it is another thing when the President of the United States uses the awesome communicating power of his office to espouse the same causes and, more important, to use them as a screen to divert attention from the devastating social impact of his own policies.

This is brought out in a most cogent way by two recent newspaper columns. One, by Carl T. Rowan, appeared in the Washington Post for February 7. Mr. Rowan points out that one might credit President Reagan with a deep concern in his campaign for the unborn if it were not for the fact that his policies have served to cripple and stunt so many wanted babies.

Mr. Rowan points out that in 1982 13.1 million children lived in poverty in the United States and that infant death rates increased in 11 States.

Mr. Rowan asks, "Why has a president, so committed to a right to life, cut $10 billion a year in federal health, nutrition, education, child care and family support programs," and has "espoused policies that threw 700,000 children off AFDC and medicaid."

The other column was by Abe Zaidan which appeared in the February 5 edition of the Akron Beacon Journal, of which Mr. Zaidan is the distinguished senior editor. Mr. Zaidan points out that the President's remark that many street people are homeless "by choice," reveals, if nothing else, the "deliberate—and insensitive—tone the Reagan administration has set in responding to serious social problems in America."

Mr. Zaidan also notes that this tone is becoming "theocratic in nature, and certainly blind to the diversity of religious beliefs in this country. Essentially it deals with abortion and, secondly, prayer in public schools." Mr. Zaidan asks a very compelling question: "If one President can impose his religious views on a person's private life, what is to prevent the next President from imposing quite the opposite in the name of religion?"

Mr. Speaker, I offer the full text of both columns following these remarks:

DO ONLY THE UNBORN MATTER?

(By Carl T. Rowan)

No doubt President Reagan is influencing a lot of people when he accuses those who perform abortions of "the taking of some 4,000 unborn children's lives every day," or when he professes agony over the "pain" he says fetuses suffer during an abortion.

I could forget the electioneering aspects of this anti-abortion campaign and credit Reagan with a deep concern if it were not for the fact that his policies have served to cripple and stunt so many wanted babies who lie in the wombs of poor women, and if he had not moved so callously to cut social programs in ways that are causing more and more babies to die in their first year of life.

The Children's Defense Fund, a lobbying group, has issued a powerful report, "America's Children in Poverty," which provides some facts Reagan ought to know about:

· Between 1979 and 1982 America's children fell into poverty at a rate of about 3,000 more each day.

· In this richest nation on earth 13.1 million children lived in poverty in 1982—one black child out of every two, two Hispanic children out of five, and millions of white youngsters in the hollows of Appalachia and the rural and urban pockets of poverty. (The annual poverty level for a family of four was $9,862 that year.)

· Many families with impoverished youngsters get no government help, and those that do get a lot less than affluent Americans think. Welfare (Aid to Families with Dependent Children) payments average $24.32 per person per week, and food stamps average 45 cents per person per meal.

Between 1981 and 1982 infant death rates for all Americans increased in 11 states; minorities suffered setbacks in 13 states. There are now parts of America where a baby doesn't have as much chance of living to be a year old as does one born in Panama, Guyana or Cuba.

Reagan is a powerful advocate, so it would be marvelous to have him speaking as passionately for the healthy survival of fetuses that mothers want, and children already born, as he does for fetuses that women and teen-age girls do not want to carry to term.

The Children's Defense Fund says that infant mortality rates are rising, and are shamefully high among minorities, because of a growing lack of prenatal care for poor women. Its report cites cuts in Medicaid coverage and reductions in nutrition programs by the Reagan administration, plus the loss of health insurance because of unemployment, as reasons why there has been a drop in the percentage of women receiving medical care early in their pregnancy.

Babies born to women receiving late care or none at all are three times as likely to die in infancy as those born to women receiving early care, the CDF reports.

The next time the president gives his speech about the pain and "killings" of abortions, he may want to answer some questions raised by this CDF report. Why has a president so committed to a right to life cut $10 billion a year in federal health, family nutrition, education, child care and family support programs—cuts the Children's Defense Fund says have endangered the well-being and futures of millions of poor children?

Why has Reagan espoused policies that threw 700,000 children off AFDC and Medicaid in fiscal 1982, leaving only 52 poor children out of 100 getting AFDC and 73 out of 100 receiving Medicaid?

Why has a president who professes to care so much about saving children taken compensatory education opportunities away from 440,000 disadvantaged children and taken child care services out of the reach of many thousands more?

Reagan's speech about saving fetuses doesn't carry so noble a ring when you read the Children's Defense Fund report about what he has done to the children who live among us.

REAGAN DEFYING U.S. TRADITION ON PERSONAL NATURE OF RELIGION

(By Abe Zaidan)

The story didn't get a lot of attention—four paragraphs on Page 12—in last Wednesday's New York Times. It was about President Reagan's appearance on ABC-TV's Good Morning America the day before. It quoted him as saying that people who are using sidewalk grates as makeshift beds are "homeless, you might say, by choice."

The President, the Associated Press account reported, said he was referring to former mental patients who, after recent changes in the law, were free to leave institutions.

Now, if you are a Reagan supporter, you may have one of the following reactions to the story:

His version of the "street people" is absolutely correct.

He didn't mean it the way it sounded.

He was misquoted, or the story was taken out of context.

So what?

Figures on the number of homeless in America are hard to come by, probably because most nose-counts are based on mailing addresses, telephone numbers or some form of institutional reports, all of which exclude these unfortunate souls. And if you started counting them by progressing north from Bowery and Prince streets in New York City, some would be dead by the time you reached Times Square.

So you rely on the estimates of the beleaguered agencies that are forced to deal with the problem on a catch-as-catch-can basis. The latest I've seen were in Joan Beck's perceptive column on Thursday's Commentary page: 500,000 to 3 million. And, she notes, the problem is growing.

Of itself, the President's homeless-by-choice reaction, to put it in the best light, could be just that: an instant response to a question that would require hours to touch all of the bases. But that argument is hard to buy in light of the deliberate—and insensitive—tone the Reagan administration has set in responding to serious social problems in America.

On occasions I have heard the President suggest that the unemployed need only look at the classified ads if they really want to find work. (Perhaps true in some cases, but certainly not the majority.)

Edwin Meese, the man Reagan has chosen to be his attorney general, has pooh-poohed the extent of hunger in America, saying he has not seen any figures to support the claim of wide-spread hunger—a view shared by a White House task force. They now have the figures, courtesy of the latest Harris Survey, which reported last week that nearly 21 million Americans can "reasonably be classified as suffering from hunger." Put another way, hunger has found its way into nearly one of 10 homes.

On the matter of women's rights, the President repeatedly insists that he sincerely seeks progress short of the Equal Rights Amendment. But in practice, his Justice Department has come out against a federal court ruling in Washington state that declared a woman ought to be paid as much as a man for a comparable job.

There is another problem of tone that has increasingly worked its way into this year's campaign rhetoric. It strikes me as being theocratic in nature, and certainly blind to the diversity of religious beliefs in this country. Essentially it deals with abortion and, secondly, prayer in public schools. The President felt the school-prayer issue was such a bedrock of American values that he even squeezed it into his mini-announcement that he would seek re-election.

In both instances—abortion and school prayers—Reagan has set distinct we-and-they standards. If you are "they," you must certainly favor wholesale abortions and a Godless barbaric existence.

Even if he might not go that far if pressed, it is the tone of those utterances that makes me uncomfortable.

Besides, the assumptions simply aren't true. Religious conviction is, and ought to be, a very personal matter in a free society.

If one president can impose his religious views on a person's private life, what's is to prevent the next president from imposing quite the opposite in the name of religion?

Remember the fears in some quarters when Jack Kennedy, a Catholic, and Jimmy Carter, a born-again Christian, were running for president? That somehow they would establish their beliefs as the law of the land? It never happened. Both men saw to it that religion remained a private matter.

But on faith, as well as most issues of social consequence in America, Reagan has broken the mold—in tone and, I'm now convinced, in substance as well. And I suspect that will become more disturbingly evident as this year's presidential campaign lets fly.●

SENATE BILLS REFERRED

Bills of the Senate of the following title were taken from the Speaker's table and, under the rule, referred as follows:

S. 1762. An act entitled "Comprehensive Crime Control Act of 1984"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

S. 1787. An act to establish a National Drug Enforcement Policy Board; to the Committees on Energy and Commerce and the Judiciary.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

Mr. HAWKINS, from the Committee on House Administration, reported that that committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the House of the following title, which was thereupon signed by the Speaker:

H.R. 1557. An act for the relief of William D. Benoni.

SENATE ENROLLED BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED

The SPEAKER announced his signature to an enrolled bill and a joint resolution of the Senate of the following titles:

S. 1340. An act to revise and extend the Rehabilitation Act of 1973, to provide for the operation of the Helen Keller National Center for Deaf-Blind Youths and Adults, to extend the Developmental Disabilities Assistance and Bill of Rights Act, and for other purposes; and

S.J. Res. 146. Joint resolution to designate March 23, 1984, as "National Energy Education Day."

JOINT RESOLUTION PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT

Mr. HAWKINS, from the Committee on House Administration, reported that that committee did, on February 8, 1984, present to the President, for his approval a joint resolution of the House of the following title:

H.J. Res. 290. Joint resolution to permit free entry into the United States of the personal effects, equipment, and other related articles of foreign participants, officials, and other accredited members of delegations involved in the games of the XXIII Olympiad to be held in the United States in 1984.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. MARTINEZ. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the provisions of House Concurrent Resolution 255, 98th Congress, the House stands adjourned until 12 o'clock noon, Tuesday, February 21, 1984.

Thereupon (at 4 o'clock and 14 minutes p.m.), pursuant to House Concurrent Resolution 255, the House adjourned until Tuesday, February 21, 1984, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

2612. A communication from the President of the United States, transmitting a request for supplemental appropriations for fiscal year 1984 and amendments to the request for appropriations for fiscal year 1985, pursuant to 31 U.S.C. 1107. (H. Doc. No. 98-169); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENTS

Under clause 6 of rule XXIII, proposed amendments were submitted as follows:

H.R. 2751

By Mr. BIAGGI:

—Page 3, after line 13, insert the following new section (and redesignate succeeding sections accordingly):

LIMITATION ON DISCRIMINATORY ACTIVITY

SEC. 5. (a) Section 5(h)(3) of the National Foundation on the Acts and Humanities Act of 1965 (20 U.S.C. 954(h)(3)) is amended by adding at the end thereof "or have been used in any manner to denigrate any ethnic, racial, religious, or minority group;".

(b) Section 5 of the National Foundation on the Arts and Humanities Act of 1965 (20 U.S.C. 954) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(m) Through regularly monitoring and reviewing programs and projects for which funds are paid under this section, the Chairman of the National Endowment for the Arts shall take such action as may be necessary to ensure that the artistic content of such programs and projects does not contribute to promoting the stereotyping of any ethnic, racial, religious, or minority group.".

SENATE—Thursday, February 9, 1984

(Legislative day of Monday, February 6, 1984)

The Senate met at 11:30 a.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the President pro tempore (Mr. THURMOND).

PRAYER

The Chaplain, the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Let us pray.

God of mercy, judge of all the Earth, help us never to forget that Thou art the God of order. May we remember the law writ large in history, the inexorable law of the harvest. Thy word declares, "Be not deceived, God is not mocked: for whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap." (Galatians 6: 7). We "sow the wind, we reap the whirlwind." (Hosea 8: 7). We "sow to ourselves in righteousness, we reap in mercy * * *." (Hosea 10: 12). As we take seriously the physical order by which we progress technologically, may we take seriously the moral order whereby we grow spiritually. We pray in the name of Him whose perfect humanity reflected obedience to Thy law. Amen.

RECOGNITION OF THE MAJORITY LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The majority leader is recognized.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the Chair.

ADJOURNMENT OF THE TWO HOUSES

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, it is my hope that we can adjourn today, but in order to do that, I think it is appropriate that we take the precaution that we have done now twice before providing that the House and the Senate may be called back in session at the joint initiative of the Speaker of the House and the majority leader in the Senate, after consulting with the minority leaders in the House and Senate.

Mr. President, I have discussed this with the minority leader.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Chair lay before the Senate the adjournment resolution sent us by the House of Representatives, which is House Concurrent Resolution 255.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WALLOP). The clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A CONCURRENT RESOLUTION (H. CON. RES. 255)

Providing for an adjournment of the House from February 9 to 21, 1984, and an adjournment of the Senate from February 9 or February 10 to February 20, 1984.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the majority leader?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

AMENDMENT NO. 2705

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, on behalf of myself and the distinguished minority leader I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Tennessee (Mr. BAKER), for himself and Mr. BYRD proposes an amendment numbered 2705.

At the end of the concurrent resolution, add the following:

"SEC. 2. The Speaker of the House and the Majority Leader of the Senate, acting jointly after consultation with the Minority Leader of the House and the Minority Leader of the Senate, shall notify the Members of the House and the Senate, respectively, to reassemble whenever, in their opinion, the public interest shall warrant it."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee (Mr. BAKER).

The amendment (No. 2705) was agreed to.

The concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 255), as amended, was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the concurrent resolution from the House of Representatives (H. Con. Res. 255) entitled "Concurrent resolution providing for an adjournment of the House from February 9 to 21, 1984, and an adjournment of the Senate from February 9 or February 10 to February 20, 1984," do pass with the following amendment:

SEC. 2. The Speaker of the House and the Majority Leader of the Senate, acting jointly after consultation with the Minority Leader of the House and the Minority Leader of the Senate, shall notify the Members of the House and the Senate, respectively, to reassemble whenever, in their opinion, the public interest shall warrant it.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the concurrent resolution was agreed to.

Mr. BYRD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, if the majority leader will yield, I compliment him on including this language which has just been adopted by way of amendment. I think that he and I both had considered earlier even adjourning the Senate on a pro forma basis but, after full consideration of the subject, this seems to provide the proper approach and one which would be workable in the event that there is an emergency situation which would require the Senate and the House to be called back.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I thank the Senator.

Let me acknowledge that the minority leader expressed his concern and brought to my attention the options and possibilities that would be available so the House and Senate could perform their constitutional responsibilities, notwithstanding the adjournment. I thank him for that.

I, too, believe this is the best course of action. It is a proven formula that we have followed, this being the third time, I believe. I can assure the minority leader and other Senators that if there is any doubt about whether the House and Senate should be called back in an emergency circumstance, the doubt would be resolved in favor of doing it rather than against doing it. So it is more than a formality, it is indeed a protection that is appropriate under the circumstances.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, will the majority leader yield?

Mr. BAKER. Yes.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, having worked with Senator BAKER all these years, I have no concern with respect to the majority leader's taking action, if action is necessary, in calling us back. I have full confidence in him in that regard.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the minority leader.

Mr. President, I similarly have the same regard and respect for the minority leader and when he was majority leader we enjoyed the same relationship and the same confidence.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, there are resolutions now dealing with a number of items with respect to committee assignments and ratios and one to amend the rules. The minority leader, I believe, is familiar with those. If he has no objection, I will present them at this time.

Mr. BYRD. I have no objection.

● This "bullet" symbol identifies statements or insertions which are not spoken by the Member on the floor.

INCREASING THE SIZE OF COMMITTEES

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I send a resolution to the desk in respect to the adjustment of the size of committees and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That rule XXV, paragraph 2, be amended for the 98th Congress as follows:

Strike "20" after "Energy and Natural Resources" and insert in lieu thereof "21";

Strike "17" after "Foreign Relations" and insert in lieu thereof "18";

Strike "16" after "Environment and Public Works" and insert in lieu thereof "18".

Strike "15" after "Aging" in rule XXV, paragraph 3(b), and insert in lieu thereof "19".

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Tennessee (Mr. BAKER)?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 338) was agreed to.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. BYRD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

MAKING CERTAIN MAJORITY PARTY COMMITTEE ASSIGNMENTS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I send to the desk a resolution making majority party assignments to the committees as constituted and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

S. RES. 339

Resolved, That the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. THURMOND) is hereby appointed to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

SEC. 2. The Senator from New Hampshire (Mr. HUMPHREY) is hereby appointed to the Committee on Banking, Housing and Urban Affairs, in lieu of the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

SEC. 3. The Senator from Florida (Mrs. HAWKINS) is hereby appointed to the Committee on Foreign Relations, in lieu of the Committee on Banking, Housing and Urban Affairs.

SEC. 4. The Senator from Washington (Mr. EVANS) is hereby appointed to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources, as well as the Committee on Environment and Public Works, in lieu of the Committees on Armed Services and Governmental Affairs.

SEC. 5. The Senator from Virginia (Mr. WARNER) and the Senator from Washington (Mr. EVANS) are hereby appointed to the Special Committee on Aging.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Tennessee (Mr. BAKER)?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 339) was agreed to.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. BYRD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The minority leader.

AMENDMENT OF RULE XXV RELATING TO COMMITTEE MEMBERSHIP

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I send a resolution to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

S. RES. 340

A resolution amending Rule XXV.

Resolved, That at the end of Rule XXV, add the following:

(18) A Senator who, on the date this subdivision is agreed to, is serving on the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry and the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs, may, during the Ninety-eighth Congress, also serve as a member of the Committee on Armed Services, but in no event may such Senator serve, by reason of this subdivision, as a member of more than three committees listed in paragraph 2.

(19) A Senator who, on the date this subdivision is agreed to, is serving on the Committee on Armed Services and the Committee on Governmental Affairs, may, during the Ninety-eighth Congress, also serve as a member of the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources, but in no event may such Senator serve by reason of this subdivision as a member of more than three committees listed in paragraph 2.

(20) A Senator who, on the date this subdivision is agreed to, is serving on the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs and the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation, may, during the 98th Congress, also serve as a member of the Committee on Environment and Public Works, but in no event may such Senator serve, by reason of this subdivision, as a member of more than three committees listed in paragraph 2.

(21) A Senator who, on the date this subdivision is agreed to, is serving on the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry and the Committee on Finance, may, during the Ninety-eighth Congress, also serve as a member of the Committee on Governmental Affairs, but in no event may such Senator serve, by reason of this subdivision, as a member of more than three committees listed in paragraph 2.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the resolution (S. Res. 340) was considered and agreed to.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

MINORITY PARTY COMMITTEE ASSIGNMENTS

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I send another resolution to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

S. RES. 341

Making certain Minority party assignments.

Resolved, That the Senator from Illinois (Mr. DIXON) is hereby appointed to the Committee on Armed Services.

SEC. 2. The Senator from Michigan (Mr. LEVIN) is hereby appointed to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

SEC. 3. The Senator from New Jersey (Mr. LAUTENBERG) is hereby appointed to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

SEC. 4. The Senator from Arkansas (Mr. PRYOR) is hereby appointed to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

SEC. 5. The Senator from Louisiana (Mr. JOHNSTON) and the Senator from New Mexico (Mr. BINGAMAN) are hereby appointed to the Special Committee on Aging.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the resolution (S. Res. 341) was considered and agreed to.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I want to extend my thanks to the majority leader for considering various requests made by the minority leading up to the offering of these resolutions. In some instances, the distinguished majority leader was able to accede to the requests, and in other instances he was unable to accede to the requests. He certainly made the effort, and what he could do he did. The minority is very appreciative. What he could not do he could not do, and we are sorry about that, but we understand.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I thank the minority leader for his remarks. Indeed, we jockeyed back and forth over a period of time trying to work out the best arrangement we could.

I want to say it is never an easy matter to establish ratios and apply them specifically to a range of committees. It is more difficult than committee members may realize. But the minority leader, in his unfailing way, while demanding on the one hand, was reasonable and, one way or another, we worked it out as we always do. I thank the minority leader.

Mr. BYRD. If the majority leader will yield further, I want to express thanks to Bill Hildenbrand, the Secretary of the Senate, and to Pat Griffin, the secretary to the minority, for their excellent work in connection with these matters.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, the minority leader has now done it. He has said for all the world to know that it is really Mr. Hildenbrand and Mr. Griffin who do the work. They do it very well indeed, and I join the minority leader in congratulating them.

AMENDMENT OF RULE XXV RELATING TO COMMITTEE MEMBERSHIP

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, there is one further resolution we should now take up, a resolution to amend rule XXV to provide certain exceptions which will validate the appointments we have made. I send the resolution to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

S. RES. 342

A resolution amending Rule XXV.

Resolved, That at the end of Rule XXV, add the following:

(15) A Senator who on the date this subdivision is agreed to is serving on the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry, the Committee on Labor and Human Resources, and on the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs, may, in lieu of their service on the Committee on Banking, Housing and Urban Affairs, during the Ninety-eighth Congress, also serve as a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations, but in no event may such Senator serve, by reason of this subdivision, as a member of more than three committees listed in paragraph 2.

(16) A Senator who on the date this subdivision is agreed to is serving on the Committee on Armed Services, the Committee on Environment and Public Works, and the Committee on Labor and Human Resources, may, in lieu of the Committee on Labor and Human Resources, also serve as a member of the Committee on Banking, Housing and Urban Affairs, but in no event may such Senator serve by reason of this subdivision as a member of more than three committees listed in paragraph 2.

(17) A Senator who, on the date this subdivision is agreed to, is serving on the Committee on Rules and Administration may also serve as a member of the Special Committee on Aging.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the resolution (S. Res. 342) was considered and agreed to.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, there will be a time for morning business later in the proceedings so we can take care of a number of routine matters which I believe the House may be waiting for. Rather than impose on the time of those Senators who anticipate speaking at this time, I yield the floor.

DEATH PENALTY

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will now resume consideration of S. 1765, which the clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 1765) to establish constitutional procedures for the imposition of the sentence of death, and for other purposes.

The Senate resumed consideration of the bill.

Mr. DIXON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois.

NO MORE MARION-TYPE KILLINGS

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, the taking of another individual's life, under whatever guise, is a matter of the gravest concern in our society. Debate has raged in our country for decades over one manifestation of the taking of a human life; namely, the death penalty.

I first wrestled with the question of the death penalty as an attorney and then as a freshman legislator in the General Assembly of the State of Illinois.

May I say for the record, Mr. President, I have prosecuted death penalty cases as an assistant State's attorney of St. Clair County, Ill., and I have defended individuals on many occasions in death penalty cases.

After listening to all of the arguments on both sides of the issue during my years of private and public life, I concluded that the death penalty, within carefully prescribed limits, is warranted.

Mr. President, I addressed this body on November 9, 1983, to urge the Senate leadership to bring S. 1765 to the Senate floor for our consideration.

I focused then, as now, on one important reason to act upon S. 1765: The lives of our Federal employees are at stake.

Mr. President, on October 22, 1983, two dastardly acts occurred at the maximum Federal security facility in Marion, Ill. Two correction officers were savagely murdered in separate incidents that day by inmates who stabbed their victims to death. Two other officers suffered serious injuries. All four assaults were unprovoked, which makes their tragic results even more demanding of our attention.

The two inmates who killed the guards had committed the same crime against others on previous occassions—not once, not twice, not three times, not even four or five, but, believe it or not six times! These two inmates have now killed a total of eight individuals since they were locked behind bars, according to at least one authoritative report.

As far as I am concerned, Mr. President, this tragedy at Marion highlights a very significant truth: When a prisoner is serving a life sentence, no deterrent exists at all to prevent him or her from harming or killing other inmates, guards, other staff, a lawyer, a reporter or anyone else. In essence, that killer is allowed to walk free! Do not mistake what I am saying: The guilty party does not get to leave prison. In effect, however, because the judicial system has already imposed a sentence of life on the individual, there is nothing left to deter the person.

As our law now exists, prisoners can kill with absolute impunity on the grounds of the maximum security penitentiary at Marion and elsewhere without fear of reprisal. without fear of reprisal.

This situation is intolerable, Mr. President. It rises to the level of the incomprehensible and absurd when one considers, as one Marion official put it, that the officers were killed "for sport."

Following those murders, Associate Attorney General D. Lowell Jensen testified before the Senate Judiciary Committee. A few months ago, I asked that his remarks on the Marion killings be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I doubt that it is necessary to repeat that prior request, but I would like to share with you Mr. Jensen's introductory remarks. He opened his testimony by saying:

* * * The brutal murders * * * are an outrage. But also outrageous is the fact that a decade's inaction has left current Federal law in a state where it is likely that our criminal justice system will be powerless to impose any meaningful sanction for these vicious crimes.

I could not say it better. Mr. Jensen hit the nail on the head. The current state of Federal law is an outrage!

His statement provides solid reasoning to support proposed section 1118 of title 18 of the United States Code, which is contained in S. 1765.

In light of what transpired at Marion, I urge my colleagues to reflect carefully upon the current situation, because it cries out for a remedy. I know there is a great deal of controversy surrounding the current bill, and the issue of capital punishment in general. I understand that. Reasonable people may well differ over how best to respond to moral and personal demands.

I hasten to add, however, that wanton murder by inmates who believe they have nothing to lose must be halted.

I recognize, Mr. President, that the provision of the bill which would prevent repeats of Marion-type tragedies is but one of many sections of a very controversial bill. By focusing on this specific section of the bill in these remarks, I do not hope to convince individual Senators that they should, therefore, support the entire package. That decision is one which each Senator must make based on his or her own beliefs.

My purpose, Mr. President, is to point out that we have an obligation to vote on the merits of this proposal—an obligation to the American people. That duty entails the necessity of confronting the death penalty issue head-on. In limiting my remarks to the specific section of the law dealing with inmates who kill, my intent is to suggest that the death penalty, under certain narrowly drawn circumstances, is indeed warranted.

Mr. President I shall vote for cloture.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, the Justice Department has written a letter to us on this subject which I wish to present to the Senate at this time.

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
OFFICE OF LEGISLATIVE AFFAIRS,
February 9, 1984.

Hon. STROM THURMOND,
Chairman, Committee on the Judiciary, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: This is to express the continuing strong support of the Department of Justice for S. 1765, which would establish constitutional procedures for imposition of the death penalty for the most egregious federal offenses. While federal statutes consistently provide for the death penalty for murder, treason, and espionage, these provisions have been rendered unenforceable since the Supreme Court's 1972 Furman decision. For these statutes to be enforceable Congress must enact statutory guidelines and other constitutionally required procedural safeguards which the Supreme Court has held necessary to protect against the arbitary or disproportionate application on capital punishment.

It is essential that the opportunity exist to impose the death penalty for the most brutal and reprehensible federal crimes involving the murder of innocent victims or grave jeopardy to the very security of the nation. It must be recognized that some crimes are so horrible that no alternative response, not even life imprisonment without possibility of parole, can provide a just and proportionate punishment. Also, we strongly believe that the death penalty can be an effective deterrent for cases involving premeditation and calculation, and thus save the lives of those who would otherwise become the irretrievable victims of crime.

The recent brutal murders of two correctional officers at the federal penitentiary in Marion, Illinois unfortunately is a clear illustration of the impotence of a federal criminal justice system in which the death penalty cannot be imposed under any circumstances. Those charged and now awaiting trial in federal court for these murders are two inmates already under multiple life sentences who were incarcerated in the most secure unit in the highest level security prison in the federal correctional system. For such offenders, life imprisonment—the most severe sanction federal law now had to offer—is meaningless in terms of punishment and deterrence. Moreover, these cases show that imprisonment does not truly incapacitate the most incorrigible violent offenders, it merely reduces the sphere of their potential victims to other inmates and prison personnel.

In recent years, the Committee on the Judiciary has held extensive hearings on the death penalty and undertake an exhaustive and conscientious effort to formulate procedures for the imposition of the death penalty at the federal level that are in accord with the Supreme Court's decisions over the last decade. S. 1765 is the culmination of this effort and provides a procedural mechanism that permits imposition of the death penalty for a limited number of the most serious federal crimes yet assures against arbitrary, disproportionate, or discriminatory application of the penalty.

Since 1972, more than two-thirds of the States have enacted new death penalty laws to meet the constitutional requirements articulated by the Supreme Court. Restoration of the death penalty at the federal level is long overdue.

In short, the federal criminal justice system should, in our view, provide criminal sanctions that are fully adequate in terms of punishment, deterrence and protection of the public. We believe that enactment of S. 1765 would achieve that important goal.

Sincerely,

ROBERT A. MCCONNELL,
Assistant Attorney General.

Mr. President, it is clear how this administration stands. This administration favors this bill. The Justice Department favors this bill. The prosecutors of this Nation favor this bill. Murder and serious crimes have got to come to an end. Again, I want to say that crime in this country has gotten out of hand.

I repeat that the number of violent crimes committed in this Nation, according to the FBI 1982 major crime index, was 1,285,705. A violent crime was committed every 25 seconds. A murder was committed every 25 minutes, with a total for that year of 21,012.

There was a forcible rape every 7 minutes, for a total of 77,763 throughout the country for that year; a robbery every 59 seconds, for a total of 536,888 robberies for that year; aggravated assault, one every 49 seconds, for a total of 650,042 for that particular year.

Mr. President, the number of murders committed in the United States annually have doubled in the last 20 years.

Mr. President, I might also point out that 39 States have enacted capital punishment statutes since the Supreme Court decision of Furman against Georgia in 1972—39 States. All but 11 States now have capital punishment statutes. The Federal laws relating to capital punishment were invalidated when a State law was held unconsitutional for failure to give adequate guidance to the jury in deciding to impose the death penalty in a particular case. The United States has never corrected this except for a homicide committed in the course of an aircraft hijacking, for which a constitutional procedure for imposing capital punishment was enacted in 1974. If we have capital punishment for causing a death in the course of an aircraft hijacking, we also need capital punishment for the other Federal crimes committed in this field—that is, murder. This includes killing the President, Members of Congress, Supreme Court justices, Federal prison guards, and many others.

Espionage is also very important. Those who would betray our country and those who would steal important secrets and subvert our Government should be held accountable with their lives in aggravated cases. Similarly, treason—traitors to the country—should be liable for the death penalty if the jury so decides in aggravated cases.

The jury may not decide to give capital punishment in any of these cases, but they should have the discretion to do so if they see fit.

The fourth offense covered by the bill is the attempt to kill the President, where he actually strikes the President or otherwise comes dangerously close to killing him.

Mr. President, I want to say further that this bill is not only supported by the Department of Justice and the administration, it is supported by the National Sheriffs Association; it is supported by the International Association of Chiefs of Police; it is supported by the National Association of Chiefs of Police.

Mr. President, yesterday morning, I spoke in Nashville, Tenn., at a law enforcement center there. There were law enforcement people there from 14 States. I wish every Member of the Senate could have seen and heard what I did.

It was brought out in that presentation that 2 people have killed 87 people. They have murdered, they have raped, and they have dismembered bodies. In many cases, after raping a women, they would dismember her body, cut off her legs. In several cases, they cut her head off. In other cases, they actually disemboweled her. In some cases, they even cut out and removed her sex organs.

Mr. President, if that kind of outrageous conduct does not deserve capital punishment, I do not know what does. Here are two people who, as I said, have raped and murdered, dismembering and killing not 1 or 2, but 87 people.

Mr. President, with regard to one of these defendants, this was given in the presentation down in Nashville. This was with regard to the one, Lucas, one of the defendants:

Oftentimes Lucas would stab the victim repeatedly around the neck and chest areas, sometimes cutting the victim's throat and sometimes disemboweling her. He would also strangle his victims manually or with their own clothing. Numerous victims died as a result of being beaten to death. Some of the victims may not show signs of rape due to the fact that Lucas sometimes reached a climax, ejaculating in his clothing while killing the victims. He also is known to have mutilated the bodies by biting off the nipples of the breasts and castration. Lucas is also known to decapitate the victims and keep the heads for several days in his car. He would then dispose of the head, usually in a different State. Lucas would usually undress the victim before disposing of the body. Bodies were often left along highways, back roads and close to roadside parks. Several of the bodies were discovered nude with the exception of their socks. Lucas has a phobia about socks. He refuses to wear them or wash his feet.

Mr. President, he is one of the defendants who have killed at least 87 people. Law enforcement officials have the evidence on that many. Officials think he and his companion may have killed many more, and they believe they are going to continue to find evidence on those murders.

Mr. President, with crimes like this being committed throughout the country, how can we refuse? Suppose your wife or daughter was raped and dismembered and disemboweled? Is there a Senator who would refuse to give them capital punishment? I do not believe there is.

Mr. President, the time has come to reenact capital punishment at the Federal level. Thirty-nine States have done it. The Federal Government needs to do it. I hope the Senate will this afternoon vote cloture so we can pass this bill. It will be a deterrent to crime. As I said, in the last 20 years, the homicide rate has doubled.

Mr. President, I again say I hope the Senate will see fit to vote cloture so we can proceed with this bill.

Mr. LEVIN. Will the Senator yield for a question before he leaves, just a brief question?

Mr. THURMOND. I will be glad to yield.

Mr. LEVIN. I must ask this question. Everyone in the Senate is equally abhorred by the crime the Senator has described. There is nobody in this Senate who abhors such crime any less than does the Senator from South Carolina.

How many of those crimes that the Senator has just enumerated took place in States that already have capital punishment? How many of the specific crimes that he has just gone through, with the kind of abominations which are so abhorrent to everybody in this Chamber, took place in States that already have capital punishment?

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I am sure some of them did take place in States that have capital punishment. I hope those 2 who killed 87 people committed those crimes in States that do have capital punishment, so they can get capital punishment. But if they were committed in the 11 other States, then they would not. But if they had committed those crimes—and some of them may have, I am not sure—on Federal property in a State, in a national park or military base or where the Federal Government has jurisdiction, then they could not get capital punishment.

Mr. LEVIN. The point is they were not deterred.

Mr. THURMOND. If any of them did commit serious crimes where there was Federal jurisdiction, they could only get life. We do not think that that is just punishment. Deterrence is not the only reason for the death penalty. We do not think that is fair to the public. Therefore, we think that the Federal Government ought to have the right, if the jury sees fit, to give capital punishment where it is warranted.

Mr. LEVIN. The point is they were not deterred from committing those crimes by the presence of capital punishment.

Mr. President, as always, the Senator from Illinois (Mr. DIXON) expresses a point eloquently.

In this case, the difficulty is that the issue is not whether or not we are going to reimpose the death penalty. The issue today is whether or not 1 day of debate on the death penalty—1 day of debate plus perhaps a few hours—is a reasonable debate in the U.S. Senate on this issue. We spent 5 days on withholding on interest and dividends. We spent weeks on the gas tax. Think of it. Five days on withholding on interest and dividends. Weeks on the gas tax. We have had about a day-and-a-quarter on the death penalty, and we are voting on cloture. We have not even begun to get into the details of this bill.

The Senator from Illinois says that we should have the death penalty for the wanton killing of prison guards. That is one of many, many sections in this bill.

There are provisions in this bill which would allow for the death penalty even though the defendants did not kill, did not attempt to kill, and did not intend that a killing take place or that lethal force be employed.

I am going to repeat that, because I hope those listening in their offices will realize the breadth of this bill on which we are going to vote on cloture. The bill permits the death penalty to be imposed in situations in which the defendant himself or herself did not kill, did not attempt to kill, did not intend that a killing take place or that lethal force be employed.

This is not a bill which has been carefully crafted within proscribed limits, as the Senator from Illinois has said. He picked on one item where there was the killing of a prison guard. It is a much broader bill, with many provisions in it.

We do have an obligation to vote on the merits. I agree with that. But, given the history of this body, we should have a deliberative debate on issues of great moment to this country. Can we say, in good conscience, that a day and a quarter of debate on reinstitution of the death penalty is sufficient, when we have issues of this magnitude before us? That is the issue on which we will be voting. Should we stop debate on a bill of this breadth?

The issues involved in this are emotional, and people have strong feelings on this issue. I would wager that everybody in this Chamber feels first and foremost for victims and their families, that everybody in this Chamber feels for a society which has been brutalized by violence and by terrorist acts, and that we all want violent persons removed from this society. There is unanimity on that; there is consensus on that.

I do not think people who favor the death penalty feel any more deeply about victims than people who oppose the death penalty. I do not think people who favor the death penalty feel any more deeply about society being brutalized by violent crime than those of us who oppose the death penalty. All of us want violent persons removed from society, off the streets.

The issue here, however, is rational as well as emotional. The question we have to face and should face in a reasonable debate of reasonable length is with respect to the realistic possibilities of error which we detailed yesterday in many cases. We have put into the RECORD many cases where the wrong person was convicted of a capital offense. The absence of a showing of the details of the death penalty and the issues involving the morality of the death penalty—these are all issues which are worthy of a lot more debate than a day and a half. These are issues on which people who are equally repulsed by crime and terror differ; and, at a minimum, we should give these issues the kind of debate which the traditions of this body require.

I must say that a good part of my own opposition to capital punishment stems from my view and my own experience that innocent persons have been convicted of capital crimes and they have been put to death for crimes they never committed. But there are other compelling reasons why the Senate should reject this effort to reinstitute the death penalty.

Close scrutiny of the States where capital punishment is the practice shows that even under the so-called guided-discretion post-Furman statutes, the death penalty continues to be imposed in an unjust and arbitrary manner.

Despite suggested guidelines for imposition of the death penalty, our experience with post-Furman sentencing procedures reveals that they have not eliminated the inequitable imposition of State sanctioned death. The poor, the uneducated, and minorities are still more likely to be sentenced to death than are those who have the financial resources necessary to obtain the best legal defense. Strong support from the family of the accused and the know-how to make a good impression on the jury may make the difference between life and death. No matter how hard we try to eliminate flaws in our judicial system, it will continue to be a reflection of the inequities which exist throughout our social system. No procedural safeguards can eliminate the arbitrariness and discretion evident at every stage of a criminal proceeding.

A study of arbitrariness and discrimination under post-Furman capital statutes by William J. Bowers and Glenn L. Pierce, the director and assistant director of the Center for Applied Social Research at Northeastern University, resulted in findings as follows:

• • • There are gross differences in the treatment of potentially capital offenders by race of offender and victim and by judicial circuits within States. These are (1) independent of aggravating felony-related circumstances, (2) present at both presentencing and sentencing stages of the criminal justice process, (3) uncorrected by postsentencing appellate review process, (4) unaltered by the form and restrictiveness of capital statutes among states, and (5) remarkably similar to the best-documented patterns of differential treatment by race of offender and victims under pre-Furman capital statues, now ruled unconstitutional. These findings show that the present system of capital punishment is inconsistent with the constitutional standards of the Furman and Gregg decisions of the United States Supreme Court, but is instead consistent with historically prevailing extralegal influences which compromise and displace the legally prescribed functions of such punishment and are an enduring source of arbitrariness and discrimination.

Mr. President, I have put a chart at the rear of the Chamber which reflects some of the arbitrariness of death penalities, even following Furman. We can see in that chart just what difference these arbitrary factors make as to whether or not someone is going to be put to death.

We have taken a look at the States that have the largest number of people on death row for which data is available—Texas, Florida, Georgia, Illinois—and we looked at what difference it makes if the victim in this case is white or black. We looked at the racial patterns in capital sentencing.

We can see on the chart that if the victim is black in Florida, which has the most capital offenses, there is about a 10 percent less chance of the perpetrator receiving capital punishment than if the victim is white.

In Texas, there is about a 20 percent greater chance that the defendant will be put to death if the victim is white than if the victim is black.

In Georgia, there is about a 10 percent greater chance that the defendant will be put to death when he kills a white person than when he kills a black person, and in Illinois, about a 6 percent, or 600 times the likelihood that the person killing a white person will be put to death than the person whose victim is black.

These arbitrary patterns of race, in this case involving the race of the victim, permeate our system of justice.

I wish my friend from Illinois did not have to leave for another pressing engagement so that he could help explain to us why it should be that the victim's race should be so overwhelmingly relevant as to whether or not the perpetrator is put to death.

There are similar studies relative to the race of defendants that show that race is still relevant in this society.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a study that is reprinted in the January 5 edition of the New York Times showing the relationship between the race and the victim and the imposition of the death sentence in eight States.

There being no objection, the study was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COURTS STUDY LINK BETWEEN VICTIM'S RACE AND IMPOSITION OF DEATH PENALTY

(By Fay S. Joyce)

ATLANTA, Jan. 4.—With more executions likely to take place as death row inmates exhaust their appeals, opponents of the death penalty are increasingly focusing on the agrument that imposing the death sentence tends to be related to the race of the victim.

The courts are already beginning to consider whether that argument should be taken into account. The United States Court of Appeals for the 11th Circuit will hear arguments in Atlanta the week of Jan 16 on the admissibility of a study of sentencings in Georgia by a team from the University of Iowa led by David Baldus. On Dec. 13 the Supreme Court granted a stay of execution to a convicted Georgia murderer, Alpha Otis Stephens, until the appeals court rules on the legal relevance of the study.

COURT BARRED ARBITRARINESS

The merits of the Baldus study have already been argued here before Federal District Judge Owen Forrester, who, in a different case, is expected to rule soon on the factual question of whether there is racial discrimination in the application of the Georgia death penalty.

A new, broader study shows that murderers of white victims have received the death penalty more often than murderers of blacks and this is cited as significant evidence that the penalty continues to be applied in a discriminatory manner, even though the Supreme Court held in 1972 that imposing it arbitrarily was unconstitutional.

Students of the death penalty believe the latest study, a review of 17,000 homicide cases in eight states carried out by Samuel Gross and Robert Mauro of Stanford University, along with other studies that seem to indicate the legal system values white lives more than black ones, will put pressure on courts to reconsider death penalty statutes.

"We may be on the threshold of a whole new evaluation of the racial aspects of the death penalty," Gary Bedau of Tufts University said after reading the Stanford work.

STUDY OF EIGHT STATES

Mr. Gross and Mr. Mauro studied the homicides that resulted in 340 death sentences in Georgia, Florida, Illinois, Oklahoma, Arkansas, North Carolina, Mississippi and Virginia. The authors studied criminal homicides from 1976 to 1980 in which negligence was not a factor and there were known suspects at least 15 years old at the time of the killing.

In each of the eight states they found a person was more likely to be sentenced to death if he had killed a white rather than a black, and in some states far more likely.

The differences were particularly dramatic for Georgia. The study reported on 773 slayings of whites; the death penalty was imposed in 67 of those cases, or 8.7 percent. But in the 1,345 slayings of blacks, only 12 resulted in death sentences, or nine-tenths of 1 percent.

POSSIBLE CAUSES CITED

In Florida, 114 death sentences were imposed in the same period in the cases of 1,803 white victims, or 6.3 percent. But the death penalty was handed down in only 14 of 1,683 homicides involving black victims, or eight-tenths of 1 percent.

In Illinois, where 1,214 whites were homicide victims, the death penalty was imposed in 35 cases, or 2.9 percent. Of the 1,866 murders of blacks, only 10, or one-half of 1 percent, resulted in the death penalty.

While the study did not seek reasons for the differences, Mr. Gross and Mr. Mauro speculated on two possibilities: unconscious racism on the part of prosecutors, jurors and judges who value white life more than black life, and the tendency of largely white juries to identify with white victims.

Attorneys for states argue against interpreting such statistics as evidence of discrimination. Responding to an earlier study, Georgia Attorney General Mike Bowers said: "We acknowledge disparities in sentencing rates. The mere existence of those disparities doesn't carry the burden of proof that there has been intentional discrimination on the basis of race. Discrimination means something purposeful and intentional. That's clearly the standard under the U.S. Supreme Court."

In a 5-to-4 decision, the Supreme Court halted executions in 1972 because it found the death penalty was imposed arbitrarily and was therefore unconstitutional. Two of the five Justices who struck down the death penalty said it had fallen disproportionately on the poor and on members of minority groups who commited murder. States drafted new laws to meet the objections, and in 1976 the Court reinstated the death penalty.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, Charles Black, professor of law at Yale University, is a well-known expert on the post-Furman death penalty statutes. In his book, "Capital Punishment: The Inevitability of Caprice and Mistake," Charles Black has as his principle thesis the theory that post-Furman statutes will continue to be arbitrary and discriminatory. His conclusion is:

One way or another, the official choices—by prosecutors, judges, juries, and Governors—that divide those who are to die from those who are to live are on the whole not made, and cannot be made, under standards that are consistently meaningful and clear, but that they will continue to be made, under no standards at all or under pseudo-standards without discoverable meaning.

Mr. President, I asked the Library of Congress to do a report on racial factors in the imposition of capital punishment in 1981. That report, which has already been made part of the record, reviews a number of situations, a number of circumstances, as relates to who gets life and who gets death. But it shows that in an analysis of the data compiled by Bowers and Pierce, there is:

A consistent pattern across all four States: Black killers, and the killers of whites, are more likely than white killers and the killers of blacks to receive the death penalty * * * their data shows that type of murder did not account for racial differences in the probability of receiving the death penalty. For both felony and nonfelony homicides the same differences by race of both offender and victim appeared.

And that is worth repeating because it shows a consistent pattern of the influence of race in the imposition of the death penalty. "Black killers, and the killers of whites, are more likely than white killers and the killers of blacks to receive the death penalty" in America and that is post-Furman, not pre-Furman.

Mr. President, another persuasive reason why the Senate should reject this attempt to reinstitute the death penalty is that capital punishment has not been proven to be an effective deterrent to crime. In fact, the death penalty may actually have a stimulating effect upon those deranged individuals who see it as a way of attracting attention to themselves.

Studies on the deterrent effect of the death penalty are nearly unanimous in finding that capital punishment acts as no greater deterrent than does life in prison. In fact, a comparison of the average murder rates in those States with the death penalty and those without it shows that the average murder rate in States with the death penalty is about twice as high as it is in the States without the death penalty.

I wish our friend from South Carolina was here to explain to us how it is that he can reach a conclusion that the death penalty deters when the statistics show year after year pre-Furman—post-Furman, that the murder rate in States that have the death penalty is significantly higher than the murder rate in those States that do not have the death penalty.

I asked the Library of Congress to do a comparison for me using the FBI's uniform crime statistics and the capital punishment report released by the Bureau of Justice Statistics. In each of the 6 years examined, the Library of Congress researched States with capital punishment and without and came to the conclusion that States that have capital punishment have about twice as high an average murder rate than did the States without capital punishment.

Here are some of the figures:

In 1977, the murder rate per 100,000 population in death penalty States was about 10.9 percent. The murder rate per 100,000 population in nondeath penalty States was about 5.4 percent.

In 1978, the death penalty, the murder rate in death penalty States was 10.2 percent; in nondeath penalty States, 5.6 percent.

In 1979, the murder rate in death penalty States was 11.2 percent; in nondeath penalty States, 6.3 percent.

In 1980, the death penalty States had a murder rate of 11.4 percent; the nondeath penalty States had a murder rate of 6.6 percent.

In 1981, the death penalty States had a murder rate of 10.7 percent; the nondeath penalty States had a murder rate of 5.6 percent.

In 1982, the death penalty States had a murder rate of 10.3 percent and the nondeath penalty States had a murder rate of 5 percent.

When we put together the average over the last 6 years that are reflected in that chart we see that death penalty States have a murder rate of 10.78 percent whereas States without the death penalty have a murder rate of 5.75 percent.

Now that is about twice as high a murder rate in States that have the death penalty as in States that do not. And we have a chart in the back of this Chamber which graphically illustrates that difference, and for those who will consider voting for this bill because they believe capital punishment acts as a deterrent to homicides I hope they will look at the figures because the figures are persuasive that if anything there is a reverse relationship between capital punishment and the murder rate.

The States that have capital punishment, rather than deterring murders, have about twice as high a murder rate as the States that do not have capital punishment.

Mr. President, the issue again here today is not really whether we are in favor of or opposed to the death penalty. The issue today is whether we are going to stop debate after barely over a day's debate on a broad bill that provides the death penalty under many, many circumstances.

The New York Times in an editorial this morning wrote the following:

A vote to cut off Senate debate on a death bill is scheduled for today. A vote against cloture will be a vote to keep talking—until after a recess and until the Senate can start sifting for sense instead of rushing for blood.

We are going to be voting to stop debate on a bill which, for instance, permits the death penalty to be imposed in circumstances where the defendant has not himself killed or attempted to kill or even intended that a killing take place or that lethal force be employed.

Can we as Members of a historic body which has protected the right to deliberative debate, spending a week on the question of withholding on interest and dividends, spending weeks on the gasoline tax, can we in good conscience as the repositories of tradition of this Senate which has allowed for deliberative debate on critical issues say that there has been adequate debate on a bill which permits the death penalty to be imposed in some circumstances where there has not even been an intent, an attempt to kill or intention to do great bodily harm? Does that rise to the dignity of the description of my friend from Illinois of supporting the death penalty within carefully prescribed limits?

I think not. I think we are entitled to significant debate on this bill before we vote on it. And then we must vote on it, because not only does it contain many specific provisions that are worthy of debate, but it also contains the fundamental choice of whether or not this society is willing to say that the death penalty deters, that the death penalty is in fact, an appropriate response of the State to a violent act by one of its citizens.

The Catholic bishops, in their statement on capital punishment, said the following:

It is morally unsatisfactory and socially destructive for criminals to go unpunished. But the forms and limits of punishment must be determined by moral objectives which go beyond the mere inflicting of injury on the guilty. Thus, we would regard it as barbarous and inhumane for a criminal who had tortured or maimed a victim to be tortured or maimed in return. Such a punishment might satisfy certain vindictive desires that we or the victim might feel, but the satisfaction of such desires is not and cannot be an objective of a humane and Christian approach to punishment.

That is why so many representatives of so many national religious organizations have appealed to us in a letter which each one of us has received, which reads as follows:

DEAR SENATOR: As representatives of national religious organizations we appeal to you to oppose S. 1765, a bill to reinstate the death penalty, which may come before the Senate in the near future. We oppose any legislation which sanctions the use of capital punishment.

We believe in the sanctity of human life. The taking of human life, whether it be an independent criminal act or sanctioned by the state, is inhumane. Our religious convictions lead us to the belief that each individual has worth and dignity.

We recognize that government has the responsibility to protect its citizens. Such responsibilities are necessary and should be carried through in a positive manner that leads to a safe, equitable, and just society. Our work brings us into touch with the deepest dimensions of the lives of both the victims and the perpetrators of violent crimes in our communities. We have witnessed the tragedy brought into the lives of victims of violent crime and also in the lives of those who commit such crimes. We believe that the death penalty fails to achieve the goal of protecting society and in fact perpetuates this cycle of vengeance and violence.

This letter which has been made part of the RECORD is signed officially by representatives of the following national religious organizations:

The National Council of Churches; the National Council of Catholic Charities; the Washington Office of the Episcopal Church; the Washington Office of the Unitarian Universalist Association of Churches; the National Assembly of Women Religious; the Women's Division of the United Methodist Church; Clergy and Laity Concerned; Network; the Washington Office of the Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.); the American Baptist Churches; the Friends Committee on National Legislation; the Synagogue Council of America; the American Jewish Congress; the Union of American Hebrew Congregations Religious Action Center; the U.S. Peace Section of the Mennonite Central Committee; the National Office of Jesuit Social Ministries; the Church and Society of the Lutheran Church in America; the United Church of Christ; the American Jewish Committee; the Washington Ethical Action Office; the Washington Office; the General Assembly Mission Board of the Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.); the General Board of Church and Society of the United Methodist Church; and the General Board of the Church of the Brethren.

When there is that kind of an outpouring representing so many religious organizations in this country, it would seem to me that the least that we can do is debate the merits of this bill and debate the details of this bill for more than a day and a half. I would suggest to my colleagues that is the least we can do. We owe at least that much to the sentiment which is reflected in that letter.

We owe it to ourselves to determine whether or not error occurs in significant numbers in our justice system, significant enough so that we do not want to take the chance of putting people to death who may later prove to be innocent. We owe it to ourselves to debate the questions of deterrence and the questions of morality. We owe it to ourselves and to our traditions in this Senate to debate that for more than a day and a half.

Mr. President, I understand our friend from Maine is here. I ask unanimous consent that I may yield the floor to him at this time without this being considered the end of my first speech under rule XIX.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator from Maine.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I thank my distinguished colleague from Michigan and commend him for his effort in opposition to this legislation, a bill which would authorize Federal juries and judges to impose the death penalty for Federal crimes by establishing criteria designed to meet the requirements of the Supreme Court. Involving as it does the life or death of American citizens, this bill deserves—indeed demands—the most searching inquiry, the most careful consideration, the most thorough debate.

Yet, neither the need for this statute nor the appropriateness of its approach have been properly debated by this Congress. Hearings on a similar measure were held last in 1981, and that marks the most recent examination of this issue.

Additionally, and perhaps more ironically, a cloture motion to cut off debate on this bill was filed virtually within 90 seconds of the bill's being laid down, before a single word of debate had occurred.

I am not, in principle, a supporter of the notion of the filibuster. I do not believe that legitimate and compelling legislative goals can be reached by trying to stall the will of a determined majority by the process of extended debate. Indeed, the filibuster has been used so frequently in past decades precisely to stall—with no hope of preventing—the enactment of essential corrective legislation, that to lend credence to this procedure is distasteful to many Members of this Senate, including this one.

But in an instance where no debate, literally not a single word of opposition or support for a measure has even been heard, for a cloture petition to be filed, as it was in this instance immediately on the bill's being laid down, betrays a willingness to dispense with debate that is not only unbecoming, but should be a matter of shame to a body which has been known as the world's greatest deliberative body.

What is it that the proponents of the cloture motion fear? A full, exhaustive debate—particularly on the question of judicially imposed and legislatively sanctioned death—is nothing more than the proper exercise of the most fundamental responsibility of this legislative body.

This debate, however, is being threatened with a cutoff based only on the utilitarian considerations of whether or not there are enough votes in this Chamber whose owners would like to take Friday off and go home.

That is, in all its essentials, the kind of cloture motion we face now.

The implication is that because there may be a majority in this Senate unwilling to oppose anything that smacks of toughness on crime, this measure can be as readily disposed of as the drug czar bill, provided only that a minimum of lip service is paid to the notion of debate.

So the cloture motion was filed 90 seconds after the bill was laid down. That is, indeed, a minimum of lip service to the idea of full and extended debate of an issue touching the Constitution of the United States, the lives and deaths of Americans.

In the past 2 weeks, we have seen a steamroller at work in the Senate. Carefully drawn rules that protect the rights of all Americans have been modified without regard to our constitutional powers to so modify them, and without regard to the serious effects our votes may well have on the future development and preservation of constitutionally guaranteed liberties.

A concentrated and unfortunately effective effort is being made to present to the Senate each and every slogan in the anticrime lexicon with the implicit threat that a failure to approve each and every one will consign the dissenters to purgatory in the public opinion polls and defeat in the next election.

I often wonder if those who would allow the most recent public opinion polls to shape their view of constitutional requirements and constitutional protections are also willing to accept the verdict of those very same polls, which place the practice of the political profession at about the lowest level of esteem?

The oath of office we take as Senators does not require us to give full allegiance to the latest Gallup poll or the most recent Harris survey. It does, however, require allegiance to the Constitution of the United States.

And when an issue that directly relates to that Constitution and to the protections and requirements that the Supreme Court has adduced from that document is consigned to a cloture vote on the basis of Senate housekeeping needs, when such a constitutionally and morally significant issue is seen as something whose consideration can be traded for a day off, then surely the Senate has finally come to the point where it fully merits the low level of esteem accorded it by the American people.

Yet that is the practical situation that now faces the Senate. We are being asked to dispose of a bill which contains the procedures for invoking the irrevocable penalty of death under the inducement that if enough Senators can bring themselves to ignore the issues, we may have the day off on Friday.

For 2 weeks, we have been warned that a vote against any of the measures that the Judiciary Committee is recommending—without regard to the degree of unanimity in the committee itself—is a vote for violent crime. This nonsense has pervaded the debate on every aspect of every one of these crime bills.

What we have absolutely failed to do is to make it clear to the public that Federal sanctions against Federal crimes have a minimal effect on violent crime. Eighty percent of the violent crimes in this Nation—and they are the crimes about which our people are rightly aroused—fall within the jurisdiction of State and local officials, not the Federal Government.

A murder, a robbery or a mugging on the streets of any city or town in America does not constitute a Federal offense. The criminal will not go into a Federal jail. He will not be processed through the Federal courts. That case, like the overwhelming majority of violent crimes, will be reported locally, investigated locally, arraigned locally, indicted locally, and if conviction occurs the guilty party will be housed in a local jail.

That remains the simple and solid truth of the vast majority of crimes committed in this country. It remains true of the vast majority of violent crimes, in particular. And that is the unspoken background factor of all the anticrime legislation that this Senate or any future Senate will or can consider.

The simple fact is that whatever we do at the national level has virtually no noticeable effect on the violent crimes committed throughout the United States today. Nor can it do so under our system of Government.

Yet the Senate is being steamrollered into accepting a variety of constitutionally questionable and practically confusing remedies to a problem which it is simply not within our power to rectify.

What is not being made clear is that the effect of congressional legislation in the area of crime is limited and circumscribed. We can have little direct effect on the operation of local law enforcement officials. What we do here has no direct impact on the staffing of local prosecutors' offices, or on the resources of local courts. What we do here, judged against the standard of effectiveness, is mere posturing on the question of violent crime. It is not effective, direct action. Virtually no felon or would-be felon in the United States need fear the direct consequences of any of our actions. And that is the simple truth.

As a practical political matter, it is the Members of the Senate who are most at risk in considering these anticrime bills. We are the ones who fear the retribution of the public if our votes can be merchandised as procrime votes. We are hostages in this public relations effort.

So now we have reached the stage, after less than 10 hours of discussion, in which the rules governing the imposition of a Federal death penalty can be treated as cavalierly as the most minor tariff measure we might consider.

We have reached the point where the Senate of the United States is willing to go on the public record for a legislative enactment whose primary justification is perhaps most accurately described in the language of the committee report itself: "It appears from the polls," the committee report solemnly informs us, "and from a flood of recent correspondence that a demand for the death penalty coincides with a greater public awareness of the crime problem."

"A flood of recent correspondence." So what? My office has been flooded by mail on a regular basis. So have the offices of every Senator in this Chamber.

Each and every one of us has received a flood of mail on a number of issues, ranging from withholding of taxes on savings interest to abortion to school prayer to the Panama Canal treaties to the nuclear freeze. I cannot imaging a Senate office which has not, at some time or other, been the recipient of a flood of correspondence.

Are we seriously proposing to change Federal law to authorize the death penalty on the basis of an alleged flood of mail? If that is the case, any Member of the Senate could readily identify the issues on which the most pieces of mail have been received and which we should therefore consider for immediate enactment.

Yet this bill that is before us now—and the cloture petition filed to limit debate on this bill—rests on no basis much more solid than that which we could attribute to a flood of mail.

But we are now trying to debate the question of whether the Panama Canal Treaties will or will not prove advantageous to the United States in the long run. We are not considering an issue that is readily amenable to future corrections of course if the present course seems not to work. We are debating, in reality, an issue that will affect, not only the Federal criminal justice system in capital cases but also the kind of society and the kind of a people we are and want to become.

We are debating the circumstances under which a life may or may not be taken by the premediated judgment of the Federal criminal judicial system. We are considering writing a law which will instruct 12 men and women about the circumstances in which they are rationally required to inflict on a fellow human being the irrevocable sentence of death.

And we are trying to debate that issue without the benefit of a unanimous committee recommendation. Moreover, we are trying to debate this issue in an atmosphere rendered virtually sterile by the filing of a cloture petition seconds after the bill was laid down.

It is self-evident that a hope exists that if the issue before us now can be treated as routinely as possible, with an adequately forewarned vote on the cloture petition to occur at a predetermined time, that no heed will be paid to the substance of the issue. Perhaps its proponents either suspect or know that its provisions and its intent cannot withstand serious scrutiny; so they are hoping to get by with as little serious debate as the barest decencies require.

I have little expectation that either the flimsy basis of this proposal or the dimensions of the entire issue at stake will receive the kind of scrutiny that life-and-death matters should, as a minimal decency, receive. But the inevitability of an evil is no reason to disregard it. There is no personal excuse in not making more of an effort than, for instance, might be devoted to a change in tariff law.

So although the decks are stacked, and although the proponents of this bill will clearly benefit from the combination of apathy and political fear that anticrime legislation generally evokes, it is important that at least more than a perfunctory effort be made to block this rush to judgment and to consider seriously just exactly what it is we think we are doing when we impose a Federal death penalty; what it is we think we are achieving by writing that penalty into our laws; and what we stand to lose as well as to gain from such an exercise.

One thing we will be doing is not explicitly stated. But it is the one essential factor that provides the basis on which this measure is being considered. We will be imputing to humanly created and operated judicial procedures a measure of infallibility that simply does not exist.

The American system of criminal justice is the finest in the world. Our procedures are carefully drawn and their effect is continually monitored by our Federal courts, to insure that the constitutional rights which help guard against a miscarriage of justice are observed by the officers of the courts and are effective in practice as well.

As a former official of our courts, as a prosecuting attorney at the Federal level, as defense attorney, as a Federal judge, I am well aware of the strength and tenacity of the efforts our system expends to prevent miscarriages of justice.

But precisely because I have a close personal knowledge of the workings of the system, of the nature of the process, and of the unpredictable and unexpected events that can derail the most carefully prepared case, I am also acutely aware of the fact that our system will never produce totally infallible justice. It seems to me, indeed, that it is beyond the power of human beings, working in an environment and process designed by and for human beings, to ever aspire to that level of infallibility which would assure us that never, under any conceivable circumstances, would we risk the judicial killing of an innocent person.

This factor seems to me to be as important an aspect of debate over the death penalty as the constitutional and moral issues that will be discussed as well. The fundamental fact is that the existence of a death penalty necessarily carries with it the possibility—and in the variety of human experience over time, I would venture to say the certainty—that an innocent individual will be subjected to that last, irrevocable penalty, death.

The argument is made that because the death penalty is such a fearful one, the likelihood of error or improper imposition is so minor as to be virtually negligible. The committee report on the bill explicitly makes that claim in the following terms:

> The committee finds this argument—

This argument, I emphasize, is the argument that an innocent human being may be executed by mistake—

> The committee finds this argument to be without great weight, particularly in light of the procedural safeguards for criminal defendants mandated by the Supreme Court in recent years. The Court's decisions with respect to the rights of the individuals, particularly those expanding the right to counsel, together with the precautions taken by any court in a capital case, have all but reduced the danger of error in these cases to that of a mere theoretical possibility.

This is, indeed, a sanguine expression of confidence in our judicial system. The Bureau of Justice Statistics reports that for all of calendar year 1982, "about half the 64 persons who left death row by means other than death had both their convictions and their sentences vacated."

Both convictions and sentences means, not that sentences of death were commuted, but that the convictions themselves were found to be invalid. And that occurred in "about half" of 64 cases.

If this is an example of the infallible system of human courts—regardless how much effort is expended to perfect them—then the committee's airy claim that the danger of error has been reduced to that of a mere theoretical possibility is baseless.

The committee report also quotes approvingly the words of the minority report of a Massachusetts Special Commission of 1961:

> We do not feel * * * that the mere possibility of error, which can never be completely ruled out, can be urged as a reason why the right of the State to inflict the death penalty can be questioned in principle * * *. If errors are then made, this is the necessary price that must be paid within a society which is made up of human beings and whose authority is exercised not by angels but by men themselves.

This is indeed a unique view to take, not only of a presumptive State "right" to inflict death, but of the value of individual life to our society—a society and a system of government premised and founded on respect for the individual.

It is worth pointing out that the Constitution of the United States does not grant expressly to government the "right" to take life. It does, on the other hand, expressly deny government the right to inflict certain kinds of punishments.

So, for any minority of any commission to argue—as this Massachusetts commission minority argues in 1961—that some kind of State right to inflict death even exists is to betray a disregard for and incomprehension of our Constitution, which is breathtaking in scope.

And for the Judiciary Committee majority to cite such a perverse and misguided judgment shows only the thinness of the entire defense against the compelling and irrefutable fact that as long as we authorize capital punishment, we authorize the possibility of killing an innocent human being.

The irrevocable nature of the death penalty is precisely one of the reasons that I believe it can never be justified. We, as human beings, with all the fallibility that our human condition implies, do not have it within our moral capacity to authorize the taking of a human life. We may believe that we can, somehow, arrogate to ourselves such a power, but we will simply be condoning a usurpation of moral authority.

We cannot legitimize such a usurpation by any appeal to theories of government or morality. It is simply not given to human beings to make ultimate judgments, and the life and death judgment is nothing if not ultimate.

Constitutional experts disagree on the constitutional grounds for authorizing a death penalty. They disagree as to the kinds of procedural safeguards the Constitution requires. Experts in criminal justice disagree about the effect of the death penalty as a deterrent. The majority of our Nation's religious faiths strongly deny the moral basis for it.

(Mr. DANFORTH assumed the chair.)

Mr. MITCHELL. On this subject, in fact, the only semblance of agreement that even exists goes directly against the recommendation of the committee majority. I speak of the extremely broad-based opposition of all sectors of our religious community, who deny the moral authority for it, who deny the benefit to society from it, who deny any proper justification for the taking of human life except self-defense.

It is adduced, in the committee's report, that "protection of the society" assumes a moral imperative that legitimizes a Government-sanctioned imposition of death.

That is an ironic development in a nation and a society which has, painfully and carefully over the last two centuries, made huge strides in the civilizing task of limiting the Government's rights over individuals. Our society is as it is today, in part, because of our continued history of denying to Government the moral authority to take any steps it may think are needed to protect society. Indeed, our society has found that its protection is most assured when Government's reach is limited.

So to make the claim that the protection of society somehow compels the death penalty is to take an enormous leap beyond the perimeters of what we have allowed our Government to do to protect us. We have in the past and would in the future reject the Government's efforts to protect us by limiting political debate because some ideas are dangerous to society. Yet we are willing to grant to Government the supreme power that it may, through its imperfect human servants, take the life of a human being under certain conditions.

That seems to me to be a power that no government ought to have. It is a power that no government can infallibly apply. And it is a power that no government has the moral authority to claim.

When we consider the practical implications of this claim that the protection of society demands a death penalty, the realities are so completely at odds with the claim that the claim evaporates.

Consider the reality of what is being proposed. In this bill, the death penalty is intended to be applied to particularly nefarious murderers, as well as to nonmurderers, on the basis that by depriving these individuals of life, we will protect society.

There are in this Nation—or were at the end of last year—33,526 convicted murderers. They ranged from people who had encompassed the unintentional death of another through some act of their own to those who coldbloodedly committed murder for hire. There were, however, only 1,163 actually on death row.

Through the fortuitous and circuitous processes of the law, a judgment has been reached by men and women in juries and courtrooms all over America that society demands the death of some 1,100 individuals who committed murder, but not of 32,000 others who also committed murder. These cases were all tried at the State level.

There is no reason to believe that a Federal death statute would show a significantly higher percentage of murderers condemned nationwide than has been the experience at the State level. I find no assumption or intention in the committee report to indicate that there is an intention to sentence more Federal prisoners to death row. To the contrary, the report carries clear language indicating the committee's desire that the penalty be applied only in the most extreme cases. So the actual outcome can be reasonably expected to somewhat parallel the outcome of State murder convictions and sentences.

Yet, if that is the case, then the committee says society will be safer to some noticeable degree if about 3 percent of federally indicted murderers are executed.

What kind of rational thought process can lead to such a conclusion? The demonstrated fact in literally thousands of State murder convictions is that the death penalty is applied in a random manner.

A very recent University of Iowa Law School study of the predictability of death sentences under the new, approved death penalty statutes reveals that virtually nothing has changed since the 1972 Furman against Georgia decision. In that case, the Supreme Court ruled that precisely because the penalty was applied randomly, it was a prohibited penalty under the eighth amendment.

The Court has not yet been persuaded that the outcome of the new, improved State statutes will mirror the experience of the pre-1972 situation. But the statistical evidence is mounting, and ultimately, I believe, will be compelling.

But in the meantime, we have a system in the States in which a death sentence is exactly like a lottery ticket: Some convicted murderers draw death. Some draw life imprisonment. Some draw other lesser penalties. There is virtually no factor in the outcome that is more predictable than the use of a simple lottery drawing.

Yet in the face of this reality, the committee is asking us to believe that society will either be safer or feel itself safer if the Government can inflict the death penalty more or less at random, provided the pool of potential victims are all convicted murderers.

The committee holds, apparently, to the facile belief that it is possible, by weighing aggravating and mitigating circumstances in the minds of a jury, to develop and implement a system of sentencing which will have that degree of predictability, proportionality, and moral authority which is prerequisite to any form of punishment.

In this belief, the committee is ignoring the obvious reality that the imposition of the death penalty can never, in the real world, be a rational decision.

Indeed, by inviting the jury to consider the heinous nature of the crime in addition to mitigating or aggravating circumstances, the committee bill practically guarantees that whatever the basis for a death sentence, rationality will be given little or no play.

It is such an obvious logical contradiction that it should be apparent on the face of it to every Member of the Senate. We cannot assure a consistent, fairly based, rational kind of death sentencing by creating a procedure in which the nonrational aspects of human emotions are expressly given a guiding part. It is no defense to claim that to uphold a decision involving the death penalty, an appellate court must find that no passion entered into the decision. How can you invite jurors to consider the heinous nature of the crime without at the same time evoking their passions? And to ask appellate judges to find, on the basis of reading a trial transcript, that no passion entered the decision is to ask of them a degree of wisdom that no human being actually possesses.

Yet the fundamental premise that society will be protected by the self-evidently nonrational—and therefore random—infliction of the death penalty on a small number of convicted murderers is enshrined as a central justification of this bill.

It is necessary to recall that we are a nation of laws, not men, precisely because we desire protection against irrationality.

We have judged that laws, although executed by fallible human beings, can lay a claim to being free of the passions and prejudices which fill even the sanest of human minds.

And we have rejected the idea of a government of men, not because there are not good and honest and conscientious men in this land and throughout the world, but because our Founders knew, and most of us acknowledge, that regardless of how moral a man may be, nothing can ever assure consistency of justice better than laws that even the most moral of men must obey.

Yet in this bill we are being asked to make one of the most fundamental of judgments—the sentence of death—contingent on the reactions of men and women contemplating whether a murder was especially "heinous, cruel, or depraved." It is hard to conceive of a set of instructions more calculated to create, not reduce, passion, and irrationality in the process.

And yet, judgments arrived at through this fundamentally antirational proceeding are presented as a desirable protection for society. I can only recall the words of Justice Brandeis: "The greatest dangers to liberty lurk in insidious encroachment by men of zeal, well-meaning but without understanding."

There is no credible or sensible basis on which society can benefit by a process that will result in the random and relatively rare imposition of death by Federal judges or juries.

I recognize that society's needs encompass a system of justice in which crime is predictably and certainly punished. I do not discount the public opinion polls that reflect an increased demand for a return to the death penalty. But I also do not believe that a simple yes-or-no answer to a public opinion pollster represents the full sum of public opinion on an issue in which a range of factors is involved.

I believe the polls do reflect a demand for more efficient, more predictable, and more rational justice. I believe the public opinion polls reflect impatience with dilatory court proceedings and sensationalized accounts of criminals going free. It would be surprising if the public showed no impatience in these circumstances.

But the public opinion polls do not ask if the public wants to see two executions every week to empty the current death rows. The polls do not ask if all murderers ought to be sentenced to death. The public opinion polls provide a readily recognizable symbolic question to which the public gives a ready answer.

I make that judgment about the underlying issues involved in the public opinion polls largely on the basis of historical fact. In the State of Maine in the last century, we abolished the death penalty for a time and then reintroduced it. And the public reaction was revealing.

Initially, when the penalty was in effect, the Governor was required to determine when sentence of hanging would be carried out. And the chief executives of Maine—like many other chief executives—tended to delay setting such executions for all the humane and political considerations that we can readily imagine. When, after a period of about two decades, no executions had occurred, even though individuals sat on death row, the State legislature abolished capital punishment.

Although the rate of violent murder actually declined during that period, the penalty was reinstated and remained again in force for 4 years. During that time, the execution of murderers and the reports of those executions so outraged public opinion that the penalty was abolished, for what I hope will be forever, in 1887. It may be of interest to note that the last execution in Maine was of a man who many subsequently came to believe was, in fact, innocent.

But that shift in public opinion in Maine in the last century, in my view, demonstrates a truth about public opinion that remains unchanged today. Americans are repelled and horrified by random violence. They are repelled and react strongly to random, senseless brutality committed by private individuals. But they are no less repelled and outraged when the perpetrator of random violence is the Government itself.

I believe that human nature and the emotions and feelings that go into it have not changed since the last century. Americans are still repelled and outraged by random violence.

And it is crystal clear that in the manner by which some murders are tried as capital crimes and others on lesser charges, in the manner in which some are chosen for death row and others are not, that the judicially sanctioned violence of executions is no less random and purposeless in its effects than the senseless murders which have from time to time terrorized our communities.

That factor of randomness may not be well understood by the public today. But if the Government were ever again to become an author of frequent and repeated acts of judicial violence in the execution of death sentences, I am confident that public revulsion would turn as readily against Government as it now does against violent criminals.

The public opinion polls, therefore, are not something I disregard as meaningless. But they are a reflection of current public opinion—a snapshot in time—which we can only sensibly view in the light of our own best judgment and experience.

I believe that the public demand for predictable and certain criminal justice is one that will not be denied. Nor do I believe that this measure before us will satisfy it in the least.

The American people are not demanding that their Government execute all murderers or even most murderers or even a small proportion of murderers. They are demanding that their communities be protected against all kinds of random violence. They are demanding that the officials of law enforcement focus attention precisely on those crimes by which the vast majority of victims are made to suffer. The imposition of the death penalty for a small number of federally convicted murderers—and others—does nothing to respond to that demand.

The other goal of this legislation, the so-called deterrent effect, has never been proven or demonstrated. Neither the States in our Nation which have abolished the penalty, nor the majority of Western nations, in which the penalty no longer exists, suffer higher rates of murder than the States of this Nation which permit the penalty.

The U.S. homicides rate today is running at about 9.7 per 100,000 people, the highest in our history. Since 1977, we have again begun executing convicted murderers. In the United Kingdom, which has very recently rejected an appeal to return to the rope, the murder rate is 1.1 per 100,000 people. In the United Kingdom which has no executions, in Japan, which has a murder rate as low as the British and which does permit executions, studies have been made of the deterrent effect on murderers or would-be murderers of a death penalty and those studies have replicated the findings of similar American studies. No correlation exists. Neither the proponents of a death penalty nor the proponents of its abolition can cite any conclusive figures to buttress their cases.

The State of South Dakota in 1939 adopted and implemented a death penalty. In the following decade, homicide rates plunged 20 percent. But in the neighboring State of North Dakota, during the same 10-year period, no death penalty was in effect, no executions were carried out, and the North Dakota homicide rate plunged 40 percent.

Studies have compared neighboring States with and without the death penalty, and studies have consistently and repeatedly shown that absolutely no conclusive deterrent or antideterrent effect can be rationally deduced from these figures. What we are left with are the anecdotal impressions of prosecutors, police, and judges.

Those anecdotal illustrations may be vivid and illuminating. But they are not a basis for legislation.

Even the committee report on this bill acknowledges that:

> In short, the available data on this question is at best inconclusive. But rather than seeking to provide such data, or of refraining from action, the Committee majority goes on to cite a Justice Department statement to the effect that "while sociological studies have reached differing conclusions, common sense tells us that the death penalty does operate as an effective deterrent."

Whose commonsense? All this statement does is to demonstrate anew that there is nothing so uncommon as commonsense.

The committee majority's deference to commonsense did not reach the point of actually examining what has happened in this country in the past, an action that would have demonstrated the most elementary kind of commonsense.

Such an examination is not difficult to conduct, even on a cursory basis.

The homicide rate of 9.8 per 100,000 that we suffer today is not unprecedented. In the 1930's the Nation's homicide rate was comparable. In 1933 it reached 9.7 per 100,000, not appreciably less than today. And in the 1930's, State sanctioned executions were a fact of life so common, so widespread, and so frequent that they barely rated a paragraph in out-of-town newspapers.

In 1935 and 1936, the number of executions fell barely short of 200 persons. That represents just about four a week. And there was never a year, from 1930 to 1945 and beyond, that the rate of executions averaged less than two per week, week in, week out, year in, year out.

But did all that killing actually halve the homicide rate? It did not. The homicide rate did not fall to 4.7 until 1960, 15 years after the end of the war, in a period where executions had fallen by half, and during a period when widespread public revulsion against the death penalty was at a height. By 1966, barely 42 percent of the American people favored the death penalty.

I am not attempting to make the case for antideterrence. As I have said, I do not believe that either a case for deterrence or nondeterrence can legitimately be inferred from the data we have.

But when we are considering deterrence, we have to remember that even at the height of the 1930's execution orgy, death was prescribed for barely 1 of every 50 murderers.

Taking the current committee report at face value, I can safely assume that there is no intention on the part of the committee majority to double or triple the actual number of executions in this Nation overnight.

So we face a situation in which the deterrent factor—to any would-be felon careful enough to calculate it—has fallen from a 1-in-50 chance of being executed to a 1-in-250 chance of being executed. And that is a situation the committee explicitly claims it does not intend to alter by a substantial degree. Yet somehow, the clearly minor additional deterrent impact is nonetheless said to outweigh all of the other compelling reasons not to reintroduce judicially sanctioned executions by the Federal Government.

On whose scales?

If this deterrence argument is going to be given serious consideration, it is important to recognize the magnitude of numbers which this bill can reach.

In fiscal year 1980, exactly 77 Federal homicide convictions were returned. In that year, 708 federally convicted murderers were in custody. Their average sentence, according to the Sourcebook of Criminal Justice Statistics, was somewhat less than 10 years.

No one has presented any evidence to suggest that huge increased numbers of Federal homicides are likely to be apprehended and tried in the immediate future. Nor has anyone suggested that the rate or severity of murder within Federal jurisdiction is likely to skyrocket.

So we are dealing with a number of individuals whose magnitude—in a nation of 220 million—can only be called infinitesimal. Yet the deterrent effect of this bill on this potential criminal population is alleged to be so valuable that no other consideration should be weighed in the balance.

I am forced to conclude either that the logic of the committee is completely woolly or that an effort is being made to mislead the Senate.

If the report on the bill means what it says, that only in rare instances is the actual imposition of death contemplated, then the report cannot equally mean that this truly minor additional deterrent will have any effect whatsoever on homicide rates.

Any deterrent effect, after all, is predicated on a theory that a would-be murderer calculates what his chances are of being executed for his crime. While I question the soundness of this insight into the criminal mind, taking it at face value, I am still left with the conlcusion that the committee believes that an increase in the likelihood of execution of a degree so slight as to be statistically imperceptible, will, nonetheless, have a deterrent effect sufficient to outweigh its other costs.

This is a denial of commonsense so bald and so outrageous as to be beyond belief.

The only alternative deterrent effect I can imagine is the hope—and it is merely a hope—that by demonstrating a willingness to reimpose a Federal death penalty, somehow or other we will show potential State-level murderers and malefactors that their misdeeds will remain unconsummated.

That would be a peculiar basis, to say the very least, on which to legislate.

The only other possible conclusion—given the actual dimensions of the Federal homicide problem—is that we are engaged in politically motivated posturing whose main purpose is not to have any practical effect on the real world but is meant to reinforce an image of toughness on crime.

I do not believe that, either, is any basis on which to debate the conditions under which the Government should sanction the taking of human life. The case has simply not been made. And I would submit that on the basis of the actual homicide rate which falls within Federal jurisdiction, the case is virtually impossible to make.

Neither logic, nor reason, nor even that much-vaunted commonsense can persuade me that the possible future fate of a percentage of a total Federal homicide prisoner population of less than 1,000 can or will ever create a deterrent, an incentive, or anything except a statistical aberration.

So this measure before us has no basis in necessity. It has no basis in reason. And it most emphatically can never have a basis in morality.

The case for deterrence has not been made. The argument for protecting society is baseless. And the moral appeal, when it rises above the level of demagoguery, is specious.

On all these grounds, disregarding the Constitutional shortcomings in this bill itself, I believe deeply that this Senate ought not to reinstate the Federal death penalty, and I hope a majority of the Senate will agree.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan has the floor.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I yield the floor to the Senator from Massachusetts.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, it is sad to see the Congress of the United States being urged to return to lynch mob justice and the dark ages of law enforcement by reinstating the death penalty for Federal crimes.

There is not a single shred of credible evidence that capital punishment deters capital crime or any other crime. It is a travesty of responsible law enforcement; it is a vindictive, irrational and unfair response to the serious problem of crime in a free society. I believe that the death penalty has no place in the Federal Criminal Code, and I urge the Senate to defeat this reactionary step on crime.

I believe that capital punishment is wrong as a matter of principle, and wrong as a matter of practical public policy. It will only divert Congress and the public from realistic action on the urgently needed measures which offer the only meaningful hope of reducing crime.

There are at least seven fundmental objections to the death penalty.

First, and most important, the death penalty is inherently unfair, because it is applied in a way that makes it the ultimate discrimination against minorities and the poor. Capital punishment is a mockery of the noble concept of equal justice under law. So far, the Supreme Court has not seen fit to rule that such discriminatory application of the death penalty renders it unconstitutional. Again and again, however, leading studies have documented the fact that the death penalty is infected with a racial bias that cannot be explained by statistical chance or on any other valid basis. The Supreme Court may not yet have found this evidence persuasive as a matter of constitutional law—but it is more than persuasive enough for Congress to decline to act as a matter of public policy.

Second, capital punishment places incredible strains on our criminal justice system. It is a deeply divisive penalty that drains emotions and resources out of all proportion to any impact it can possibly have on the problem of violent crime in the United States.

Third, capital punishment all too easily becomes a transparent excuse for inaction on other steps to combat crime. Since it is targeted to less than 1 percent of violent crimes, it cannot seriously be argued that capital punishment is an important factor in the reduction of crime in America. Rather it is a substitute—an ineffective, impractical, simplistic substitute—for the specific, modest, concrete measures that can and should be taken to lower the crime rate.

Fourth, if the goal of the death penalty is deterrence, the evidence linking capital punishment to reduction in crime is notoriously lacking. Even the Department of Justice, in its testimony to the Senate Judiciary Committee, has admitted that there is no clear evidence that the death penalty has any deterrent effect. The valid goals of punishment in our criminal justice system can be achieved as part of the sentencing guidelines approved by the Senate last week, which permit life imprisonment for the most violent crimes, such as those addressed in the death penalty bill.

Fifth, the death penalty is a bankrupt policy because it leaves no room for mistakes, which are inevitable in the criminal justice system. The risk of executing innocent persons is simply not worth taking, because the death penalty is not the only punishment available for violent crimes.

The stability of our society does not depend on the death penalty. It is an extreme remedy in cases where clear alternatives are readily available. The argument that it is essential fails utterly. In my view, it is better to imprison 100 murderes for life than to take the risk that one innocent citizen will be put to death.

Sixth, the role of Government in the act of execution is an act so debasing that it corrupts the Government itself and breeds disrespect for law. The only major industrialized nations that use the death penalty other than in times of national crisis are the Soviet Union, South Africa, and the United States. America must never adopt a policy rejected by all major industrialized nations except the two whose denials of human rights are the most extreme.

Seventh, the bill now before the Senate also raises substantial doubts about its constitutionality. For example, it is by no means clear that the death penalty may constitutionally be imposed for crimes that do not result in death. The lack of a requirement for a unanimous jury on findings of aggravating factors justifying the death penalty is also constitutionally suspect. For these two defects alone, this measure should be rejected. If it ever sees the light of day as law, it will inevitably take years before the Supreme Court rules on these provisions.

Finally, we should reject capital punishment because it is simply too divisive to be part of a comprehensive response to crime in America. As Senators who worked on the bipartisan crime package know, the only hope for adoption and implementation of anticrime proposals is to develop a consensus on effective measures. If enacted, the bipartisan package which the Senate adopted last week will have a real impact on reducing crime in America. That package contains anticrime reforms which can make a substantial difference in our continuing war against crime. The overhaul of our criminal sentencing system and the bail reform contained in the bipartisan package are essential changes which are long overdue. Other law enforcement improvements in the package in the areas of drug trafficking, criminal forfeiture, and prosecution of violent juveniles are critical tools for the reduction of crime in America. The bipartisan crime package also contains needed Federal assistance for State and local prosecutors who are our front line against crime.

If the Senate is serious about reducing crime, we should be urging the House of Representatives to enact the criminal law reforms which the Senate passed last week, instead of giving Members of Congress an excuse to ignore essential criminal law reforms. I intend to vote against cloture and to vote against the bill. It is an evil, hollow symbol, and I urge the Senate to reject it.

Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Michigan for yielding time. I commend him for his efforts in bringing this matter not only to the Members of the U.S. Senate but also to the American people. I think he has performed a very important service.

Mr. GRASSLEY addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. GRASSLEY. I yield.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that of the 10 minutes remaining, 6 minutes be under the control of the Senator from Iowa and 4 minutes under the control of the Senator from Michigan.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator from Iowa.

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, the question of capital punishment is one which I have agonized over for many years. As a State legislator in Iowa in 1963 and 1965 I voted to abolish the death penalty under Iowa law. Today, however, I am a cosponsor of S. 1765 and favor the establishment of constitutional procedures for the imposition of the sentence of death. My decision to support S. 1765 and capital punishment is reached reluctantly.

Current Federal law is a sham. We have a death penalty in many of our statutes but have no constitutional means by which the Federal Government can carry out the sentence. Federal law in this area as well as the others we have attempted to improve this week, makes no sense.

As the distinguished chairman of the Judiciary Committee pointed out this morning, we have a death penalty and constitutional procedures for one crime only—airline hijacking. That is because the airline hijacking bill was passed after the Supreme Court's Furman decision and contained the necessary procedures within the bill itself. Now airline hijacking is a serious crime, but should it be the most serious crime under Federal law? Is an airline hijacking and killing of one person more serious than the mass murder of prison guards at the Federal prison in Marion, Ill.—when the guards are killed, as Senator DIXON pointed out, "for sport"? Is an airline hijacking more serious than the grizzley mass murders described by Chairman THURMOND this morning?

Mr. President, a few days ago I received a letter from a constituent in Iowa, and that letter enclosed a newspaper clipping that was in the Cedar Rapids Gazette that I wish to enclose in the RECORD. That letter expressed my constituent's amazement about the story. The story was about a man convicted of murder under California law. That man killed his professor at Stanford University in California. Theodore Streleski, and I quote from the article, "walked into the campus office of Professor Karel de Leeuw, who had his back to the door, and slammed a two-pound hammer into his head three times." What was behind the killing? The professor had, 8 years earlier joked about Streleski's wearing wing-tipped shoes in class.

That convicted muderer is about to be released after only 5½ years from Soledad Prison, and he says he may kill again. Let me quote you some of his words:

> I can't reassure you I won't kill Reagan . . . You kill one time to make a point. You don't make twice the point by killing twice. It's an 85 percent 15 percent thing. You get most of the effect on the first shot.

Mr. President, it is almost surreal that as a condition of his parole, he is barred from the campus of Stanford University.

So, Mr. President, while this has been a difficult decision and one over which right minded persons differ, my conscience tells me that support for S. 1765 is the right decision.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article from the Cedar Rapids Gazette of January 28, 1984.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Cedar Rapids Gazette, Jan. 28, 1984]

KILLER DUE FOR PAROLE UNSURE ABOUT REPEAT

SAN FRANCISCO.—State officials say Theodore Streleski's impending parole from prison for murdering a math professor is "automatic," even though he refuses to promise he won't return to the Stanford University campus and kill again.

"No matter what he says or feels, there's no way the prison system can keep him in," says Phil Guthrie, spokesman for the state Corrections Department in Sacramento. "Once he has served that time, he gets out and automatically becomes a parolee."

Streleski's hammer murder in 1978 of a Stanford professor, partly because the teacher had laughed at his wing-tipped shoes, caused considerable outrage. Now, he is renewing the furor with a series of interviews in which he says he is "noncommittal on whether I will go back to Stanford and kill again."

You can hypothesize any number of situations in which any human being could kill another," Streleski, 47, told the San Jose Mercury News while in Soledad Prison, "I can't reassure you I won't kill Reagan. . . .

"You kill one time to make a point. You don't make twice the point by killing twice. It's an 85 percent-15 percent thing. You get most of the effect on the first shot."

Streleski, who had tried for 19 years to get his doctorate at Stanford, walked into the campus office of Professor Karel deLeeuw, who had his back to the door, and slammed a two-pound hammer into his head three times.

Streleski said he planned for eight years to kill deLeeuw as a "statement" against the way Stanford treats its graduate students and, in part, because he felt slighted because of a joke the professor had made years earlier about his wing-tip shoes.

After 5½ years in prison for second-degree murder, he is due to be released in March to San Francisco. But District Attorney Arlo Smith said Friday, he will ask the state Board of Prison Terms to release Streleski somewhere else because Stanford is only 40 miles south of San Francisco. He will be barred from the campus as a condition of his parole.

Mr. GRASSLEY. I yield the remainder of my time to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. DENTON. I thank my gracious friend from Iowa.

Mr. President, I rise today in strong support of S. 1765, a bill to establish constitutional procedures for the imposition of the sentence of death for certain Federal offenses.

Not since the Supreme Court's decision in Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972), striking down Federal and State death penalty statutes that allowed for unguided discretion by the trier of fact to determine whether or not the death penalty should be imposed, have American citizens had the protection that capital punishment can provide. S. 1765 provides for the return of that protection by incorporation constitutionally acceptable procedures that guard against the unfettered discretion condemned in Furman.

Following the 1976 rulings by the Supreme Court in a group of landmark death penalty cases: Gregg v. Georgia, 428 U.S. 153 (1976); Proffitt v. Florida, 428 U.S. 242 (1976); Jurek v. Texas, 428 U.S. 262 (1976); Woodson v. North Carolina, 428 U.S. 280 (1976); and Roberts v. Louisiana, 428 U.S. 325 (1976)), the bill provides for a bifurcated trial. That is, first the trier of fact would determine guilt or innocence. Then, after the defendant is convicted of an offense for which the penalty of death is authorized, the court would hold a separate hearing to determine whether or not the death penalty should be imposed. At that hearing, which would normally be before the same jury that conducted the trial, or before the judge if both parties agree, both sides would have an opportunity to present all revelant information. That procedure would require the factfinder to determine the existence of statutory aggravating and mitigating circumstances as a basis for proceeding to the ultimate determination of the penalty to be imposed.

Putting the death penalty back into the Federal criminal justice system is a step that, in my view, is long overdue. For far too long, the pendulum of justice has swung in the wrong direction, and too much attention has been paid to the rights of convicted criminals. The excess of attention that has been given to the rights of criminals has been produced by sacrificing the greater right of society to live free from the fear of violent harm, and the rights of the victims against whom convicted criminals have committed their heinous crimes.

Governments, particularly governments of law and not of men, have no higher duty than to protect the governed from harm. The Founding Fathers themselves recognized that principle and gave it the primacy it deserves by setting forth, in the Preamble to our Constitution the mandate to "establish justice" and to "provide for the common defense." The death penalty implements the principle by providing not only a deterrent to individuals, but also by providing a social and general deterrence to crime by showing the seriousness with which the society views extreme cases of unlawful conduct. As a result, the population as a whole is made aware of the horror of the most serious crimes, and the members of society acquire the desire to avoid such criminal behavior.

Capital punishment also has an incapacitating effect. The death penalty prevents continued commission of truly serious crimes by incorrigibly antisocial criminals who whould otherwise remain potentially dangerous to society for the rest of their natural lives. Mere imprisonment only offers those individuals the possibility of escape or, in some cases, release on parole. Life imprisonment without parole only increases the dangers to guards and other prisoners who come into contact with the most dangerous offenders.

Finally, capital punishment serves the legitimate function of retribution. It allows society to extract legitimate retribution from people whose behavior so transcends the bounds of acceptable conduct that they take the lives of their fellow citizens. Additionally, it allows society to express its outrage and sense of revulsion toward those who undermine the foundations of our society through contravention of its law. Not only must innocent life be protected by any society, but that society must be willing to impose its severest penalty upon those who take the lives of others.

Claims from other quarters that support for abolishment of the death penalty is growing are just not true. In fact, support for capital punishment is widespread. The American Bar Association/University of Chicago poll found that over 73 percent of the citizens polled were in favor of capital punishment. An ABA poll found 69 percent of lawyers and law students in favor of death sentences. A March 1981 Gallup poll, taken before the attempt on President Reagan's life, revealed that public support for imposing the death penalty for the crime of murder had reached its highest point in 28 years. The poll indicated that 66 percent—two out of every three—Americans favored the death penalty for persons convicted of capital crimes.

Mr. President, in conclusion, I reiterate that the primary responsibility of society is to protect its members so that they may live their lives in peace and safety. In providing that protection, society must do what is necessary to deter those who may break the laws, and it must appropriately punish those who do break the laws.

Accordingly, I will vote in favor of S. 1765. I urge my colleagues to join with me to approve the bill as a positive step to protect our society.

Also, I urge my colleagues to vote for cloture.

I thank you, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GRASSLEY). The Senator from Missouri is recognized.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, I thank the Chair.

The fundamental argument in favor of the death penalty is based on a presumption which on the face of it sounds reasonable. The presumption is that by administering the death penalty we will prevent crime, that the death penalty serves as a deterrent and if we have the death penalty it will reduce the crime rate.

The problem is that the presumption, while it sounds reasonable, is not in fact accurate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. I say to the Senator from Missouri that the time allotted to the majority has ended.

The Senator from Michigan has 12 minutes remaining.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I am happy to yield 3 minutes additionally to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. DANFORTH. I thank the Senator from Michigan.

There has been no study ever in the long history of studying the death penalty which has ever shown that there is a significant difference in the crime rate or the homicide rate between jurisdictions which have the death penalty and those which do not have the death penalty.

So, from the standpoint of conventional crimes generally covered by the death penalty, there has never been a study showing that there is a difference.

The problem before us today, Mr. President, is that most of the crimes that are covered by this particular Federal imposition of the death penalty are not conventional crimes; rather, they are crimes of terrorism, assassination, murder of foreign officials, air piracy, and destruction of trains.

These are acts of terrorists. And everyone who remembers the news accounts of the terrorists at the Marine compound in Beirut driving his truck into the compound with a smile on his face understands that those who commit violent acts of terrorism are not necessarily deterred by the possibility of death. In fact, the possibility of death might encourage them.

In 1978, the Governmental Affairs Committee held a hearing on the death penalty and on terrorism in general, and a witness before that committee, Prof. Louis Renee Barris said as follows, relating to psychotics committing acts of terrorism:

> Where such motive is present among terrorists who are suicidal schizophrenics, the problems of effective counter terrorist actions are greatly exacerbated. This is the case because such terrorists whose incentive is to use violence, nihilistically rather than politically, are apt to regard the threat of death as a stimulus rather than a deterrent.

And Professor Barris than went on to say:

> As we have just seen, the viability of deterrent threats against terrorist actors may be undermined when these actors are impelled by psychotic motives. It must now be pointed out that the ability to deter violent behavior by terrorists is in doubt, with all categories of terrorists, including those whose actions spring from pure political concerns.

In other words, it is possible we are not deterring violent acts by imposing the death penalty. We are encouraging it. This might be an incentive to crime rather than a deterrent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time has expired.

The Senator from Michigan.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, the issue before us is not whether we reimpose the death penalty but whether we do credit to this issue or this institution by stopping the debate on the death penalty after about 1 day of debate.

We have put evidence in this record that the death penalty does not deter.

The landmark study on this question is a study of Thorsten Sellin on capital punishment. His conclusion is that there is no evidence that abolition of the death penalty causes an increase in criminal homicides or that reintroduction is followed by a decline.

Let this debate continue a little longer. Let us go into the statistics on deterrence and then let us vote. But for heavens sake, do not cut off debate, in an institution with a tradition of deliberation, with only 24-hour debate on a subject as grave and as critical and as important as whether or not we institute the death penalty. Again, I want to emphasize that this bill is broad. Under this bill, the death penalty could under some circumstances be imposed even in the absence of an intent to take life.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I rise in opposition to S. 1765, a bill which establishes constitutional procedures for the imposition of capital punishment. This has been a difficult week, Mr. President, not so much for the criminals of America, but for our most precious natural resource, the Constitution of the United States and all it stands for. In ignorance, disregard, or defiance of the authority of the Supreme Court to interpret that document we have passed bills which violate in varying degrees our proper role as the legislative branch. In our haste to demonstrate to the American people that the U.S. Senate means to do something about crime, today, we will be setting precedents we will deeply regret in the future. I dearly hope, Mr. President, that the Senate today will summon its courage and wisdom and say, "Enough."

In a body of Senators sworn to uphold the Constitution of the United States, it should not have to be argued that questions of constitutionality should be decided in the courts. A majority of the Supreme Court has ruled that capital punishment in certain carefully prescribed circumstances is not cruel and unusual punishment and, therefore, is not prohibited by the eighth amendment. In my view, Mr. President, the only situation in which I could support establishing a death penalty is the narrow circumstances of the murder of a law enforcement officer; those special individuals who we have singled out to protect us deserve that protection. However, recognizing that "the penalty of death is qualitatively different from a sentence of imprisonment, however long," the Supreme Court insists:

> That a State * * * has a Constitutional responsibility to tailor and apply this law in a manner that avoids the arbitrary and capricious' infliction of the death penalty. (Woodson v. North.)

No less of an obligation rests on the Federal Government. This bill carelessly ignores many of the guidelines the Court has established to prevent "arbitrary and capricious" executions on the State level.

In Godfrey against George, the Supreme Court wrote:

> In Furman v. Georgia, the Court held that the penalty of death may not be imposed under sentencing procedures that create a substantial risk that the punishment will be afflicted in an arbitrary and capricious manner. Gregg v. Georgia reaffirmed this holding: "Where discretion is afforded a sentencing body on a matter so grave as the determination of whether a human life should be taken or spared, that discretion must be suitably directed and limited so as to minimize the risk of wholly arbitrary and capricious action." A capital punishment scheme must (the Court writes) provide a "meaningful basis for distinguishing the few cases in which (the penalty) is imposed from the many cases in which it is not."

S. 1765 provides that after a conviction for an offense for which a penalty of death is authorized, the court will hold a separate hearing on whether to impose the death penalty. At this hearing the jury or judge would make a determination as to the existence of statutory aggravating and mitigating factors as a basis for proceeding to an ultimate determination for capital punishment. The four mitigating factors are enumerated in the bill.

The aggravating factors vary depending on the particular crime being prosecuted. These factors are also enumerated in the bill.

The procedures included in this legislation for considering and weighing both mitigating and aggravating factors may on the surface sound as if S. 1765 "minimizes the risk of wholly arbitrary and capricious action." However, a closer reading of this bill reveals that it does not. S. 1765 states that:

> The jury, or if there is no jury, the court, may consider whether other aggravating factors exist.

The committee report says:

> That, while the death penalty should not be available unless at least one statutory aggravating factor is found to exist, the jury or judge should be able to consider nonstatutory aggravating factors, as well as statutory and nonstatutory mitigating factors.

In fact, the report goes on to say:

The phrase "required to be considered under section 3592" is intended to make it clear that the special findings relate only to the statutory factors required to be considered and not to nonstatutory factors permitted to be weighed in the ulitmate decision whether, on the record as a whole, the death penalty is justified.

Mr. President, where is the safeguard against arbitrary and capricious action if nonstatutory factors may be considered in each individual case? Who is to determine what, in each instance, may be a legitimate aggravating factor? How are we to know what nonstatutory aggravating factors are considered when S. 1765 only requires a jury to return special findings on the statutory aggravating circumstances.

S. 1765 also states that:

> It is unnecessary that there be a unanimous vote on any specific mitigating or aggravating factor if a majority of the jury finds the existence of such a specific factor.

Mr. President, this is in direct violation of the Supreme Court ruling in Andres against United States which states:

> In criminal cases (the) requirement of unanimity extends to all issues—character or degree of the crime, guilt, and punishment—which are left to the jury.

And what of the provisions included in this bill, Mr. President, permitting the imposition of capital punishment for crimes in which no death occurred? As my distinguished colleagues—Senators KENNEDY, METZENBAUM, and

LEAHY—have pointed out in their minority views to this legislation:

Although treason and espionage have historically been regarded as offenses for which the death penalty may be imposed, the Supreme Court decision in Coker v. Georgia creates serious doubt as to the constitutionality of the provisions of this bill permitting the imposition of the death penalty for crimes where death does not result. The Court in Coker held that the death penalty could not be imposed for a rape in which death did not result. The rationale of that case is equally applicable to treason, espionage, and attempted assassinations of the President—all crimes where death does not result.

Mr. President, this legislation raises other constitutional questions about the bases for appeal and to whom an appeal is made. There is no requirement that the independent courts of appeal review the cases presented before them to determine whether the imposition of the death penalty is in proportion to other sentences in similar circumstances. Again, I quote my distinguished colleagues in their minority views:

Under the Supreme Court decision in Coker v. Georgia, 433 U.S. 584 (1977), an appellate court must look at the death penalty sentence to determine whether it is out of proportion to the severity of the crime * * *. (W)e are concerned that this bill does not require a determination "that the sentence of death is not excessive, considering both the crime and the defendant" in order to affirm a death sentence on appeal.

The constitutional question raised in this legislation should be enough to make us pause and reflect on the dangerous flaws we may be about to enact into law and include in the legislative history of this matter. The statistics, which reveal that the institution of a death penalty will not deter violent crime in the future, should lead us to honestly question what this bill is all about.

Mr. President, the fact that the Supreme Court has ruled that capital punishment is permissible does not settle the question of whether we, as representatives of the American people, should enact this final and irrevocable punishment. That is a question of studying objective facts about our criminal justice system and searching our conscience as a nation to determine if such a policy is justified.

Any one who has listened to this debate over the last several days has been confronted by the Senator from Michigan and others with the reality of the fallibility of our criminal justice system. Mistakes have been made, are being made, and will continue to be made in the process of convicting citizens of capital crimes. I believe the case has clearly been made that such mistakes are not isolated incidences but a systemic reality. Police, prosecutors, witnesses, juries, and judges are human beings and will err. Out of this recognition grows the presumption of innocence, the right of appeal, and all of the due process protections which elevate our criminal justice system above any on this planet. But that we would entrust the power to end a human life with such a system is the supreme act of human arrogance.

Distinguished British jurist Sir William Blackstone stated:

It is better that the guilty persons escape than one innocent suffer.

What ratio of innocents executed to murderers freed should we as a nation deem morally acceptable: 1:10? 1:100? 1:1,000? How can we preach the sanctity of life and state that even a single innocent life taken is worth whatever "benefit" society derives for executions?

Finally, Mr. President, capital punishment is not the hallmark of a civilied nation. Government, in the American tradition, has taken on the role of teacher and example to our people. What lesson do we convey by sanctioning Government execution? Our polite, legalistic reasons not withstanding, capital punishment is based on the desire for revenge: One group settling its grievance by harming another. Have we not risen above that ancient and barbaric standard? We have no way of knowing the price we pay for the spreading of this subtle, moral teaching throughout our land.

The final indictment, Mr. President, is the list of nations with whom we are associating ourselves with a policy of capital punishment, the likes of Afghanistan, Iran, Iraq, Syria, Libya, the Soviet Union, and South Africa.

In closing, Mr. President, I would like to read the words of Justice Benjamin N. Cardozo. Cardozo says:

The death penalty will seem to the next generation, as it seems to many even now, an anachronism too discordant to be suffered, mocking with grim approach all our clamorous professions of the sanctity of life.

Let us vote to bring that about.

Mr. JEPSEN. Mr. President, I rise in support of S. 1765, a bill establishing constitutional procedures for imposition of capital punishment.

Over the past day and a half, we have heard numerous accounts of how innocent individuals were callously and deliberately murdered. Frankly, Mr. President, the murders described in the RECORD are of such gruesome proportions and sickening detail that many would consider prohibiting young children from reading yesterday's edition of the RECORD.

I strongly believe that society must punish and attempt to prevent cold, calculated acts of violence such as premeditated murder and political assassination. Those who perform such acts threaten the very existence and stability of our society.

The death penalty is not something that should be used indiscriminately. I believe the bill before us today makes sufficient changes in Federal law to insure that this does not happen.

But clearly, there are crimes for which the death penalty is the only appropriate penalty.

Very often, the debate surrounding the question of whether or not we should have a death penalty involves a case history or situation where innocent people have been convicted of murder only later to be released because of new evidence or a confession by the real culprit.

I think those examples, Mr. President, serve a valuable service to the death penalty debate but I do not think they make the case the opponents to death penalty had hoped.

When an innocent person has been convicted of a crime, only later to be found innocent, it reminds us of the need to strengthen our criminal justice system. Indeed, it makes it all the more imperative that when faced with the ultimate penalty question, we must make every effort to see that the penalty is appropriate. S. 1765 has those provisions which I believe will insure that innocent people are not put to death.

But why is it opponents of the death penalty never seem to want to talk about the innocent victims. And rest assured, the victims are not just the people who are murdered. Indeed, some have argued that the families that are left behind to deal with the tragedy are sometimes more profoundly affected by the whole incident.

Mr. President, I want my colleagues to understand why I believe the death penalty is so necessary. It is not, as some have suggested, because of a desire for vengeance. Clearly, vengeance is possibly the worst reason for having the death penalty. Rather, the reason we need a death penalty is to protect innocent individuals who are the potential victims.

We cannot bring back those who have been murdered. But, we can take steps to see that those who commit murders are not out roaming the streets looking for new victims.

If we do not deal firmly and decisively with those who have no regard for their fellow man or woman, then we are indirectly saying that we, too, have no regard for the life of the victim.

I support the use of the death penalty as a means of punishment for certain crimes. I believe the bill before us makes the death penalty a viable deterent and reaffirms our belief in the sanctity of life.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I would take this opportunity to outline the reasons why I will vote in favor of passage of S. 1765, Senator THURMOND's bill to establish a constitutionally sound procedure for imposing the penalty of death for the commission of certain Federal crimes. I have long advocated the restoration of the death penalty for the most serious Federal crimes of treason, espionage, murder, and felony offenses resulting in death. I wholeheartedly support the bill reported and I feel that the amendments adopted by the committee strengthen the legislation. I commend the chairman for taking the lead in introducing this measure and going forward with it in this session of Congress.

I. CONSTITUTIONAL QUESTIONS

Mr. President, there are many arguments raised today against capital punishment on philosophical, sociological, religious, and legal grounds. Many take the position that capital punishment is cruel and unusual punishment by today's standards, that morals and values have changed and that it is no longer an appropriate penalty for the crimes specified in the bill we have reported out of committee. I believe, however, that a brief examination of the history of capital punishment in our society refutes this view. At the time of the adoption of the bill of rights in 1789, capital punishment was employed for a variety of crimes, including crimes which did not result in the taking of another life. In the case of Trop v. Dulles, 356 U.S. 86, the Supreme Court noted that "the death penalty has been employed throughout our history, and, in a day when it is still widely accepted, it cannot be said to violate the constitutional concept of cruelty." This view has been repeatedly stated by the Court, and was restated recently in the landmark case of Furman against Georgia, the 1972 decision which analyzed once again the circumstances under which the penalty could be imposed, and which is the impetus for S. 1765. The proscription of the eighth amendment is toward the employment of penalties which involve unnecessary cruelty, or which are so disproportionate to the offense as to be unjust. The acceptability of the death penalty as appropriate punishment for certain crimes was implicitly approved in the language of the 14th amendment, adopted in 1868, which provides that no State shall deprive any person of "life, liberty, or property" except by due process of law.

Of course, the question of whether or not the use of the death penalty for a given offense is disproportionate to the crime for which it is imposed is one which is constantly subject to scrutiny as the attitudes of society develop in the light of modern experience. But I would affirm, Mr. President, that the crimes for which the penalty is imposed in S. 1765 are those which, in conjunction with the aggravating factors which may be considered under that legislation, are regarded by all civilized societies as being of sufficient gravity to justify a sentence of death upon conviction. And, when we look at contemporary public opinion, not only in this country but in others, we find that it is overwhelmingly in favor of capital punishment in principle. In the United States, two-thirds of the States have reenacted capital punishment statutes designed to overcome the Supreme Court's Furman decision, by mandating bifurcated hearings for the imposition of capital punishment. Public opinion polls have consistently shown the public majority in favor of capital punishment. Indeed, it is only a vocal minority which has raised the charge that capital punishment is, per se, cruel and unusual.

I would submit, Mr. Chairman, that the use of the death penalty for the crimes set forth in S. 1765 is neither cruel nor unusual; and that the procedures set forth in that bill insure the due process of law and equal protection required by our Constitution.

II. DETERRENT EFFECT

While the arguments against capital punishment on the cruel and unusual theory seem shallow, in my opinion, we are still left with the fundamental question: Is capital punishment just and useful? Does it accomplish any purpose which benefits society, and if so, do the advantages outweigh the disadvantages?

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that there are two fundamental purposes which any criminal penalty should serve if it is to be deemed just and useful: First, it should protect society from the criminal element, and second, it should help create and reinforce social mores which deem crime to be wrong per se. Both purposes abound around the idea of deterrence. When a society ceases to believe that criminal acts will be punished adequately, the moral sanction against killing and other heinous crimes diminishes. If people see murderers repeatedly given life sentences and released on parole after 15 years or less, the absolute credibility of the malum prohibitum surrounding heinous crimes disappears. In addition to the general, societal ambivalence concerning heinous crimes, we must consider the individual direct purposes of deterrence which capital punishment has on people who are considering committing a heinous crime, for in their calculations, the issue of the certainty of the sentence that will be imposed upon them will play a critical role.

There have been endless articles written concerning the statistical evidence for the deterrent consequences of capital punishment statuts. Many have argued that there is no conclusive statistical evidence that capital punishment deters murder. On the other hand, many have argued the opposite. Prof. Isaac Ehrlich, for example, conducted a statistical study of the years 1933 through 1969, and concluded that "an additional execution per year, may have resulted on the average in seven or eight fewer murders."

The Ehrlich study is very important here in our deliberations, because it refutes previous investigations highly publicized which did not find any deterrent statistical evidence of capital punishment. In addition, Professor Ehrlich has published a new cross-sectional analysis of the data, which confirms the conclusions of his original study. This appears in the June 1977 issue of the American Economic Review.

Of course, there are other studies which come to the opposite conclusion. With regard to the validity of those studies which deny any correlation between capital punishment and the incidence of murder, it is important to realize that those individuals who are in fact deterred by the presence of capital punishment statutes are not actually included in the data, because there is no way to determine their number. And while the statistical evidence on the deterrent effect of capital punishment is not conclusive, the general opinion of those in law enforcement who deal with murderers and capital offenders on a day-to-day basis is that the death penalty does deter these crimes. And those opinions, some of which were brought out in committee testimony, carry considerable weight for me.

But there is a larger point, beyond the numbers and theories on deterrence of the penalty to other criminals in society, which must not be overlooked. And that is, Mr. Chairman, that capital punishment is most certainly, and undeniably, a deterrent to that criminal who is executed. He will not be coming out on parole in 10 or 15 years to commit yet another assault on society; he will not be in a position to threaten the lives of prison personnel, or other prison inmates. He will be gone. And in light of the tragic incidence of heinous crimes committed by persons already convicted once for such a crime, who are unregenerate upon reentering society, this is perhaps the most compelling consideration. Some would say, "how can we take a life to demonstrate the importance of our laws, without degrading the laws we are trying to enforce?" My answer is, it is a question of societal self-defense.

No one among us would hesitate, we would hope, to kill a criminal who was attacking ourselves or our family members with intent and capability to kill. It would be necessary self-defense. Does not society have the same right and even obligation to defend itself against those who infringe upon the most fundamental right of a citizen—the right to live? If we take the logic of those who would abolish the penalty to its conclusion, then our law enforcement agencies could not act to defend a citizen whose life was threatened by riot or criminal act if that defense necessitated the killing of the persons creating the threat.

I, for one, reject that view. I believe that capital punishment is a powerful deterrent, if administered consistently and fairly. Assuming that potential assailants value their lives, it is rational to assume that they will think twice before taking action which will lead to the electric chair.

On this psychological point, Mr. Chairman, I am aware of certain opinions of criminologists, who contend that many murderers are really self-destructive, suicidal personalities who seek to commit murder in order to provoke the State to kill them, which is what they wish to do to themselves. While some murderers may in fact fit this description, it is far from clear that the majority do. Moreover, the existence of such individuals strengthens the argument for capital punishment, as their physical destruction is the only way of protecting society from their violence.

The psychological apologist argument against capital punishment, while warning us about suicidal psychotics, also contends that murder is frequently a "crime of passion," and that no cold calculation is involved before the act, thus rendering deterrence impossible. Statistical evidence does not clearly reveal what proportion of crimes of murder are in fact crimes of passion. S. 114 imposed capital punishment for crimes which clearly involved premeditation, however, so the argument lacks persuasiveness.

III. PROVISIONS OF S. 114

Mr. Chairman, the bill we have reported out not only specifies the death penalty for the basic offenses, but also spells out a clear bifurcated system for the judge and jury to follow after a person is convicted of a crime for which capital punishment may be imposed. A separate hearing must be held to determine whether this penalty should be imposed.

The bill sets out specific procedures and standards for the judge or jury to determine whether this penalty should be imposed. It must be determined whether aggravating and mitigating circumstances are present, and if so, which outweighs the other.

The burden of proof on the Government to establish aggravating factors is greater than that on the defendant to establish mitigating circumstances. In addition, the defendant is allowed to appeal his sentence of death. Thus, one cannot argue that this bill does not give defendants a fair chance to argue for mitigating factors which militate against capital punishment.

Mr. President, this procedure is fair, it is objective, and it is just. It meets the constitutional requirements set forth by the Supreme Court in Furman against Georgia, and cannot be said to constitute "cruel and unusual punishment," nor to give judges and juries unfettered discretion as to whether to impose capital punishment.

For these reasons, I will vote in favor of the bill.

● Mr. QUAYLE. Mr. President, I support S. 1765 as a long overdue response to the growing problem of crime in the United States. Since the procedure for imposing the death penalty was held unconstitutional in 1972, in the case of Furman against Georgia, the number of murders and nonnegligent manslaughters in the United States has risen from 15,832 to 21,010. This is an increase of 24.6 percent. Mr. President, this increase demands action on the part of this Congress.

To date, 35 States have responded to the Furman decision, including my home State of Indiana. In 1977, Indiana amended the criminal law and procedure section of the Indiana Code in a fashion similar in nature to what is before us today. By establishing a bifurcated trial procedure and outlining aggravating and mitigating circumstances, Indiana has successfully met the constitutional requirements to provide guidelines for discretion while retaining necessary flexibility.

The increase in the number of murders in the United States is indeed alarming. Of particular concern to me and the citizens of Indiana is the growing problem of murder for hire. The northwestern corner of Indiana, which is adjacent to the city of Chicago, has been plagued with the problem of contract killings for decades. The city of Gary, Ind., has one of the highest murder rates per capita in the United States today. Much of this is due to the strong element of organized crime in the area. The problem has become epidemic during these past years of Federal inaction. This bill is a fitting response to this calculated form of crime.

Mr. President, as a nation we have long been on record as maintaining capital punishment as a just and fitting response to certain crimes against our citizenry. The death penalty is an integral part of our criminal justice system. Recent studies by the University of Chicago and the American Bar Association found that 73 percent of the people polled were in favor of the death penalty. As a nation we have decided that the death penalty is a necessary and proper societal response in the form of just punishment. Whether we continue to maintain this form of punishment is not the question before us. The question is whether we amend our procedural statutes to conform to the constitutional requirements of Furman.

Mr. President, in 1972 the U.S. Supreme Court issued a challenge in its decision of Furman against Georgia. The court struck down the provisions of then-existing State and Federal statutes because there were inadequate guidelines provided for judges and jurors to consider in exercising their discretion. The challenge issued was this: If we are to maintain capital punishment as a viable part of our criminal justice system, we must structure it so as to conform to the constitutional principles upon which our system is founded. S. 1765 is the product of over 9 years of work. The examples of the States' legislative responses as well as the series of post-Furman Supreme Court decisions have been employed to help formulate this corrective legislation.

We have the opportunity today to respond to the challenge presented some 12 years ago which we are long overdue in answering. Capital punishment has proven to be an effective deterrent to the intolerable high rate of murder in this country. Therefore, I am hopeful S. 1765 will be approved.●

VOTE ON CLOTURE MOTION

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DANFORTH). Under the previous order, 1:30 p.m. having arrived, the clerk will state the motion to invoke cloture.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

CLOTURE MOTION

We, the undersigned Senators, in accordance with the provision of Rule XXII of the Standing Rules of the Senate, hereby move to bring to a close debate on S. 1765, a bill to establish constitutional procedures for the imposition of the sentence of death, and for other purposes.

Howard Baker, Ted Stevens, Strom Thurmond, James Abdnor, Frank Murkowski, Jesse Helms, Mack Mattingly, Alan Simpson, Jake Garn, Barry Goldwater, James A. McClure, Alfonse D'Amato, John Tower, John P. East, Roger W. Jepsen, Pete V. Domenici, Jeremiah Denton, Steve Symms, Dan Quayle, Warren Rudman, Slade Gorton, Paul Trible, Bob Dole, and Bob Kasten.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. By unanimous consent, the quorum call under the rule has been waived. The question is, Is it the sense of the Senate that debate on S. 1765, a bill to establish constitutional procedures for the imposition of the sentence of death, and for other purposes, be brought to a close? The yeas and nays are automatic under the rule. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. STEVENS. I announce that the Senator from Colorado (Mr. ARMSTRONG), the Senator from Nevada (Mr. LAXALT), the Senator from Wyoming (Mr. SIMPSON), and the Senator from Texas (Mr. TOWER) are necessarily absent.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Colorado (Mr. ARMSTRONG) would vote "yea".

Mr. BYRD. I announce that the Senator from California (Mr. CRAN-STON), the Senator from Ohio (Mr. GLENN), the Senator from Colorado (Mr. HART), and the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. HOLLINGS) are necessarily absent.

I also announce that the Senator from Vermont (Mr. LEAHY) is absent because of death in the family.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Vermont (Mr. LEAHY) would vote "nay."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there any other Senators in the Chamber wishing to vote?

The yeas and nays resulted—yeas 65, nays 26, as follows:

[Rollcall Vote No. 13 Leg.]

YEAS—65

Abdnor	Garn	Nunn
Andrews	Goldwater	Packwood

NOT VOTING—9

Armstrong	Hart	Leahy
Cranston	Hollings	Simpson
Glenn	Laxalt	Tower

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On this vote the yeas are 65, the nays are 26. Three-fifths of the Senate duly chosen and sworn having voted in the affirmative, the motion is agreed.

Mr. BAKER. Now, Mr. President, I announced earlier, that if cloture was invoked today, as indeed it has been, for which I am thankful, we would not make an attempt to finish this bill before we go out for the Lincoln Day break. Unless someone has something they wish to say on this measure at this time, I am prepared to ask the Senate to have a period for the transaction of routine morning business.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there now be a period for the transaction of routine morning business not past 3 p.m. in which Senators may speak for not more than 10 minutes each.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. BAKER. There will be no more votes today. It is the intention of the leadership on this side at the conclusion of business today to ask us to adjourn over, pursuant to the resolution adopted, until 12 noon on Monday, the 20th of February.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

HUMAN RIGHTS AND FOREIGN ASSISTANCE

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, the issue of Presidential certification about the status of human rights in El Salvador has confronted the Congress for some time. Now, with the continuing controversy over President Reagan's pocket veto of certification language; with the impending debate on legislation to implement the Kissinger Commission report; and with the passage yesterday by the House of new certification language, we can be certain that the Senate will soon plow through this thicket once again.

It is often said, in desperation if not in jest, that politics make strange bedfellows. One of the reasons that is so is because legislators are necessarily concerned about process, and not just about substance. To a large degree, that has been true of the debate over certification.

There are few among us who would deny that the human rights record of El Salvador has been very dismal. We can and do disagree over such things as the prospects for improvement or the ultimate source of the atrocities which are a daily occurrence in that country, but none of us can ignore the reality that thousands of Salvadorans have been killed, terrorized, tortured, or coerced into exile over the past few years. This is reality, and it is a reality which the United States has always found most unsavory. That is why no one should have been surprised at Vice President BUSH's recent remarks about death squads when he was visiting El Salvador. The Vice President was expressing the unanimous concern of people in this country.

So from the standpoint of substance, the certification provision which Congress adopted 2 years ago is understandable. It makes a certain degree of political and moral sense. Politically, it states the obvious point that the Government of El Salvador cannot hope to bring peace to its country so long as death squads are a fact of life. In other words, the certification provision was drafted with a pragmatic point in mind: you cannot win people over if they fear for their lives. But it was drafted with a moral intention as well. It expressed in a few terse words the impatience of the American people with an atrocious situation.

From the standpoint of process, however, the certification provision was extremely controversial. It raised a number of vital questions. For instance, it was criticized as leaving us and the Government of El Salvador with an all-or-nothing proposition, something which was considered by some people to be unrealistic given the savagery of the leftist guerrillas trying to topple a duly elected government. Others considered the certification instrument to be a major abrogation of congressional powers, for it virtually guaranteed that once a report was filed—regardless of its contents—appropriations would follow more or less automatically.

Unfortunately, the debate over certification has become a debate over an instrument, not a goal. As I see it, Mr. President, this has been both unnecessary and counterproductive, for we have lost sight of the fundamental issue: conditionality of assistance, a point on which we are all agreed.

The question, then, is whether we can achieve our goal with a more appropriate instrument. I think we can.

I have written to Senator PERCY suggesting that certification and reporting be undertaken by the Congress, rather than the President. I have done so for a number of reasons.

First, I believe it imperative that Congress meet its responsibilities in the area of foreign policy. These responsibilities do not include the day-to-day implementation and exercise of policy. But they do include the duty of broad goal setting and oversight. They are responsibilities which are in some respect shared with the executive. Too often we have failed to meet them for fear of having to make the kinds of tough choices which characterize the real world. We would rather sit back and leave everything in the President's hands. As understandable as this might be, I fear it is dangerous, regardless of the issue in question or the party in power.

When Congress relies exclusively on the executive to determine the facts of a situation, and moreover states that it will appropriate funding without arriving at its own conclusions, I feel that it is abrogating its proper role in foreign policy. What is worse, once the President has filed an instrument of certification, any discussion which occurs gets inextricably bound up in partisan politics. Regardless of the facts contained in any document, whether a Presidential report or a newsstory, those facts require interpretation. If we are to reach a judgment about events, we must understand a context for those events unless we want to rely simply on a procrustean bed with which to trim reality to fit our preconceptions.

So the second reason I feel we should begin to do some of our own investigation and reporting is that this will give us the opportunity to debate the issues in the fullest sense. We can to some extent minimize the risk that debate will be tainted by charges of partisanship, and we can collectively arrive at our own understanding of the context in which to examine events in El Salvador and elsewhere.

The issue, as I see it, Mr. President, is twofold: How to put teeth into the concept of conditionality on which virtually all Americans are agreed, and how to do so in a way which actively involves Congress in its proper foreign policy role.

I do not believe that the readoption of Presidential certification will do either of these things. It will call for reports, but it will not result in much more than that. And it will keep Congress from meeting its own obligations to share some responsibility for the conduct of policy.

Instead, I hope that we will recognize an opportunity here to begin to help shape the policy with which so many of us are concerned. I do not claim this will be easy. Responsibility is seldom easy to bear. But I do think it will more actively engage this institution in Central American policy, and I believe that that is well worth the added burden.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a copy of my letter to Senator PERCY be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON FINANCE,
Washington, D.C., February 9, 1984.

Hon. CHARLES H. PERCY,
Chairman, Committee on Foreign Relations, Washington, D.C.

DEAR CHUCK: As you know, the Congress will soon confront the issue of Presidential certification of human rights in El Salvador and other countries. The debate over the Kissinger Commission report, the continuing controversy over President Reagan's pocket veto of certification language, and the action by the House yesterday virtually ensure that this will be a highly contentious issue.

In my view, a great deal of the controversy is both unnecessary and counter-productive, for it detracts attention from the main issue: conditionality attached to assistance programs. There is a widely-shared consensus that aid should be conditioned, a point made with equal force by the Kissinger Commission and by the Administration. Unfortunately, the ongoing furor over certification has missed this point, for it has confused an instrument with a goal.

I'd like to suggest a possible solution: Congressional rather than Presidential determinations, under the lead of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Presidenial certification has a number of drawbacks, as both its proponents and its opponents have come to recognize. Perhaps the chief flaw of the process is that it virtually eliminates Congressional judgment from the decision about whether to appropriate assistance. Once an instrument of certification is filed, money is virtually guaranteed. There is little Congressional analysis of the facts presented in the certification document, and even less independent Congressional fact-finding.

Congress has broad investigatory powers, and the Committee has ample staff support from trained experts who can travel to Central America and arrive at their own conclusions. Regular reports from Congressional committees to the membership would go a long way toward restoring the proper role we play in foreign policy—a role defined by broad oversight and goal-setting.

Regular Congressional reports would have at least two other advantages over certification. First, the contents of the report would not need to be determined through explicit specification on the floor of the Senate. In other words, the report could be constructed on the basis of regular consultation with interested members and could address itself to broader questions of context.

Second, the report could to some extent minimize the perils of partisanship. If senators and representatives are to debate the significance of a set of findings, rather than simply the findings themselves, they must be free to do so with the least possible taint of partisanship. Just as it would be difficult for a Domocrat to criticize a Presidential report without being accused of partisanship, so too it would be difficult for a Republican to support a finding without the same problem. This is even more the case in an election year. A report originating from a bipartisan Congressional committee can overcome that problem.

Perhaps most important, however, regular Congressional reports—perhaps on a semi-annual basis—would provide the basis for a genuine debate, something which we have thus far engaged in too seldom. It would be my hope that such reports would provide the basis for regular votes on aid levels. Thus far, we have relied on such hasty vehicles as continuing resolutions to move appropriations, with little opportunity for reflection. If appropriations were linked to Congressionally generated findings about the status of human rights in recipient countries, we could begin to play the role which we have thus far abrogated.

I hope that you will let me know your views, for I would like to share this idea with others if you feel it worthwhile, and to begin working on appropriate legislation.

Sincerely,

DAVE DURENBERGER,
U.S. Senator.

THE UNITED STATES SHOULD USE ITS POWER TO BLOCK THE TRANSFER OF RADIOACTIVE WASTE FROM EUROPE TO CHINA

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, could the People's Republic of China secure a "plutonium mine" from the radioactive waste of European nuclear reactors? If so, could they extract from the waste useful plutonium for the manufacture of weapons? Would it make any sense economically or militarily? Do they not have enough plutonium already?

These are questions raised by the disclosure that China could receive $5.45 billion for making a deal with West Germany and Switzerland for the disposal of their radioactive materials from commercial reactors.

But there are obstacles in the way for China. The first obstacle is that at the moment most of the West German reactor fuel comes from the United States, under our law the President must insure that all nuclear materials originating in this country remain subject to safeguards administered by the Atomic Energy Agency to guarantee that they are not used for military purposes. According to a New York Times story, however, on February 8, Philip D. Keif of the Department of Energy, that has responsibility for executing this law, said that our Government would have no general objection to the plan although our approval would be on a case-by-case basis.

The second obstacles to the Chinese acquisition of this "plutonium mine" is that China—which has just joined the Atomic Energy Agency—has not yet said whether it would accept safeguards on civilian plants and waste storage sites. The Times reports that European officials have said that China has no "hope of being allowed to store Western nuclear waste unless it does" accept such safeguards.

Frankly, this Senator does not put any reliance on that kind of assurance. Suppose China agrees to the safeguards, accepts the more than $5 billion and the radioactive material builds its "plutonium mine" over the next 10 or 15 years and then simply renounces its agreement. What recourse do we have under those circumstances? Obviously none.

And what use could the Chinese put this disposal resource? We believe the PRC has sufficient quantities of uranium and plutonium for their military purposes. And we know it is much easier and cheaper to create their own than to reprocess spent fuel. And even if they they did, spent fuel may not be ideal for weapons.

While we believe these conclusions to be accurate, we cannot rule out a military use for this spent fuel—perhaps as an emergency source of plutonium or perhaps by transfer to third parties—even terrorists.

Mr. President, just recently I called to the attention of the Senate the fact that the Chinese represent what may today be the most serious threat of all the countries in the world of nuclear proliferation. They have spread nuclear arms material and know-how to Pakistan, India, and elsewhere. So obviously when the Chinese can pick up $5 billion and in the process build their own "plutonium mine," we can expect them to jump at the deal. So we should enforce the law to the fullest. That means we should call on the administration to take judicial notice of the record of the People's Republic of China in proliferating nuclear weapons. That notice should persuade us to vigorously enforce our law that insures that all nuclear materials originating in this country remain subject to safeguards administered by the Atomic Energy Agency to be sure that they are not used for military purposes.

Fortunately, the nuclear power industry is no longer expanding as rapidly as it did a few years ago. Some nuclear powerplants well underway have been scrapped because of the decline in the demand for electricity. With the surfeit of oil and the many increased costs of safeguarding nuclear power, it may be that the nuclear power boom has passed its peak and will decline indefinitely. In as much as plutonium from nuclear power waste has constituted a potential source of a vital ingredient of nuclear weapons, this is a fortuitous development that those of us concerned with the dangers of nuclear proliferation should take advantage of. One way to do so is to crack down on precisely the kind of threat posed by the European sale to China of waste nuclear materials that originated in this country.

Now, Mr. President, some say that the Chinese already have ample stores of plutonium. They do not need another "mine" to provide for their nuclear arsenal. This may be the case. But the question is how much plutonium is enough. The Chinese may have sufficient plutonium to fill their own current needs given the other limitations that stand in the way of their building themselves to nuclear arms super status. But they are a very large country with dedicated, revolutionary Marxist government. They also have the capacity to plan and act on a very long term basis. And, if they see their mission as providing nuclear materials to other countries—which is just what they are doing—then the plutonium might fit in nicely.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the article to which I have referred by Paul Lewis in the February 8 issue of the New York Times be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objecton, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CHINA BIDS TO STORE RADIOACTIVE WASTE

EUROPE OFFER TIED TO NEED FOR CURRENCY

(By Paul Lewis)

PARIS.—The Chinese Government is offering to store dangerous radioactive waste from European nuclear reactors in remote areas of the country in return for badly needed Western currency. The deal could be worth as much as $5.45 billion, according to one European official.

Last month, China signed a letter of intent to rent storage space for nuclear waste with three West German companies active in the nuclear supply business, European nuclear officials and industry executives said today.

China's prospective deal with these German companies raises serious questions relating to both the danger of nuclear proliferation and the imbalance between the industrialized and developing world. It must still be approved by the West German Government and it would need authorization of the United States if the spent reactor fuels sent to China were originally enriched in America.

(Responding to the report of the arrangement, Michael Oppenheimer, senior scientist with the Environmental Defense Fund, a nonprofit lobbying group, aid in New York: "It is in a sense blackmail of another country. You're asking another country that has more serious economic problems than your own to shoulder an environmental burden that you yourself would not tolerate.")

The German companies are Nukem, a big nuclear supply company based in Hanau; one of its subsidiaries specializing in the transportation of nuclear material, called Transnuclear, and Alfred Hempel, a privately owned company specializing in trade with the Communist world. None of these companies could be reached for comment tonight, but the same sources said that Nukem had confirmed its signature on the letter of intent to a West German news agency.

The Chinese have also approached the Swiss Government suggesting that they take waste from Swiss reactors, these sources say.

Basically, China's plan to become a storehouse for Western nuclear waste raises the possibility it would acquire what nuclear experts call a plutonium mine—that is, a large store of nuclear waste from which it might be able to extract plutonium, the main ingredient in nuclear bombs.

INTERNATIONAL SAFEGUARDS

Under United States law, the Reagan Administration must insure that all nuclear materials originating in the United States remain permanently subject to safeguards administered by the Vienna-based International Atomic Energy Agency to guarantee that they are not used for military purposes. At present, most of the fuel used in German reactors comes from the United States.

(In Washington, a spokesman for the Department of Energy, Philip D. Keif, indicated that the Government would have no general objection to the plan. "We would be sympathetic to the desires of some European countries who do not have a suitable prospect for disposal," he said. American approval of specific agreements would be on a case-by-case basis, he added, in which "nonproliferation is the essential standard.")

Last month, China joined the Atomic Energy Agency, which enforces a nonproliferation treaty, drawn up in the late 1950's whose signatories include virtually all the countries in the United Nations. However, three countries—the United States, Britain and the Soviet Union—signed the pact after they already possessed nuclear weapons, and they exempted their military installations from inspection.

China which also possesses nuclear weapons has specified the same terms; it has not yet said whether it would accept safeguards on civilian plants and waste-storage sites. But European officials say China has no hope of being allowed to store Western nuclear waste unless it does.

POLITICALLY SENSITIVE

Finding permanent, safe storage space for the thousands of tons of radioactive waste produced by nuclear reactors is one of the most challenging and politically sensitive tasks facing any country that opts for nuclear power. And sources in the European nuclear industry say that China appears eager to offer Western nations such remote areas as the Gobi Desert for this purpose in exchange for dollars.

China is currently engaged in a major campaign to modernize its economy, and last month the deputy chairman of the state economic commission told European businessmen that China will spend $1 billion this year to buy advanced Western technology.

At present, no European country with nuclear power stations possesses a permanent long-term storage site for nuclear wastes, some of which will be giving off deadly radiation for thousands of years. However, Sweden is currently building such a site underground, while Germany, Britain and France are prospecting for suitable locations.

The United States hopes to have such a repository operating by the end of the century. At present, spent reactor fuel generally is stored in swimming pool-like structures at the reactors where it was used. The spent fuel is still in its original form, being in most reactors clusters of fuel rods each about 12 feet long. The material can be shipped by truck or barge, in heavy steel protective canisters, but such shipments are rare in the United States because of the lack of a final repository.

COST OF THE DEAL

The quantity of fuel China wants to store and the price it is asking were not immediately clear. But one knowledgeable European official said the letter of intent signed between the China Nuclear Energy Industry Corporation and the three German concerns provides for the storage of about 4,000 tons of waste at a price of $1,500 a kilogram, equivalent to 2.2 pounds. Those figures indicate a deal that would be worth approximately $5.45 billion. It was not known over what period of time the waste would be shipped.

It is also unclear whether the Chinese are principally interested in storing the small quantity of so-called high level and very dangerous waste, produced after reactor fuel is reprocessed to separate out the plutonium, or the much larger quantities of spent fuel removed from reactors before it is reprocessed. At present, more than 20,000 tons of spent reactor fuel is being stored in specially cooled sites at reactors around the world and this figure is due to reach 70,000 tons by 1990.

When fuel is reprocessed, the rods are chopped up and immersed in acid, to allow the plutonium that was produced in the fission process, and the unused uranimum, to be chemically separated. The balance is atoms that were produced when uranium was split to release energy, called "fission products," which are highly radioactive and have no commercial value.

The wastes left from reprocessing are caustic, and often continue to give off heat, sometimes boiling by themselves. To be stabilized for easier handling, they can be solidified and mounted in a borosilicate glass similar to pyrex, or mixed with concrete.

President Carter banned reprocessing of spent fuel from civilian reactors in the United States because of fears of the spread of the technology for extracting bomb-grade plutonium, or spread of the plutonium itself through theft or terrorist attack. However, the United States Government maintains reprocessing plants at which uranium is extracted from spent fuel from Government reactors.

According to American researchers, both types of wastes must be carefully isolated from groundwater and human contact until no longer radioactive.

A TRIBUTE TO ELEANOR ROOSEVELT

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, today I would like to pay tribute to a great woman in American history—1984 marks the 100th anniversary of Eleanor Roosevelt's birth. Recently, a centennial celebration was held in Washington in honor of this crusader for human rights. Eleanor Roosevelt contributed greatly to this country's fine reputation for human rights. She embodied the principles she fervently worked to secure.

Eleanor Roosevelt lived in times that cried out for equality, liberty, social justice, and democracy. She not only heard this cry, but saw the dire need to actively secure these principles. She knew that solid substantial progress for human rights required specificity, monitoring, and accountability.

Mr. President, the United States has had a monumental human rights treaty in its midst now for 35 years, awaiting ratification by this body. The Genocide Convention would hold accountable those who commit this heinous crime. The Genocide Convention would also help us to monitor the occurrence of this international crime. Eleanor Roosevelt believed such documentation was important for the advancement of human rights.

Mrs. Roosevelt also expressed the need for exchange of ideas across national boundaries to promote interdependence of governments. The force of her cause continues to influence our lives 21 years after her death.

In 1963 Adlai Stevenson quoted Eleanor Roosevelt on his Christmas card:

> Where, after all, do human rights begin? In small places, close to home—so close and so small that they cannot be seen on any map of the world. Yet they are the world of the individual person: the neighborhood he lives in, the school or college he attends, the factory, farm, or office where he works.
> Such are the places where every man, woman, and child seeks equal justice, equal opportunity, equal dignity without discrimination. Unless these rights have meaning there, they have little meaning anywhere.

We can make human rights have meaning universally by first giving our advice and consent to a treaty here at home. In remembrance of Eleanor Roosevelt, let us reaffirm our Nation's commitment to human rights by ratifying the Genocide Convention.

A FATHER'S LOVE, A DAUGHTER'S MEMORY

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, Hadley Roff, my former press secretary, a good friend and now the deputy mayor of San Francisco, recently endured one of the worst tragedies that can come to any family. He lost his 19-year-old daughter in an auto accident.

At a memorial service for his daughter, Kelly, Hadley delivered a moving tribute that glowed with love and with bright memories of Kelly's laughter.

He faced this tragedy with bravery, and the sympathy of all who knew him here goes to Hadley, to his wife, Sue, and to Kelly's brothers, Jim and Tim.

In the San Francisco Examiner, Scott Beach reported and reprinted Hadley's eulogy in an article entitled, "A father's love, a daughter's memory." I ask that the article be included in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at this point. Hadley's simple eloquence speaks of Kelly's legacy to her family—and in a deeper sense, it speaks to all of us.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A FATHER'S LOVE, A DAUGHTER'S MEMORY

(By Scott Beach)

"I'm Kelly's dad."

With that simple introduction, Hadley Roff began the eulogy. His 19-year-old daughter Kelly had been killed in a car crash only a few days previously. A memorial for her was held, last Thursday, at Stern Grove, and a large crowd of people came to pay respects and offer condolences. In addition to Kelly's family and friends, there were political figures, including Dianne Feinstein, whom Hadley Roff serves as deputy mayor; members of the Board of Supervisors, commissioners, police and fire officials, labor leaders, sports figures—an impressive assembly. And many were there, myself among them, who are just friends of Hadley and Sue Roff.

The services were brief—some light and pleasant music, the eulogy and a few remarks by people who knew Kelly, with labor leader Dave Jenkins as master of ceremonies, and some selected scriptural readings by Msgr. Peter G. Armstrong of St. Pius Church in Redwood City. Hadley's eulogy was one of the most beautiful things of its kind I've ever heard. Later in the day, I asked him for permission to publish it, believing that it is an important statement of a father's love. The following is the text of that eulogy.

I'm Kelly's dad—and on behalf of Kelly's two brothers, Jim and Tim, and Kelly's stepmother Susie, let me welcome you and say how grateful we are that you're sharing this time with us.

Kelly would have been 20 years old on May 20th, and already she was planning the party, and indicating the presents she wanted.

So full of life and eager anticipation, so brimming with fun, she delighted in parties—in bringing people together—organizing—particularly if it provided an opportunity to dress outlandishly.

As "a nut" in her high school photo, an old fur wrapped around her neck and ridiculous pink glasses with pointed ends perched above a goofy smile—at a "squid party"—as a "nerd" in an outrageous get-up of 1950s hand-me-downs and unforgettable white Mary Janes with blue anchors on the toes—or as an elf in green and red at Christmas—or wrapped in cellophane as a bag of beer nuts—always a clown, always looking ahead to the next party, Kelly loved life with an unrestrained enthusiasm.

Cleaning up her room, putting the dishes away, scrubbing the kitchen counter before her crumbs became a feast for legions of ants—there was enthusiastic restraint.

She had a smile that would light a room—a splendid authentic laugh that bubbled deep from within her—and, when angry, she had a scowl darker than any cloud.

Like most young people, her moods shifted—happy most of the time, eager to be with people—but at times quiet, wanting to be alone, sitting on her bed, knees tucked under her chin, reading. Reading with the radio blaring, turned up to its loudest with a rock 'n' roll tune incomprehensible to anyone over the age of 25. "Damn it, turn that thing down! turn it down!" would be the cry from the parental floor above.

The telephone was in constant use. Sometimes, I even got to use it. The refrigerator is still a jumble of notes held by little magnets—Bobby called—Please call Barbara——

Kelly, this last Saturday—such an eternity ago—completed six weeks as a stock clerk at Macy's downtown. How she loved being in that store—any store, for that matter—for she loved to shop, to window-gaze, to report, breathlessly: "Dad, Susie, I saw the most wonderful dress!"

Now she lies on a green slope near a towering sentinel of a cypress, at Woodlawn Cemetery—not far from the bustling stores of Serramonte.

She had grit. When she was 10, living near Washington, D.C., Kelly, an AAU swimmer, was seeded far, far back in a major meet. Her mother, Mary, who over the years had driven her to meet after meet, was then hospitalized dying with cancer.

Kelly paced, waiting to be called to her heat in the breaststroke. She fidgeted on the starting block—then won not only her heat but the gold medal.

Kelly had a mind of her own—definite, opinionated—still yet to be finally shaped by the charity of experience. Kelly, like so many young people today, scorned scholarship and fatherly admonitions about the future and about responsibility. She lived joyously for the day—dreaming of the future—of that new dress—of that birthday party in May—of "maybe, Dad, going to college someday"—of the rich and, of course, handsome man who would step magically into her life and sweep her to St. Mary's Cathedral for a glittering wedding and, afterward, the biggest party ever.

The dreams of a 19-year-old—eager for the future, but equally eager for each moment of every day—a life so full of dreams—so expectant, so anticipatory—yet so incomplete, so unfinished—an unfinished symphony stopped so ultimately.

On Sunday, Sisters Francis and Joseph Grace at Mary's Help in South San Francisco really didn't have to say the words. The message, compassionate but unmistakable, was in their eyes. Their words helped, and Father Gorman's, the hospital chaplain, and the doctor. A parent's worst nightmare—the news, so unexpected, so unanticipated, at first was hallucinatory.

Back home, there still was the expectation that the front door would bang open—it was never just opened—and a radio would click to the highest decibel—and there would be that energetic "Hi, ya!" But, mostly, there was the deep silence in response to the unanswerable question: "Why?"

Kelly left a boundless legacy of love. She left scores of loving friends who gave substance to her life, and who, together, strengthen all of us who live on.

"Why?" A cosmic riddle, unfathomable, except in the ageless truth: Life goes on. Life goes on—the staying power of mankind. For young people, there are chores to do, dreams to realize, independence to accept, self-reliance to achieve, talents to mold into the responsibilities of adulthood. For those of us who are older, there are still challenges to meet, work to be done, bills to be paid. And, for all, there is laughter to renew, joy to rekindle—and above all, there is the flame of love and compassion to keep bright and extend to others.

Kelly, in her brief life, had no opportunity to achieve the stuff of encyclopedias, books written, concerts composed, continents conquered, discoveries made. But, even in so short a life, she may have achieved the greatest aspect of all—the gift of love.

CONGRESSMAN ED FEIGHAN SAYS MEDICARE NEEDS DOCTOR-COST CONTROL

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, 32 million Americans are once again being threatened by proposed cuts in a program they have contributed to and have come to rely on: medicare. The Reagan administration wants to slash $18 billion from the medicare budget in the next 4 years by increasing patient costs and discouraging the use of health care among the elderly and disabled.

Medicare's financial troubles are symptomatic of a much greater problem: the skyrocketing cost of health care in this country. We can only save medicare from bankruptcy if we treat the disease, not the symptom. We cannot forget that essential health care services are becoming unaffordable for too many Americans.

My friend and colleague in the House, ED FEIGHAN of Ohio, recently addressed medicare's problems and offered a number of excellent observations. I believe that Congressman FEIGHAN's views will be of interest to all of us as we seek to deal fairly and responsibly with the coming crisis in medicare, and I ask unanimous consent that his analysis now be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the analysis was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Cleveland Plain Dealer Feb. 2, 1984]

MEDICARE NEEDS DOCTOR-COST CONTROL

(By Edward F. Feighan)

Shortly after his inauguration, President Reagan made an important promise: "Those who must depend on the rest of us—the poverty-stricken, the disabled, the elderly, all those with true need—can rest assured that the social safety net of programs they depend on are exempt from the cuts." Sadly enough, the president has spent the last three years breaking this promise time and time again.

His most recent assault on what he calls "the social safety net" concerns Medicare, a program that helps protect 29 million older Americans and three million disabled citizens against rising health-care costs. When recent projections warned that Medicare would be insolvent by 1990, the president claimed that Medicare is in crisis because its benefits are too generous and the elderly use too much health care. As a solution, he proposed increasing premiums, copayments and deductibles, and cutting the Medicare program by $18 billion over the next four years.

By consistently ignoring the needs and concerns of those without income and health security, the president continues to alienate those of us who favor fiscally and socially responsible solutions to the unnecessarily high deficits that plague our economy.

Medicare's financial difficulties are not due to overly generous benefits and free-loading older Americans. In fact, Medicare pays less than half the health costs of the elderly. Eyeglasses, hearing aids, dental services, prescription drugs and most long term nursing care are not covered. Even with Medicare, the average senior citizen pays well over $1,500 a year in out-of-pocket medical expenses.

Medicare is in financial trouble because it is a relatively small cog in a health-care system that is careening out of control. Health-care expenditures in this country reached $322 billion in 1982, and the health-care industry was ravaged by a 12 percent inflation rate.

In Cuyahoga County, the cost of medical care has skyrocketed to the point where it is now 26 percent higher than the national average. Nationally, physician fees have been increasing at a rate 50 percent greater than the rate of inflation since 1975. To make matters worse, the health-care industry is riddled by waste; we have 100,000 excess hospital beds going unused, two million unnecessary operations each year that cost over $4 billion, duplicative technology worth millions of dollars, too many specialists and not enough primary-care physicians.

Inflation and waste in health care have helped push Medicare to the brink of bankruptcy, and if the president and Congress fail to consider Medicare in its proper context, older Americans will undoubtedly bear the brunt of more myopic budget cuts.

Medicare's financial crisis can also be attributed in part to mechanical failures in its reimbursement system. Medicare reimbursement is based on the amount of service provided—physicians receive a fee for each service provided and hospitals are reimbursed for the cost of providing services. The more services given, the more money received. It is easy to see how this "blank check" approach has fueled high inflation in health care.

Fortunately, Congress has passed legislation to hold down hospital costs. A new prospective payment system reimburses hospitals for 468 different procedures at a fixed rate. Hospitals now know how much they will get from Medicare for heart surgery, a cataract operation, even a broken hip.

If a hospital's costs are less than the fixed amount, it gets to keep the difference. If the hospital spends more than the fixed amount, it must absorb the loss. The goal of this system is to encourage hospitals and doctors to reduce unnecessarily long hospital stays and stop unnecessary procedures.

Unfortunately, Medicare payments to physicians still lack suitable cost controls. Physicians, who make almost all medical decisions, have no real incentive to hold down Medicare costs by prescribing only the necessary testing and treatment.

This part of Medicare, the supplementary medical insurance, has seen its cost skyrocket by as much as 20 percent a year. Doctors are reimbursed by Medicare for 80 percent of their "reasonable charge" while the patient pays the other 20 percent. But if a doctor considers a Medicare reimbursement insufficient, the patient can be billed for an additional amount—there is no limit. On the average, this tack-on charge represents 27 percent of a patient's total doctor bills. In an important move, the House Ways and Means Committee recently approved legislation that would ask doctors to accept Medicare reimbursement as payment in full for each service provided.

Medicare payments to physicians must be made more cost-efficient. Now that hospitals are operating under a prospective payment system, it is the doctors' turn to bite the bullet as we try to contain health care costs and save Medicare from bankruptcy. Creating a prospective payment system for in-hospital physician services is one proposal that Congress should carefully consider during its debate on Medicare reform.

To understand the dynamics of this debate, I find it helpful to review the major components of President Reagan's proposed $18 billion cut. The president wants to discourage the use of health care by the elderly by making them pay a much bigger portion of their medical costs.

The Reagan proposal calls for Medicare to become a "castastrophic coverage" plan that would charge patients much more for the first 60 days of their hospital stay while the government would pay all hospital bills after that.

Under this plan, for example, a patient who stays in the hospital 30 days would pay over $1,000 as opposed to $350 under current law. In addition, Medicare's coverage of physician services would be restructured with significant increases in both the premium and the deductible.

This catastrophic coverage would help very few people. Ninety-eight per cent of all hospitalized Medicare patients stay in the hospital less than 60 days and these senior citizens would be severely burdened by the new cost-sharing requirements.

The President's Advisory Council on Social Security has proposed a different version of catastrophic Medicare coverage. The yearly premium for supplementary medical insurance would immediately increase by 250 percent to $412, but patient liability would be limited to $200 a year in doctors' bills plus $350 for each hospital confinement. Members of the advisory council also want to raise the age for Medicare eligibility from 65 to 67. This would force millions of senior citizens on fixed incomes to pay thousands of dollars a year for private health insurance.

As Congress discusses Medicare reform, it must keep in mind that Medicare faces more than a financial crisis; the program has become increasingly unable to protect older Americans against skyrocketing health-care costs. So I am convinced that any attempt to solve Medicare's financial problems by reducing benefits will fail in the long run. If Medicare coverage is allowed to erode, the elderly will have to dig deeper into their pockets to pay the rising premiums of Medigap policies, and this will create a whole new class of health-care indigents.

Saving Medicare requires immediate action on two fronts. First, Congress must correct flaws in Medicare's reimbursement system, giving doctors and hospitals more incentive to weed out waste and increase their efficiency. Secondly, we must use the Medicare issue to initiate a meaningful critique of the health-care industry as a whole.

We can save Medicare only if we contain the cost of health care in this country. Our health-care system needs to be reoriented toward the delivery of more cost-effective and efficient services.

Senior citizens must not be asked to foot the bill for health care inflation and an inefficient Medicare reimbursement system. This is why I am unalterably opposed to President Reagan's plan to put Medicare on the chopping block. If we allow this to happen millions of Americans will feel the pain for many years to come.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Saunders, one of his secretaries.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

As in executive session, the Acting President pro tempore laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(The nominations received today are printed at the end of the Senate proceedings.)

MESSAGES FROM THE HOUSE

At 1:12 p.m., a message from the House of Representatives was delivered by Ms. Goetz, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had passed the following joint resolution without amendment:

S.J. Res. 146. Joint resolution to designate March 23, 1984, as "National Energy Education Day."

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolution in which it requests the concurrence of the Senate:

H.R. 555. An act to amend the Federal Power Act to limit the recovery by public utilities of certain costs of construction work in progress through rate increases.

H.J. Res. 271. Joint resolution designating February 11, 1984, "National Inventors' Day."

At 1:36 p.m., a message from the House of Representatives was delivered by Mr. Berry, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House has agreed to the committee of conference report on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 1340) entitled "An Act to revise and extend the Rehabilitation Act of 1973 and to extend the Developmental Disability Assistance and Bill of Rights Act, and for other purposes."

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE RECEIVED DURING THE ADJOURNMENT

Under the authority of the order of the Senate of February 9, 1984, the Secretary of the Senate, on February 9, 1984, during the adjournment of the Senate, received a message from the House of Representatives announcing that the House agrees to the amendment of the Senate to the concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 255) providing for an adjournment of the House from February 9 to 21, 1984, and an adjournment of the Senate from February 9 or February 10 to February 20, 1984.

The message also announced that pursuant to the provisions of section 161(a) of Public Law 93-618, and upon recommendation of the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, the Speaker has selected the following members of that committee to be accredited by the President as official advisers to the U.S. delegations to international conferences, meetings, and negotiation sessions relating to trade agreements during the 2d session of the 98th Congress: Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI, Mr. GIBBONS, Mr. JONES of Oklahoma, Mr. VANDER JAGT, and Mr. FRENZEL.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED

The message further announced that the Speaker has signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution:

S. 1340. An act to revise and extend the Rehabilitation Act of 1973, to provide for the operation of the Helen Keller National Center for Deaf-Blind Youths and Adults, to extend the Developmental Disabilities Assistance and Bill of Rights Act, and for other purposes;

H.R. 1557. An act for the relief of William D. Benoni; and

S.J. Res. 146. Joint resolution to designate March 23, 1984, as "National Energy Education Day."

MEASURES REFERRED

H.R. 555. An act to amend the Federal Power Act to limit the recovery by public utilities of certain costs of construction work in progress through rate increases; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

H.J. Res. 271. A joint resolution designating February 11, 1984, "National Inventors' Day"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED

The Secretary reported that on today, February 9, 1984, he had presented to the President of the United States the following enrolled bills:

S. 379. An act to cancel certain indebtedness in connection with disaster relief activities; and

S. 684. An act to authorize an ongoing program of water resources research, and for other purposes.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

The following reports of committees were submitted:

By Mr. ROTH, from the Committee on Government Affairs, without amendment:

S. Res. 293. Resolution directing the Senate legal counsel to bring civil action to enforce subpena of the Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations (Rept. No. 98-354).

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

The following executive reports of committees were submitted:

By Mr. MCCLURE, from the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources:

Ann Dore McLaughlin, of the District of Columbia, to be Under Secretary of the Interior; and Richard Thomas Montoya, of Texas, to be an Assistant Secretary of the Interior.

By Mr. GARN, from the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs, Richard H. Francis, of Virginia, to be President of the Solar Energy and Energy Conservation Bank.

(The above nominations were reported from the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources with the recommendation that they be confirmed, subject to the nominees' commitment to respond to requests to appear and testify before any duly constituted committee of the Senate.)

INTRODUCTION OF BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

The following bills and joint resolutions were introduced, read the first and second time by unanimous consent, and referred as indicated:

By Mr. THURMOND:

S. 2279. A bill for the relief of Ching-Yau Cheng and Mei-Wa Cheng, his wife; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

S. 2280. A bill for the relief of Ching-Kee Cheng and Wun-Mun Cheng, his wife; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. HATCH:

S. 2281. A bill to revise and extend provisions of the Public Health Service Act relating to the National Health Service Corps; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

By Mr. GOLDWATER (for himself, Mr. FORD, and Mr. PRESSLER):

S. 2282. A bill to amend the Communications Act of 1934 to limit ownership of national television networks not otherwise subject to section 310 of the act and certain large cable television systems by foreign entities or aliens, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

By Mr. MATHIAS:

S. 2283. A bill to provide for the public financing of general elections for the U.S. Senate, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

By Mr. DURENBERGER (for himself, Mr. ARMSTRONG, and Mr. GRASSLEY):

S. 2284. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to provide that the standard mileage rate for use of a passenger automobile which may be used in computing the charitable contribution deduction shall be the same as the standard mileage rate which may be used in computing the business expense deduction; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. BIDEN:

S. 2285. A bill to amend the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 to limit the period for which the enactment of new budget authority may be authorized, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Budget and the Committee on Governmental Affairs, jointly, pursuant to the order of August 4, 1977, with instructions that if one committee reports, the other committee has 30 days of continuous session to report or be discharged.

By Mr. BIDEN:

S. 2286. A bill to amend the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 to require authorizing legislation for tax expenditures, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Budget and the Committee on Governmental Affairs, jointly, pursuant to the order of August 4, 1977, with instructions that if one committee reports, the other committee has 30 days of continuous session to report or be discharged.

By Mr. PELL:

S. 2287. A bill to provide for the distribution of oil overcharges collected by the Department of Energy to consumers; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

By Mr. LEVIN (for himself and Mr. RIEGLE):

S. 2288. A bill to extend duty-free treatment to imports of chipper knife steel; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. SPECTER:

S. 2289. A bill to amend the Vocational Education Act of 1963 to place certain community-based organizations of State, local, and national advisory councils, to provide special consideration of certain proposals for vocational education grants, and to require a set-aside of certain allocations for vocational education programs; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

By Mr. WILSON (for himself and Mr. CRANSTON):

S. 2290. A bill to amend the act entitled "An Act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to construct, operate, and maintain the Auburn-Folsom South unit, American River division, Central Valley project, California, under Federal reclamation laws," enacted September 2, 1965; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

By Mr. HUMPHREY:

STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. HATCH:

S. 2281. A bill to revise and extend provisions of the Public Health Service Act relating to the National Health Service Corps; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

NATIONAL HEALTH SERVICE CORPS AMENDMENTS OF 1984

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I am today introducing the National Health Service Corps Amendments of 1984. This legislation is an important step in our continuing concern that adequate health manpower is available to our Nation's underserved.

The National Health Service Corps (NHSC) is a Federal program designed to place physicians, dentists, and other health professionals in federally designated health manpower shortage areas (HMSA's) that have a demonstrated need and demand for them. The authority for the NHSC consists of a "field" program and a scholarship program. The NHSC field program is responsible for assigning corps members to HMSA's. The scholarship program obligates health providers to serve in a HMSA in return for a NHSC scholarship. Since 1981, only a small number of new NHSC scholarships have been awarded as part of an exceptional financial need program.

Although an increase in the supply of physicians and other health professionals and the resulting market forces have reduced the number of areas of health manpower shortage, there will continue to be a need for a NHSC program to assist areas that have not been able to attract and may never be able to attract the needed health care providers. I therefore support the NHSC as a modest but effective long-term means to voluntarily move health care providers into areas that need them the most.

While some needs remain and the National Health Service Corps goal and commitment remain the same—"to improve the delivery of health services in health manpower shortage areas"—the growth of the corps has justifiably leveled off. The number of corps members is now in harmony with evidence that a surplus of physicians and other health care providers (e.g., dentists, nurses) is having a significant effect on the geographic distribution of health professionals. Shortage areas in need of health manpower continue to diminish in response to the success of the NHSC program and the general diffusion of health professionals to areas of need.

There are undoubtedly some areas for which no increased amount of competition in the health care delivery system will provide a readily accessible doctor. In particular, I believe there will continue to be an uneven distribution of health providers in small isolated communities in remote rural areas. Many of these areas will not be able to attract sufficient health care practitioners, even in the face of a doctor "glut", without the NHSC.

The NHSC legislation that I introduce today reauthorizes the NHSC field program and a small NHSC scholarship program for 3 years and contains the following major features: First, the bill contains an authorization level ($90, $85, and $85 million for fiscal years 1985-87) that will allow the NHSC field program to remain at its current level of federally salaried corps members through fiscal year 1987. These authorization levels are actually somewhat higher than projected needs to allow for an increase in the NHSC field budget if the mix of federally salaried corps members and private practice option members changes adversely.

Second, the bill contains an authorization level sufficient to support 150 new NHSC scholarships in each of fiscal years 1985, 1986, and 1987 and the outyear continuation of NHSC scholarship awards first made prior to October 1, 1987. A modest NHSC scholarship program will assist the corps by assuring a small pipeline of service contingent health practitioners to help meet the needs of the most critical manpower shortage areas. However, this modest program will not interfere with the recruitment of volunteers into the NHSC, which is the preferable means.

Third, under this legislation, the Secretary of HHS is directed to transmit to the Congress a long-term staffing plan for the NHSC based on a total corps size of 2,100 or such lesser number that is consistent with the demonstrated health manpower needs of health manpower shortage areas. As the number of health manpower shortage areas shrink in response to NHSC program placements and market forces, the corps needs such a versatile long-range plan to continue its mission of providing health personnel to communities with the greatest need and demand for health care and which have been unable to attract providers of primary care services.

Two technical amendments are also included in the bill. First, starting with individuals who sign their first NHSC scholarship contract in fiscal year 1985, the Secretary of Health and Human Services is given the flexibility to select for these individuals which residency and advanced clinical training program they may participate in while deferring their scholarship obligation. Second, current law contains two authorities for loans to corps members to enter private practice in a health manpower shortage area. The bill combines these authorities into one loan program available to all corps members (scholarship obligated and volunteers) who will enter into or are currently in private practice in a health manpower shortage area. These loans will assist eligible individuals in the purchase of equipment and the renovation of facilities used in providing health services and will help to promote the National Health Service Corps private practice option program. The private practice option encourages individuals to serve at their own financial risk in underserved areas during their period of obligated service. The option also provides incentives for corps members to develop good relationships with the community they serve and to stay in that community for longer periods of time.

Taken altogether, this bill gives the NHSC program the flexibility it needs to continue to operate at a level consistent with the needs of health manpower shortage areas. I urge the support of all my colleagues for this worthwhile goal.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2281

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "National Health Service Corps Amendments of 1984".

REFERENCE

SEC. 2. Except as otherwise specifically provided, whenever in this Act an amendment or repeal is expressed in terms of an amendment to, or a repeal of, a section or other provision, the reference shall be considered to be made to a section or other provision of the Public Health Service Act.

AUTHORIZATIONS OF APPROPRIATIONS

SEC. 3. (a) Section 338(a) is amended by striking out "and" after "1983;" and by inserting before the period a semicolon and "$90,000,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1985; $85,000,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1986; and $85,000,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1987".

(b) Section 338F(a) is amended by striking out the last sentence and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "For the fiscal year ending September 30, 1985, and each of the two succeeding fiscal years, there are authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to make 150 new scholarship awards in accordance with section 338A (d) in such fiscal year and to continue to make scholarship awards to students who have entered into written contracts under the Scholarship Program before October 1, 1987.".

OBLIGATED SERVICE

SEC. 4. Section 338B(b)(5) is amended to read as follows:

"(5)(A) With respect to an individual receiving a degree from a school of medicine, osteopathy, dentistry, veterinary medicine, optometry, podiatry, or pharmacy, the date referred to in paragraphs (1) through (4) shall be the date upon which the individual completes the training required for such degree, except that—

"(i) at the request of such an individual with whom the Secretary has entered into a contract under section 338A prior to October 1, 1984, the Secretary shall defer such date until the end of the period of time (not to exceed the number of years specified in subparagraph (B) or such greater period as the Secretary, consistent with the needs of the Corps, may authorize) required for the individual to complete an internship, residency, or other advanced clinical training; and

"(ii) at the request of such an individual with whom the Secretary has entered into contract under section 338A on or after October 1, 1984, the Secretary may defer such date in accordance with the provisions of clause (i).

"(B)(i) With respect to an individual receiving a degree from a school of medicine, osteopathy, or dentistry, the number of years referred to in subparagraph (A)(i) shall be three years.

"(ii) With respect to an individual receiving a degree from a school of veterinary medicine, optometry, or pharmacy, the number of years referred to in subparagraph (A)(i) shall be one year.

"(C) No period of internship, residency, or other advanced clinical training shall be counted toward satisfying a period of obligated service under this subpart.

"(D) With respect to an individual receiving a degree from an institution other than a school referred to in subparagraph (A), the date referred to in paragraphs (1) through (4) shall be the date upon which the individual completes his academic training leading to such degree.".

SPECIAL LOANS FOR CORPS MEMBERS TO ENTER PRIVATE PRACTICE

SEC. 5. (a) Subsections (a) and (b) of section 338F are amended to read as follows:

"(a) The Secretary may, out of appropriations authorized under section 338, make one loan to a Corps member who has agreed in writing—

"(1) to engage in the private full-time clinical practice of his profession in a health manpower shortage area (designated under section 332) for a period of not less than two years which—

"(A) in the case of a Corps member who is required to complete a period of obligated service under this subpart, begins not later than one year after the date on which such individual completes such period of obligated service; and

"(B) in the case of an individual who is not required to complete a period of obligated service under this subpart, begins at such time as the Secretary considers appropriate;

"(2) to conduct such practice in accordance with the provisions of section 338C (b)(1); and

"(3) to such additional conditions as the Secretary may require to carry out the purposes of this section; to assist such individual in meeting the costs of beginning the practice of such individual's profession in accordance with such agreement, including the costs of acquiring equipment and renovating facilities for use in providing health services, and of hiring nurses and other personnel to assist in providing health services. Such loan may not be used for the purchase or construction of any building.

"(b) The amount of a loan under subsection (a) to an individual shall not exceed $25,000.".

(b) Subsection (c) of such section is amended by striking out "grant or" in the first sentence.

(c) Subsection (d)(1) of such section is amended by striking out "this section," and inserting in lieu thereof "this section (as in effect prior to October 1, 1984),".

(d) Section 338C(e) is amended by striking out paragraph (1) and by striking out "(2)" before "Upon".

PERSONNEL PLAN FOR THE NATIONAL HEALTH SERVICE CORPS

SEC. 6. (a) By October 1, 1985, the Secretary of Health and Human Services shall prepare and transmit to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources of the Senate and the Committee on Energy and Commerce of the House of Representatives a plan for the recruitment, employment, and retention of personnel for the National Health Service Corps which assures that—

(1) the Corps will continue to improve the delivery of health services in health manpower shortage areas (as designated by the Secretary under section 332 of the Public Health Service Act) during fiscal year 1988 through 1990; and

(2) during each such fiscal year, the total number of Corps members shall not exceed 2,100 or such lesser number as the Secretary considers necessary to serve the demonstrated needs of health manpower shortage areas.

(b) The plan required by subsection (a) shall include alternative proposals for the recruitment, employment, and retention of personnel for the National Health Service Corps, estimates of the amounts that would be required to carry out each such proposal during each of the fiscal years with which the plan is concerned, and such recommendations for legislation and administrative action as the Secretary considers appropriate.

(c) The Secretary shall prepare the plan required by subsection (a) in consultation with State governments, voluntary organizations, and organizations representing health professionals.

EFFECTIVE DATE

SEC. 7. This Act and the amendments made by this Act shall take effect on October 1, 1984, except that section 6 shall take effect on the date of enactment of this Act.

By Mr. GOLDWATER (for himself, Mr. FORD and Mr. PRESSLER)

S. 2282. A bill to amend the Communications Act of 1934 to limit ownership of national television networks not otherwise subject to section 310 of the act and certain large cable television systems by foreign entities or aliens, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Commerce, Science and Transportation.

RESTRICTING FOREIGN CONTROL OF CABLE SYSTEMS AND NEW MAJOR TELEVISION NETWORKS

● Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I am introducing, today, for myself and Senators FORD and PRESSLER, legislation to limit foreign control of new major U.S. television networks and large cable television systems. There is nothing new in the proposal. The measure simply brings existing alien ownership restrictions of communications law up to date with modern technology. The basic need for the bill is to prevent foreigners from buying up and gaining control over the primary source of information which is available to and used by the American people.

Section 310(b) of the Communications Act of 1934 presently restricts foreign ownership of and participation in broadcast licenses of individual radio and television stations. Section 310(b) is but one of several statutes that restrict foreign ownership in critical U.S. industries.

Present law prohibits indirect as well as direct foreign ownership of broadcast stations. The extent of the prohibition depends upon the amount of foreign participation. Individual foreigners are barred from holding licenses. Corporate licensees are limited to 20-percent alien ownership of capital stock and are prohibited from having a foreign citizen as either an officer or a director. Holding companies are allowed as much as 25-percent foreign ownership and 25-percent foreign participation on the board of directors. In addition, the Federal Communications Commission is granted discretion to approve more foreign stock ownership, board of directors' representation and officers in the case of holding companies.

Current law does not specifically apply to cable system operators, nor would it apply to any major national television network which does not hold a station license. These are two major loopholes in the law which must be closed up.

National television networks increasingly provide the primary source of news and information to the vast majority of U.S. citizens. Newspapers and magazines, books and other printed materials, come in as a distant second as the source of day-in and day-out information received by most people. While it is true that the three major national television networks are presently all covered by the foreign ownership restrictions of section 310(b), since they have financial interests in or ownership of individual broadcast licenses, a new major network could arise that does not hold any license or the present corporations could change their organization by spinning off their interests in station licenses.

Also, due to the growing expansion of cable television service throughout the United States, the majority of American people now have the opportunity to receive cable service and 38 percent of American homes are subscribers. It may take several more years for cable to reach its true potential, but all telecommunications studies predict a growing share of the home video market for cable systems. Although I realize that in 1975 and 1980, the FCC declined to adopt a rule against foreign ownership of cable television systems, I feel strongly that cable television deserves no less protection from foreign influence than broadcast television or radio.

Mr. President, it should be noted that no other country in the world allows the degree of foreign ownership in its broadcast and cable television companies that is possible in the United States. The proposed law merely extends existing policy to new video technologies.

The bill we are introducing will add a new section 333 to the Communications Act of 1934. It will make it unlawful for foreign persons to directly or indirectly operate or control a major national television network not subject to current law. To avoid redundancy, only major national television networks, which are not subject to section 310(b) of the act as owners of interests in television stations, will be brought within the new alien ownership restrictions. ABC, CBS, and NBC, as now organized, will not be affected because two of the networks are already covered by internal corporate limits on foreign influence and all are covered by section 310(b).

The new section 333 will also establish foreign ownership restrictions that are directly applicable to large cable television systems.

Unlike the present section 310(b)(4), section 333 will not give the FCC discretion to allow undue alien ownership in parent companies of these networks and cable systems. The Commission will have discretion only as to allowing an alien to be an officer.

Mr. President, I want to make it clear that any ownership arrangements now existing, which would otherwise be prohibited under the bill, are grandfathered to avoid possible industry disruption. For example, existing Canadian and other foreign ownership of U.S. cable systems would not be affected by the bill. Specifically, any foreign-owned cable operator otherwise covered by the bill could continue to expand service under existing franchises or submit bids for new franchises if the bidding process had already commenced. Also, the present ownership structure of any television network otherwise covered by section 333, but permissible under the current section 310(b), will be grandfathered. The effective date of the grandfather clause is today, February 9, the date of introduction of the bill.

Mr. President, I have mentioned that the bill will apply only to large cable television systems. This is provided for in section 333. Paragraph (b)(2) contains a definition of cable operators which limits the bill to a cable operator who directly or indirectly operates or controls one or more cable television systems which, in the aggregate, serve no less than 250,000 subscribers.

The definition section would allow foreign investment in cable operations where the potential for influence is minimal, but it would reach situations where the degree of potential, foreign influence is sizable.

This subject is not new to the Senate. Last June 14, we passed S. 66, the cable bill, which contains a provision, section 605(b), directly applicable to foreign ownership. The section calls on the FCC to identify situations in which foreign investors can buy into U.S. cable companies, but U.S. investors do not enjoy reciprocity. The U.S. Trade Representative is supposed to act on such barriers, when they are uncovered.

Also, on August 10, 1982, the Senate Commerce Committee reported a cable bill, S. 2172, which I coauthored, that included a foreign ownership restriction that is even tougher than section 333 of the bill I am introducing today. Section 605(b) of S. 2172 would have directed the FCC to adopt rules creating an absolute ban on foreign ownership or control of cable television systems in the United States by the nationals of any country to the extent that ownership of cable systems was prohibited in such foreign country.

Because many countries do not allow U.S. investment in communications enterprises to the extent allowed in this country, S. 2172 could have created a complete barrier to much foreign investment in the cable television industry in the United States.

This bill, on the other hand, is much more narrow in scope. It allows outright foreign ownership and control of cable systems serving an aggregate of 250,000 subscribers. Moreover, the present bill provides for grandfathering of current foreign ownership in excess of those limits and allows reasonable levels of foreign investment in the nationally oriented cable companies while establishing fair limits to prevent undue influence.

Finally, the bill amends section 310(b)(4) of the Communications Act by removing discretion from the FCC to permit foreign ownership interests in certain situations, where the Commission may find that the public interest will be served thereby. The Commission can now permit alien officeships, directorships, and ownership interests in parent companies of licensees. The proposed amendment will retain this flexibility only as to officerships. Again, the bill contains a grandfather clause.

Mr. President, I hope there will be early and favorable action on the bill to protect against improper foreign influence in the primary source of information received by the American public.

Mr. President, I ask the text of the bill and a brief analysis may appear in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. That Part I of Title III of the Communications Act of 1934 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"LIMITATION OF ALIEN CONTROL OF NATIONAL TELEVISION NETWORKS NOT OTHERWISE SUBJECT TO SECTION 310 AND CABLE TELEVISION SYSTEMS

"SEC. 333. (a) It shall be unlawful for—

"(1) any foreign government or the representative of any foreign government;

"(2) any alien or the representative of any alien;

"(3) any corporation organized under the laws of any foreign government or representatives thereof;

"(4) any corporation of which any officer or director is an alien or of which more than one-fifth of the capital stock is owned of record by aliens or their representatives, or by a foreign government or representatives thereof, or by any corporation organized under the laws of a foreign country;

"(5) any corporation directly of indirectly controlled by any other corporation (i) of which more than one-fourth of the directors are aliens; or (ii) of which more than one-fourth of the capital stock is owned of record by aliens or their representatives, or by a foreign government or representatives thereof, or by any corporation organized under the laws of a foreign country; or (iii) of which any officer is an alien, if the Commission finds that the public interest will be served by prohibiting such alien officership;

to directly or indirectly operate or control a national television network not otherwise subject to Section 310 of the Act or a cable television multiple system operator.

"(b) For purposes of this section:

"(1) The term 'national television network not otherwise subject to Section 310 of the Act,' means a person (including persons under common control) which offers an interconnected television program service on a regular basis for twenty-five (25) or more hours per week to at least twenty-five (25) affiliated television broadcast stations in ten (10) or more states and which is not otherwise subject to the alien ownership restrictions of Section 310 of the Act.

"(2) The term 'cable television multiple system operator' means a person (including persons under common control) which directly or indirectly operates or controls one or more cable television systems which, in the aggregate, serve no less than 250,000 subscribers.

"(3) The term 'cable television system' means a facility or combination of facilities which consist of a primary control center used to receive and retransmit, or to originate broadband telecommunications service over one or more coaxial cables, or other closed transmission media, from the primary control center to a point of reception at the premises of a cable subscriber.

"(c) The provisions of this section shall not apply to any officership, directorship, ownership, operation or control which would otherwise be prohibited by this section if such interest existed as of February 9, 1984; provided that such interest is not increased or transferred after February 9, 1984, to any individual or entity prohibited by this section from holding or exercising such interest, except that the cable television multiple system operator grandfathered under this subsection may expand service under existing franchises and may submit bids for new franchises if the bidding process has commenced as of February 9, 1984.

SEC. 2. That section 310(b)(4) of the Communications Act of 1934 is amended in its entirety to read as follows:

"(4) any corporation directly or indirectly controlled by any other corporation (i) of which more than one-fourth of the directors are aliens; or (ii) of which more than one-fourth of the capital stock is owned of record by aliens or their representatives, or by a foreign government or representatives thereof, or by any corporation organized under the laws of a foreign country or representatives thereof; or (iii) of which any officer is an alien, if the Commission finds that the public interest will be served by prohibiting such alien officership;"

SEC. 3. That section 310 of the Communications Act of 1934 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(e) The provisions of subsection 310(b)(4) shall not apply to any officership, directorship, ownership, operation or control which would otherwise be prohibited by this section if such interest existed as of February 9, 1984, and was permissible under subsection 310(b)(4) prior to February 9, 1984, provided that such interest is not increased or transferred after February 9, 1984, to any individual or entity prohibited by this section from holding or exercising such interest."

ANALYSIS OF THE BILL

Section 333 extends alien ownership restrictions presently applicable to certain broadcast station licenses to ownership of major national television networks not otherwise subject to Section 310 of the Act and large cable television multiple system operators (MSOs).

The definition of "national television network not otherwise subject to Section 310 of the Act" is intended to exclude the major television networks—ABC, CBS and NBC—now subject to Section 310 of the Act. None of the three major networks as now organized would fall within the parameters of new Section 333.

Due to the expansion of cable television service throughout the United States, citizens are also becoming more exposed to, and reliant on, information transmitted over cable systems. Cable television deserves no less protection from foreign influence than broadcast television or radio.

Exempted from the applicability of Section 333 are interests existing prior to the date of the bill's introduction and which were permissible under the current section 310(b)(4). This "grandfather" clause is intended to prevent undue disruption in the industry by adoption of the bill. For example, existing Canadian and other foreign ownership of U.S. cable systems would not be disturbed. However, the bill provides that "grandfathered" interests may not be increased by new bids or new applications not now pending, and first filed after the date of introduction. For example, an MSO may have elected prior to that date an officer who is an alien. Under Section 333, the officer may be retained; but he or she may not become an officer of another MSO, nor may additional or substitute alien officers be elected, after the date of introduction. Similarly, any foreign-owned MSO otherwise covered by the bill could continue to expand service under existing franchises or submit bids for new franchises if the bidding process had already commenced. "Grandfathered" levels of alien-owned capital stock shall not be increased after the date of introduction.

It is recognized that the degree of potential alien influence is dependent upon the number of citizens reached by a given foreign-owned cable operator. Section 33 therefore applies to MSOs serving more than 250,000 subscribers, the approximate number of households reached by a small-market television station. This restriction of applicability is intended to facilitiate detection of prohibited interests and to permit foreign investment in operators where the potential for influence is minimal.

Finally, the bill amends Section 310(b)(4) of the Communications Act. That Section now authorizes the Federal Communications Commission to permit alien officerships, directorships and ownership interests in parent companies of licensees above those specified by the provision if the public interest will be served thereby. It is intended that the Commission's discretion to permit interests greater than those specified in Section 310(b)(4) be retained only as to officerships. Section 310(e) is added as a "grandfather" clause to exempt from the provisions of amended Section 310(b)(4) officerships, directorships and levels of ownership obtained or applied for prior to the date of the bill's introduction.●

By Mr. MATHIAS:

S. 2283. A bill to provide for the public financing of general elections for the U.S. Senate, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

SENATE ELECTION CAMPAIGN FUND ACT OF 1984

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, I am introducing today a bill to provide partial public funding of Senate general election campaigns. It is similar to legislation that I have supported in the past and reflects my belief that public funding of congressional campaigns is essential to complete the task of campaign finance reform begun by Congress over a decade ago.

I introduce this bill because I continue to believe that the public financing of election campaigns offers the best means to remedy the ills of the current system. What I find troubling about the way we now finance elections is not simply the high-water mark set by recent campaign spending. It is the way in which the flood of campaign dollars has itself altered the process. Candidates and officeholders alike increasingly have had to devote themselves not to the interests of the voters but to the pursuit of campaign contributions.

Money alone does not win a campaign. But few campaigns today are won without it. The price tag of a successful Senate campaign rose 70 percent from 1980 to 1982, according to figures released by the Federal Election Commission. Overall spending in congressional campaigns rose from $239 million in 1980 to $342 million in 1982. If this rise continues, campaign spending in another few years will be off the charts.

What is the real cost of this vastly inflated role of money in the system? It is in the numbers of prospective candidates—talented and qualified men and women—who will choose not to run because of the difficulty in raising the kind of money it takes to run a competitive campaign. Ultimately the price is a system in which the qualification for higher office is a good direct mail list, a personal fortune, or an ability to appeal to narrow interests to bankroll a campaign, a system in which a candidate whose primary currency is a supply of good ideas will be unable to compete.

I am not suggesting and my bill does not propose that there is no role for individuals, political parties, or even the sometimes vilified political action committee in funding Federal campaigns. The bill would not limit their participation, except as it limits overall campaign spending. Those who choose to participate by giving directly to a candidate, or through a party, or PAC, should remain free to do so.

Candidates and officeholders, however, should also be given some measure of freedom from the incessant demands of campaign fundraising and freed from the resultant public perception that big money and special interests dominate campaign financing.

The bill I am introducing would provide a system of matching public funds to qualified Senate candidates in the general election campaign. Most importantly, it would limit overall campaign spending in the general election to $200,000 plus 16 cents times the voting age population of the State in which the election is held. To establish eligibility, a candidate would be required to raise the lesser of 20 percent of the applicable spending limit or $200,000. In raising this threshold amount and in qualifying for subsequent matching funds, only contributions of $100 or less from individuals, at least 80 percent of whom were residents of the candidate's State, would be taken into account. Finally, candidates who accepted public funding could not spend more than $35,000 of personal funds on the campaign.

I ask that the bill, a section-by-section analysis, and a brief summary be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2283

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Senate Election Campaign Fund Act of 1984".

SEC. 2. The Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new title:

"TITLE V—PUBLIC FINANCING OF SENATE GENERAL ELECTIONS CAMPAIGN

"DEFINITIONS

"SEC. 501. For purposes of this title—

"(1) the definitions set forth in section 301 of this Act apply to this title;

"(2) 'general election' means any regularly scheduled or special election held for the purpose of electing a candidate to the United States Senate;

"(3) 'eligible candidate' means a candidate who is eligible, under section 502, for payments under this title;

"(4) 'account' means the Senate General Election Campaign Account maintained by the Secretary of the Treasury in the Presidential Election Campaign Fund established by section 906(a) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954; and

"(5) 'authorized committee' means, with respect to any candidate for election to the United States Senate, any political committee which is authorized in writing by such candidate to accept contributions or make expenditures on behalf of such candidate to further the election of such candidate.

"ELIGIBILITY FOR PAYMENTS

"SEC. 502. (a) To be eligible to receive payments under this title, a candidate shall in writing agree—

"(1) to obtain and to furnish to the Commission any evidence it may request about his campaign expenditures and contributions;

"(2) to keep and to furnish to the Commission any records, books, and other information it may request; and

"(3) to an audit and examination by the Commission under section 507 and to pay any amounts required under section 507.

"(b) To be eligible to receive payments under this title, a candidate shall certify to the Commission that—

"(1) the candidate and his authorized committees will not make campaign expenditures greater than the limitations in section 315(b)(3) of this Act;

"(2) no contributions will be accepted by the candidate or his authorized committees in violation of section 315(a) of this Act;

"(3) the candidate is seeking election to the United States Senate, and he and his authorized committees have received contributions for that campaign in a total amount of not less than the smaller of—

"(A) 20 percent of the amount of expenditures the candidate may make in connection with the campaign under section 320(b)(3) of this Act, or

"(B) $200,000; and

"(4) at least two candidates have qualified for the election ballot for election to the same seat in the United States Senate under the law of the State involved.

"(c) Agreements, certifications, and declarations required by this section shall be filed at a time determined by the Commission but shall be submitted prior to a candidate's request for payments under section 505 for consideration in conjunction with the Commission's certification process.

"ENTITLEMENT TO PAYMENTS

"SEC. 503. (a) Every candidate who meets the eligibility requirements in section 502 is entitled to payments for use in his general election campaign in an amount equal to the amount of contributions he and his authorized committees receive for that campaign.

"(b) A candidate entitled to payments under subsection (a) shall be entitled to—

"(1) an initial payment in an amount equal to the contributions certified under section 502(b)(3); and

"(2) additional payments to be paid in—

"(A) multiples of $10,000 under section 506, if, with respect to each such payment, the eligible candidate and his authorized committees have received contributions aggregating $10,000; and

"(B) a final payment under section 506 (designated as such by the candidate involved) of the balance of the entitlement of the candidate under this section.

"(c) In determining the amount of contributions received by a candidate and his authorized committees for the purposes of subsection (a) of this section and section 502(b)(3)—

"(1) no contribution received by the candidate or any of his authorized committees as a subscription, loan, advance, deposit, or as a contribution of products or services, shall be taken into account;

"(2) no contribution received from a political committee or any other organization shall be taken into account;

"(3) no contribution received from any individual shall be taken into account to the extent that such contribution exceeds $100 when added to the amount of all other contributions made by that individual to or for the benefit of such candidate in connection with his general election campaign;

"(4) no contribution received from any individual who resides in a State other than the State in which the election is held shall be taken into account to the extent that such contribution when added to all other contributions received from such individuals exceeds 20 percent of the aggregate of contributions otherwise taken into account;

"(5) no contribution (A) which is received before September 1 of the year immediately preceding the year in which any general election is held and (B) which is not maintained in a separate account until the date on which such candidate qualifies under the law of the appropriate State for election, shall be taken into account; and no contribution maintained in such a separate account shall be used to make any expenditure until the date on which the candidate qualifies under the law of the appropriate State for election to the Senate; and

"(6) no contribution received after the date on which the election is held shall be taken into account.

"(d) Notwithstanding the provisions of subsection (a), no candidate is entitled to the payment of any amount under this section which, when added to the total amount of contributions received by him and his authorized committees and any other payments made to him under this title for his general election campaign, exceeds the amount of the expenditures limitation applicable to such candidate for that campaign under section 315(b)(3)(A) of this Act.

"WAIVER OF OVERALL EXPENDITURE LIMITATION; ADDITIONAL PUBLIC FINANCING FOR CERTAIN CANDIDATES

"SEC. 504. (a)(1) Not later than the date on which a candidate qualifies under the law of the appropriate State for election to the Senate of the United States or 90 days before the date of any general election, whichever is earlier, each candidate for election to the Senate of the United States shall file with the Commission a declaration of whether he intends to make expenditures in excess of the limitations on expenditures under section 315(b)(3) of this Act.

"(2) Not later than 60 days before the date of such general election, each candidate who has reason to believe that he may make expenditures in excess of such limitations shall notify the Commission to that effect, unless such candidate filed with the Commission a timely declaration that he intended to exceed such limitations, as provided in paragraph (1).

"(3) Each candidate for election to the Senate of the United States shall notify the Commission and each other candidate for the same election within 48 hours after he, or any of his authorized committees—

"(A) makes any expenditure, or incurs any obligation to make an expenditure, in excess of the limitation on expenditures contained in section 315(b)(3) of this Act; or

"(B) receives any contribution which, when added to the total amount of contributions received by him and his authorized committees, exceeds the amount of the limitation on expenditures contained in section 315(b)(3)(A) of this Act.

"(4) The Commission is authorized to determine, upon its own initiative or upon the request of any candidate for election to the Senate of the United States, whether any candidate has made expenditures or incurred obligations to make expenditures in excess of the limitations contained in section 315(b)(3) of the Act, or has received contributions in excess of the limitation contained in section 315(b)(3)(A) of this Act.

"(b) The limitation on expenditures contained in section 315(b)(3)(A) of this Act shall not apply to any candidate for election to the Senate of the United States if any other candidate in the same election—

"(1) fails to file with the Commission a timely declaration as provided in subsection (a)(1); or

"(2) files with the Commission a notice as provided in subsection (a)(2); or

"(3) is required to notify the Commission in connection with the making of expenditures or the receipt of contributions as provided in subsection (a)(3).

"(c)(1) Any person who makes independent expenditures, as defined in section 301(17) of this Act, or incurs costs of communication, required to be reported under section 301(7)(B)(iii) of this Act, shall notify the Commission not later than 48 hours after such person first makes such independent expenditures or incurs such costs of communication aggregating more than $5,000, and thereafter shall so notify the Commission each time such person makes any additional independent expenditure, or incurs any additional such cost of communication, aggregating $5,000 or more.

"(2) If, with respect to an election, independent expenditures, as defined in section 301(17) of this Act, are made, or costs of communication, required to be reported under section 301(9)(B)(iii) of this Act, are incurred, aggregating more than one-third of the limitation on expenditures in section 315(b)(3)(A) of this Act, the Commission shall, with respect to such election, suspend the limitation on expenditures established in such section 315(b)(3)(A) at the request of any candidate in such election who is eligible to receive payments under section 502, and who has received the benefit of no more than one-third of such independent expenditures or costs of communication.

"(d)(1) The provisions of section 503(d) shall not apply in the case of a candidate who elects to receive payments under this title with repect to whom the expenditure limitation contained in section 315(b)(3)(A) of this Act is made inapplicable under subsection (a), (b), or (c).

"(2) The additional amount to which a candidate is entitled under this subsection shall be based only upon the amount of contributions received after the date on which such expenditures limitation is made inapplicable, except that any contribution which is received from an individual after the date on which the limitation on expenditures is made inapplicable shall be considered as a contribution from an individual who has not previously made a contribution to such candidate.

"(3) The additional amount to which a candidate is entitled under this subsection shall not exceed 50 percent of the amount of the expenditure limitation under section 315(b)(3)(A) of this Act which would otherwise apply to such candidate.

"CERTIFICATIONS BY COMMISSION

"SEC. 505. (a) No later than 48 hours after a candidate files a request with the Commission to receive payments under section 506, the Commission shall certify the eligibility of such candidate to the Secretary of the Treasury for payment in full of the amount to which such candidate is entitled. The request referred to in the preceding sentence shall contain—

"(1) such information and be made in accordance with such procedures as the Commission may provide by regulation; and

"(2) a verification signed by the candidate and the treasurer of the principal campaign committee of such candidate stating that the information furnished in support of the request, to the best of their knowledge, is correct and fully satisfies the requirements of this title.

"(b) Initial certifications by the Commission under subsection (a), and all determinations made by it under this title, shall be final and conclusive, except to the extent that they are subject to examination and audit by the Commission under section 507 and judicial review under section 511.

"(c) Any candidate who knowingly and willfully submits false information to the Commission under this section shall be punished as provided in section 512.

"PAYMENTS TO ELIGIBLE CANDIDATES

"SEC. 506. (a) The Secretary of the Treasury shall maintain in the Presidential Election Campaign Fund established by section 9006(a) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, in addition to any other accounts he maintains under such section, a separate account to be known as the Senate General Election Campaign Account. The Secretary shall deposit into the account, for use by candidates eligible for payments under this title, the amount available after the Secretary determines that amounts in the fund necessary for payments under subtitle II of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 are adequate. The moneys in the account shall remain available without fiscal year limitation.

"(b) Upon receipt of a certification from the Commission under section 505, the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay out of the account the amount certified by the Commission to the candidate to whom the certification relates.

"(c) Payments received under this section shall be used only to defray election campaign expenses incurred with respect to the period beginning on the day after the date on which the candidate qualifies for the election ballot under the law of the State involved and ending on the date of the election, or the date on which the candidate withdraws from the campaign or otherwise ceases actively to seek election, whichever occurs first. Such payments shall not be used (1) to repay any loan to any person, or (2) to make any payments, directly or indirectly, to such candidate or to any member of the immediate family (as defined in section 315(b)(3)) of such candidate.

"(d)(1) If the Secretary of the Treasury determines that the moneys in the account are not, or may not be, sufficient to pay the full amount of entitlement to all candidates eligible to receive payments, he shall reduce the amount to which each candidate is entitled under section 503 by a percentage equal to the percentage obtained by dividing (A) the amount of money remaining in the account at the time of such determination by (B) the total amount which all candidates eligible to receive payments are entitled to receive under section 503. If additional candidates become eligible under section 502 after the Secretary determines there are insufficient moneys in the account, he shall make any further reductions in the amounts payable to all eligible candidates necessary to carry out the purposes of this subsection. The Secretary shall notify the Commission and each eligible candidate by registered mail of the reduction in the amount to which that candidate is entitled under section 503.

"(2) If, as a result of a reduction under this subsection in the amount to which an eligible candidate is entitled under section 503, payments have been made under this section in excess of the amount to which such candidate is entitled, that candidate is liable for repayment to the account of the excess under procedures the Commission shall prescribe by regulation.

"EXAMINATION AND AUDITS; REPAYMENTS

"SEC. 507 (a) After each Federal election, the Commission shall conduct a thorough examination and audit of the campaign expenditures of all candidates for Federal office who received payments under this title for use in campaigns relating to that election.

"(b)(1) If the Commission determines that any portion of the payments made to an eligible candidate under section 506 was in excess of the aggregate amount of the payments to which the candidate was entitled, it shall so notify that candidate, and he shall pay to the Secretary of the Treasury an amount equal to the excess amount.

"(2) If the Commission determines that a candidate who has received payments under section 506 for use in his campaign has campaign funds in excess of the amount of expenses for such campaign as allowed under section 506(c), the Commission shall so notify the candidate and he shall pay an amount equal to the amount of the unexpended portion to the Secretary. In making its determination under the preceding sentence, the Commission shall consider all amounts received as contributions to have been expended before any amounts received under this title are expended.

"(3) If the Commission determines that any amount of any payment made to a candidate under section 506 was used for any purpose other than to defray campaign expenditures, it shall notify the candidate of the amount so used, and the candidate shall pay to the Secretary of the Treasury an amount equal to such amount.

"(4) No payment shall be required from a candidate under this subsection for any election in excess of the total amount of all payments received by the candidate under section 506 in connection with such election.

"(c) No notification shall be made by the Commission under subsection (b) with respect to a campaign more than 18 months after the day of the election to which the campaign related.

"(d) All payments received by the Secretary under subsection (b) shall be deposited by him in the account.

"OTHER POWERS AND DUTIES OF THE COMMISSION

"SEC. 508. (a) The Commission is authorized to conduct examinations and audits (in addition to the examinations and audits under sections 505 and 507), to conduct investigations, and to require the keeping and submission of any books, records, or other information necessary to carry out the functions and duties imposed on it by this title.

"(b) The Commission shall consult from time to time with the Secretary of the Senate, the Clerk of the House of Representatives, the Federal Communications Commission, and other Federal officers charged with the administration of laws relating to Federal elections, in order to develop as much consistency and coordination with the administration of those other laws as the provisions of this title permit. The Commission shall use the same or comparable data as that used in the administration of such other election laws whenever possible.

"REPORTS TO CONGRESS

"SEC. 509. (a) The Commission shall, as soon as practicable after the close of each calendar year, submit a full report to the Senate setting forth—

"(1) the expenditures incurred by each candidate, and his authorized committees, who received any payment under section 506 in connection with an election;

"(2) the amounts certified by it under section 505 for payment to that candidate; and

"(3) the amount of payments, if any, required from that candidate under section 507, and the reasons for each payment required.

"(b) The Commission shall submit, not later than March 1 of each year immediately following a year in which any Federal election is held, a special report to the Senate setting forth—

"(1) the amounts certified by it under section 505 of this title and sections 9005, 9008, and 9036 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 for payments from the Presidential Election Campaign Fund;

"(2) the amount of money remaining in the fund at the end of the calendar year in which any Federal election is held;

"(3) an estimate of the amount of money which will be transferred to such fund during each of the four calendar years immediately following the year in which any Federal election is held; and

"(4) an estimate, to the extent practicable, of the amount of money necessary to make all payments to which eligible candidates and the national committees of each political party will entitled with respect to the next two Federal elections to be held.

"PARTICIPATION BY COMMISSION IN JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS

"SEC. 510. (a) The Commission is authorized to appear in and defend against any action filed under section 511, either by attorneys employed in its office or by counsel whom it may appoint without regard to the provisions of title 5, United States Code, governing appointments in the competitive service, and whose compensation it may fix without regard to the provisions of chapter 51 and subchapter III of chapter 53 of such title.

"(b) The Commission is authorized to appear, through attorneys and counsel described in subsection (a), in the district courts and other appropriate courts of the United States to seek recovery of any amounts determined to be payable to the Secretary of the Treasury as a result of examination and audit made pursuant to section 507.

"(c) The Commission is authorized to petition, through attorneys and counsel described in subsection (a), the courts of the United States for declaratory or injunctive relief concerning any civil matter arising under this title. Upon application of the Commission, an action brought pursuant to this subsection shall be heard and determined by a court of three judges in accordance with the provisions of section 2284 of title 28, United States Code, and any appeal from the determination of such court shall lie to the Supreme Court of the United States. Judges designated to hear the case shall assign the case for hearing at the earliest practicable date, participate in the hearing and determination thereof, and cause the case to be in every way expedited.

"(d) The Commission is authorized on behalf of the United States to appeal from, and to petition the Supreme Court of the United States for certiorari to review, judgments or decrees entered with respect to actions in which it appears pursuant to the authority provided in this section.

"JUDICIAL REVIEW

"SEC. 511. (a) Any certification, determination, or other action by the Commission made or taken pursuant to the provisions of this title shall be subject to review by the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit upon petition filed in such court by any interested person. Any petition filed pursuant to this section shall be filed within thirty days after such certification, determination, or other action by the Commission.

"(b)(1) The Commission, the national committee of any political party, and any individual eligible to vote for Senator of the United States are authorized to institute an action under this section, including an action for declaratory judgement or injuctive relief, as may be appropriate to implement or construe any provision of this title.

"(2) The district courts of the United States shall have jurisdiction of proceedings instituted pursuant to this subsection and shall exercise such jurisdiction without regard to whether a person asserting rights under the provisions of this subsection shall have exhausted administrative or other remedies provided at law. Such proceedings shall be heard and determined by a court of three judges, in accordance with the provisions of section 2284 of title 28, United States Code, and any appeal shall lie to the Supreme Court of the United States. Judges designated to hear the case shall assign the case for hearing at the earliest practicable date, participate in the hearing and determination thereof, and cause the case to be in every way expedited.

"PENALTY FOR VIOLATIONS

"SEC. 512. Violation of any provision of this title is punishable by a fine of not more than $10,000, or imprisonment for not more than 5 years, or both.".

LIMITATIONS ON EXPENDITURES IN SENATE GENERAL ELECTION CAMPAIGNS

SEC. 3. (a) Section 315(b) of the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971 (2 U.S.C. 441 a(b)) is amended—

(1) by striking out "and" at the end of paragraph (2)((A);

(2) by striking out the period at the end of paragraph (2)(B) and inserting in lieu thereof a semicolon and "and"; and

(3) by adding at the end of paragraph (2) the following:

"(C) expenditures made on behalf of any candidate (as determined under subparagraph (B)) for the office of Senator of the United States shall be considered to be expenditures made by such candidate.

"(3)(A) Except as otherwise provided in section 504 of this Act, a candidate who receives payments under section 506 of this Act for use in his general election campaign for the office of Senator of the United States may not make expenditures in such campaign in excess of $200,000, plus 16 cents multipled by the voting age population (as certified under subsection (e) of the State in which the election is held.

"(B) For purposes of the limitation on expenditures contained in subparagraph (A) only that percentage of an expenditure by a candidate or his authorized political committees for broadcasting time which represents the cost to such candidate or committees of transmitting the material broadcast to the State in which such candidate is seeking election shall be taken into account.

"(C) A candidate who receives payments under section 506 of this Act for use in his general election capaign for the office of Senator of the United States may not make expenditures in such campaign in excess of $35,000 from his personal funds or from the personal funds of his immediate family. For the purposes of this subsection, the term 'immediate family' means a candidate's spouse, and any child, parent, grandparent, brother, half-brother, sister, or half-sister of the candidate, and the spouses of such persons.".

(b) Section 315(c)(2)(B) of such Act (2 U.S.C. 441a(c)(2)(B)) is amended by inserting immediately before the period a comma and "except that with respect to the limitation established by subsection (b)(3) the term 'base period' means the calendar year 1984".

EFFECTIVE DATE

SEC. 4. The amendments made by this Act apply to any campaign for election to the United States Senate for which the election is held after December 31, 1984.

AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS

SEC. 5. There is authorized to be appropriated to the Federal Election Commission such sums as may be necessary for the purposes of carrying out the provisions of this Act during the fiscal year ending September 30, 1986.

SECTION BY SECTION ANALYSIS—"SENATE ELECTION CAMPAIGN FUND ACT OF 1984"

This bill would provide for partial public financing of candidates for the United States Senate in their general election campaigns. The Federal Election Campaign Act in amendment by adding a new title: "Title V, Public Financing of Senate General Election Campaigns."

Section 1 provides that the Act may be cited as the "Senate Election Campaign Fund Act of 1984".

Section 2 adds at the end of the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971, as amended, a new Title V entitled "Public Financing of Senate General Election Campaigns" which contains the following provisions:

Section 501 adopts the definitions contained in 2 U.S.C. 431 with the following additions:

"General election" means any regulatory scheduled or special election held to elect an individual to the U.S. Senate.

An "eligible candidate" is one who has made the necessary agreements regarding spending limits, certifications on funds raised and declarations of personal liability and other declarations on which eligibility depends under section 502.

"Account" refers to the Senate Campaign Account, which would be created as a part of the Presidential Election Campaign Fund.

Section 502 sets out the requirements for a candidate to become eligible: He must agree to furnish evidence about campaign expenditures and contributions; to keep and furnish records and to an audit by the Commission and to repay any funds required under section 507. The candidate and his authorized committee also must certify that campaign expenditures will be limited to amounts no greater than $200,000 plus 16 cents times the state's voting age population; that no contributions will be accepted greater than the limits of 2 U.S.C. 441a; that no less than $200,000 or 20 per cent of the applicable spending limit, whichever is smaller, has been raised in contributions of $100 or less from individuals and that he and at least one other candidate have qualified for the ballot for election to the Senate in his State.

Section 503 provides that an eligible candidate will be entitled to receive an initial matching payment in an amount equal to the matchable contributions certified and additional matching payments in multiples of $10,000 and a final payment in the amount of the balance of his entitlement.

Under Section 503(c) the following types of contributions will not be matched:

(1) a subscription, loan, advance, deposit or a contribution of products or services; (2) a contribution from any organization or political committee; (3) a contribution from an individual in excess of $100; (4) a contribution from an individual residing in a state other than the state in which the election is held to the extent such contributions exceed 20 percent of the aggregate contributions which are matchable; (5) a contribution received before the September 1 of the year prior to the election and any contribution which is not kept in a separate account until the date the candidate qualifies for election; this paragraph also prohibits the making of any expenditures from a separate account before the candidate qualifies for election; (6) a contribution received after election day.

Section 503(d) precludes a candidate from receiving any matching payment, which counting other contributions and payments would exceed the amount of the expenditure limit.

Section 504 requires the filing by all candidates, including those who do not receive public funds, of declarations of intentions on making expenditures above the limits set for publicly funded candidates and subsequent notices as the campaign progresses. Section 504(a) authorizes the Federal Election Commission to determine on its own initiative or at any complying candidate's request whether any candidate has received contributions or made expenditures above the limits.

Section 504(b) authorizes the removal of a candidate's expenditure ceiling if an opponent either fails to file the declaration of intentions or declares an intention to spend more than the limit or actually exceeds the limit either in expenditures or the amount of contributions received.

Section 504(c) authorizes the Federal Election Commission at the request of a complying candidate to remove the expenditure ceiling if, in that election, independent expenditures are made or the costs of reportable communications are incurred, exceeding one-third of the candidate's expenditure limit. Section 504(d) allows contributions to be matched with additional public funds in excess of the spending limit but they may not be in amounts of more than 50% of the spending limit. An individual who has already contributed $100 to a candidate may contribute an additional $100 which will be matched when the limit has been removed.

Section 505 describes the certification procedure by the Federal Election Commission for eligible and qualified candidates. Within forty-eight hours after a candidate's request for payments has been received the FEC must act on that request. Initial certifications are final except of the audit provisions found in section 507 and the judicial review sections of section 510. A knowing and willful submission of false information is subject to the penalty provisions contained in section 511.21Section 506 establishes the procedure for the Secretary of the Treasury to provide matching payments to eligible candidates certified by the FEC. The Senate Campaign Fund Account will be established within the Presidential Election Campaign Fund which contains the tax check-off funds. No public funds are to be made available to the Senate General Election Campaign Account until the Secretary has determined that sufficient monies are available in the fund to finance Presidential primary candidates, the political party nominating conventions and Presidential general election candidates. Payments may only be used by a Senate candidate to defray general election campaign expenses incurred from the day after a candidate qualifies until the day of the election or the date of withdrawal or cessation of activity in seeking election. No matching payments may be used to repay loans or to make payments to the candidate or the family of the candidate. Section 506(d) provides for an equitable reduction in all candidate entitlements when funds are not sufficient to cover all certifications.

Section 507 covers the audit and examination of all candidates receiving public funds by the FEC. If any candidate has received an overpayment, an equal amount of funds shall be returned to the Treasury. If the Commission determines that a candidate has funds which are excess to the campaign expenses allowed, the candidate is required to pay the amount of the unexpended portion. In making the determination all contributions will be considered as expended before any matching payments have been expended. Repayment is also required of any funds not used to defray campaign expenditures. No repayment may be required more than 18 months after the election. Funds repaid will be deposited into the Senate General Election Campaign Account.

Section 508 provides the Commission with additional authority to conduct the examinations and audits and investigations and to require the keeping of books and records necessary to carry out the new functions and duties of Title V.

Section 509 requires the Commission to submit to the Senate after each calendar year a report on the expenditures incurred by each candidate, the amount of certifications and repayments. A special report is required no later than March 1 of the year following a federal election showing the amount of funds certified to all federal candidates and national committees, together with estimates of amounts which will be transferred to the Presidential Election Campaign Fund in each of the next four years and the amounts that will be needed to make all payments.

Section 510 sets out the procedures for judicial review of the Commission's actions. Any interested party may file a petition for review of any Commission certification, determination or other action within 30 days thereafter in the Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit.

Also, the Commission, the national committees and any individual voter may bring an action in federal district court to implement or construe any provision of this Title, including actions for declaratory or injunctive relief. Such actions are to be heard by three-judge panels with appeals to the Supreme Court.

Section 511 provides that any violation of any provision of this Title is punishable by a fine of not more than $10,000 or imprisonment for not more than five years, or both.

Section 512 seeks to establish consistency and coordination among federal agencies invovled in administering aspects of the campaign act.

Section 3 sets out the expenditure ceilings for candidates for Senate elections.

The publicly funded candidate's expenditure ceiling is limited to $200,000 plus 16 cents times the voting age population of the candidate's state. No more than $35,000 may be spent from a candidate's personal funds or those of his or her immediate family. The expenditure ceiling may be increased each year by the increase in the consumer price index, with the year 1984 serving as the base year for such determination.

Section 4 states that these amendments will apply to any Senate election campaign held after December 31, 1984.

Section 5 authorizes such sums as may be necessary for the FEC for purposes of administering this Title during the 1986 fiscal year.

SUMMARY OF LEGISLATION PROVIDING PUBLIC FINANCING FOR SENATE GENERAL ELECTION CAMPAIGNS

1. Purpose: To provide partial public financing and impose expenditure limitations in Senate general elections beginning in 1986.

2. Establishing Eligibility: A candidate is eligible to receive matching public funds if the following conditions are met—

a. He and at least one other candidate have qualified for the election ballot for election to the same United States Senate seat,

b. He agrees to abide by an expenditure limit equal to $200,000 plus $.16 times the voting age population in his state,

c. He has raised the lesser of $200,000 or 20 percent of the expenditure limit in contributions of $100 or less received from individuals, at least 80 percent of which are from residents of the candidate's state, and

d. He agrees not to expend more than $35,000 of his personal funds or the funds of his immediate family.

3. Certification of Eligibility: The Federal Election Commission must certify a candidate's eligibility to receive payments within 48 hours of his request.

4. Recordkeeping and Audits: A candidate must keep records and furnish any evidence of his contributions and expenditures which the Commission may request.

The Commission will conduct an audit of the campaign expenditures of all candidates who receive public funds.

5. Lifting of Expenditure Limits: The expenditure limits are waived if any of the following occurs:

a. A candidate fails to file with the Commission a declaration of whether he intends to abide by the expenditure limitations either on or before the day he qualifies for the ballot or 90 days before the election, whichever is earlier.

b. A candidate who originally filed a declaration stating his intention to abide by the expenditure limit notifies the Commission that he has reason to believe he may exceed it.

c. A candidate makes expenditures or incurs obligations to make expenditures in excess of the expenditure limit or receives aggregate contributions which exceed the expenditure limit.

d. Independent expenditures and the cost of communications required to be reported under the Act exceed one-third of the expenditure limits and an eligible candidate who has received the benefit of no more than one-third of such expenditures or costs requests the Commission to suspend the expenditure limitations.

6. Restrictions on the Use of Public Funds: Public funds may only be used for those election campaign expenses incurred after the date a candidate qualifies for the ballot through the date of the election.

Public funds may not be used to repay any loan or to make any payments, directly or indirectly, to a candidate or to members of his immediate family.

7. Repayments: A candidate assumes personal liability to repay amounts received under the Act if the Commission determines he received amounts to which he was not entitled, or if the Commission determines that any public funds were spent for any purpose other than to defray campaign expenses.

The Commission must notify a candidate of any liability for repayment within 18 months of the date of the election.

8. Source of Public Funds: Funding would come from the Presidential Election Campaign Fund established by the $1 check-off on Federal income tax forms.

By Mr. DURENBERGER (for himself, Mr. ARMSTRONG, and Mr. GRASSLEY):

S. 2284. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to provide that the standard mileage rate for use of a passenger automobile which may be used in computing the charitable contribution deduction shall be the same as the standard mileage rate which may be used in computing the business expense deduction; to the Committee on Finance.

VOLUNTEER MILEAGE LEGISLATION

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, volunteers make invaluable and tireless contributions to the betterment of our society, but are seldom recognized for their services. Today Senator ARMSTRONG and I are introducing legislation which recognizes the high cost of operating an automobile when performing volunteer services and provides a realistic tax deduction for those costs.

Present law operates as a disincentive to volunteers who utilize their automobiles when performing volunteer activities. Currently they may only deduct a standard mileage rate of 9 cents per mile or, they may deduct their actual unreimbursed expenses, such as gas, oil, tolls, and parking fees. They cannot recover the substantial costs of depreciation, insurance, or repairs.

The 9 cent per mile rate bears little resemblance to the cost of operating a car. It is my understanding that when the deduction was originally enacted, in 1958, it was 7 cents a mile and, in the high inflation years that have ensued, it has only been increased 2 cents per mile. The present 9 cent allowance is totally out of touch with soaring gasoline prices and the other high costs of operating an automobile.

The bill we are introducing today would permit volunteers to take the same deduction for the use of their cars that individuals are allowed to deduct for unreimbursed business mileage expenses. The current allowable rate is 20 cents per mile.

Even with an increased deduction of 20 cents per mile, volunteers will not be fully compensated for the expense of operating their automobiles. Hertz recently estimated that the cost of operating a new car for 5 years, driving 10,000 miles per year, is 45.5 cents per mile. Assuming we increase the mileage deduction, volunteers will still be required to contribute over half the cost of operating their cars.

I firmly believe that the private sector is willing and ready to take on the many tasks facing us as a nation, and to provide needed services at the national, State, local, and neighborhood level. We have recognized the cost of doing business and provided for it with the business mileage deduction. But we have not given the same recognition to the voluntary sector or the value of their contributions. Our bill is a recognition, at least in part, of the important contributions of time and effort made by millions of Americans.

A 1981 Gallup survey estimated that 31 percent of Americans volunteer on a regular, active basis of 2 or more hours per week. Ten percent of adults averaged 7 or more hours of volunteer activity a week. Another study estimated the value of the volunteers activities in fiscal year 1981 at $64.5 billion. If the Federal Government had performed these services instead of volunteers, the Federal deficit would have more than doubled. These volunteer hours greatly enhance the money given to charity. Numerous studies have shown that the value of a dollar given to a charitable organization is multiplied three or four times through the efforts of volunteers.

The change Senator ARMSTRONG and I are proposing, on the Federal level, is long overdue. Several States have taken the lead on this issue and have already enacted higher deductions in their tax systems.

Mr. President, one of the most exciting and challenging opportunities we are going to face as a nation in the next decade is in the area of service delivery. It will also be one of the most difficult tasks not because we lack the ability and creativity to design and encourage alternative delivery systems, but because we are not offering the right incentives. We are not sending a signal that says we trust and recognize that the private sector can deliver needed public services.

This bill will send the right signal to millions of America's volunteers. It is time we act. I urge my colleagues to give this bill early consideration.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the legislation be included in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2284

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) section 170 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to charitable, etc., contributions and gifts) is amended by redesignating subsections (h) and (i) as subsections (i) and (j), respectively, and by inserting after subsection (g) the following new subsection:

"(h) STANDARD MILEAGE RATE FOR USE OF PASSENGER AUTOMOBILE.—If the Secretary prescribes by regulation a standard mileage rate which may be used to compute for the taxable year the deduction under section 162 for use of a passenger automobile, such standard mileage rate may be used to compute for such year the deduction under this section for use of a passenger automobile.".

(b) The amendments made by subsection (a) shall apply to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1983.

By Mr. BIDEN:

S. 2285. A bill to amend the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 to limit the period for which the enactment of new budget authority may be authorized, and for other purposes; pursuant to the order of August 4, 1977, referred jointly to the Committee on the Budget and the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

S. 2286. A bill to amend the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 to require authorizing legislation for tax expenditures, and for other purposes; pursuant to the order of August 4, 1977, referred jointly to the Committee on the Budget and the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

BUDGET LEGISLATION

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, I am introducing today two bills that will improve the Federal budget process and prevent deficits of the magnitude we are experiencing today from recurring. These bills will require a periodic review of Federal spending programs and impose controls over the creation of tax loopholes.

The specter of deficits as far as the eye can see has shocked and angered the American people. As these bills are being introduced, the President has proposed a budget that will produce, he says, a deficit of $180 billion in fiscal year 1985. While the President predicts that deficits will fall to $123 billion in 5 years, others suggest they may rise to something on the order of $250 billion. Deficits of the magnitude of either extreme are the height of fiscal irresponsibility and are unacceptable.

What are we to do about such a situation? Clearly we should take immediate action to decrease spending and increase revenues. I have supported such actions and I will support them again. My proposals in these bills today cannot make deficits of $250 billion disappear overnight. But once we take the actions necessary to reverse the unwise decisions of past years, we must put in place mechanisms, like those proposed in these bills, that can prevent such decisions from being made again.

There are many proposals today aimed at increasing control over the budget. Some of them are extreme, involving even constitutional amendments. Others are simply unworkable. Some would be welcome additions to our arsenal in the fight for fiscal responsibility. But I believe it is safe to say that none will do more to improve permanent control over the Federal budget than the two I am proposing today.

THE FEDERAL SPENDING CONTROL ACT OF 1984

Mr. President, the first bill I am introducing today is what has come to be known as sunset legislation. I am a longtime supporter and advocate of sunset. I introduced my first sunset bill in 1975. The opposition of special interests has prevented its enactment to date. However, I believe that those special interests are now coming to realize that opposition to spending controls is self-defeating.

This bill offers an effective means of controlling Federal spending without sacrificing essential Federal services. It should actually enhance the provision of truly necessary Government services. Waste makes no useful contribution toward meeting national needs.

The essence of sunset is simplicity itself—to require the periodic termination and reconsideration of spending programs.

The bill I am introducing today goes back to basics. No new spending program could run for more than 4 years. Most existing spending programs would have to conform to the 4-year rule—social security is a major exception. There is a waiver process to deal with problems where 4 years is clearly too short a period to achieve measurable results or where the stability of national commitments could be called into question. As each program's funding is scheduled to expire, there would be the usual opportunity for review by the appropriate committee. Then the Senate, and the House of Representatives, would vote on whether to continue the program, or modify it, or terminate it. The possibility of termination will force a review of each spending program. And the review will assure that the decision to terminate or not will be a rational one. It is really a very simple mechanism—like all good mechanisms.

In the past, Congress has not done well at providing cost-effective programs tailored to meet urgent needs. Instead, it has often tried to overwhelm problems with a multitude of programs. That approach seldom works and it is always expensive. As we move today to place immediate restraints on Federal spending, we must also move to take greater command over Federal programs and Federal spending in the future.

Without sunset, we may be doomed to repeat today's economic and fiscal problems in the next decade, or perhaps sooner. The need to adopt responsible, workable approaches to Federal spending is clear. I believe that Congress is now ready to put its fiscal house in order.

THE TAX EXPENDITURE CONTROL ACT OF 1984

Mr. President, the second bill I am introducing today is "The Tax Expenditure Control Act of 1984."

Every American knows that the Tax Code is riddled with unfair provisions: Tax loopholes and tax shelters whose only use is tax avoidance; tax subsidies that benefit the few; and tax incentives that have outlived their usefulness.

In these days of ever-escalating deficits, Congress' attention has turned to these so-called tax expenditures. To the extent that these special exemptions from paying taxes can be repealed, the deficits can be narrowed at no cost to the average taxpayers who does not benefit from many of these tax expenditures.

But attention is still not focused on preventing the creation of new tax loopholes and subsidies. Or, for that matter, on a regular review of the more than $350 billion in lost revenues each year from existing tax expenditures.

The stumbling block to achieving better control over tax expenditures is that Congress has no system for dealing with them effectively.

They are often passed as obscure provisions in larger tax bills. The tax law does not state the objectives of a tax expenditure, which would permit a measurement of its effectiveness. There is no integration of tax expenditures with direct spending programs with similar purposes. Once adopted they usually remain effective forever, with no periodic review.

Therefore, better scrutiny of tax expenditures can become an important tool in our efforts to achieve efficiency and economy in the use of Federal funds. A regular examination of tax expenditures should help to assure that our various tax expenditures programs are working in consonance. It will make it possible for Congress to review the equity of these tax programs and to consider their effectiveness in achieving national policy goals.

What can the Congress do in an orderly efficient manner to regain control over tax expenditure programs that show individual costs which will total some $350 billion?

In this $350 billion is buried many a program which affects the economy of our Nation, the deficit to our budget and the well-being of our citizens. Some of them work well; others may not.

Also hidden among these tax expenditures are subsidies to individuals and corporations that might never be granted if direct payments were being made. It is in this budget that many of the often-abused tax loopholes reside. The results achieved through the use of some tax expenditures could be in direct contradiction to the results sought through other directly appropriated funds.

Mr. President, I believe that, considering the magnitude of the sums involved, the Congress should begin immediately to consider what possible actions it might take to assure control of the use of tax expenditures. That is the purpose of the Tax Expenditure Control Act of 1984.

Briefly stated, my bill recognizes tax expenditures for what they are. It considers them, in fact, to be Government spending through the tax system, but without the usual controls that are attached to direct expenditures. Specifically, these tax expenditure programs are not reviewed by the committees that would normally oversee the activity with which the tax expenditure is associated.

On the appropriations side, we have a system of checks and balances. There, the legislative committee with jurisdiction over the subject and with the expertise on the subject, develops authorizing legislation. Only after that authorizing legislation has been adopted do the Appropriations Committees apply their fiscal expertise to weigh priorities and develop appropriation bills. Most important the Appropriations Committees apply that expertise in the framework of legislative policy set down by the Congress.

There is no such system for tax expenditures—no equivalent to the authorization process that is used for appropriated funds. The tax law does not state the objectives of the law. The Congress does not consider, in light of recommendations from committees with specialized information, the content of the programs which are to be financed by tax expenditures. Nor does it consider the integration of tax expenditures with direct spending.

This bill, the Tax Expenditure Control Act, would require authorizing legislation for each tax expenditure. Authorizing legislation would be referred to the standing committee normally responsible for the activity covered by the tax expenditure. The Ways and Means and Finance Committees would continue to be charged with the responsibility for using their expertise to develop the appropriate tax mechanisms for best carrying out the programs authorized by Congress, as well as for developing revenue-raising measures.

The Tax Expenditure Control Act would limit the life of legislation authorizing tax expenditures to 10 years. Since eventually all tax expenditures would be subject to the new authorizing process, all tax expenditures would become subject to a sunset review process at least once every 10 years.

In these days, direct Government spending programs are coming under more careful, periodic review. A periodic review and reconsideration of the subsidies, preferences and incentives in the tax system is as important as a review of direct spending programs. To the extent that one individual's tax is forgiven or reduced, the taxes of the others must rise—or else the deficit must rise. In these times of fiscal strain, anything that causes the deficit to rise must not be overlooked. It is important, therefore, that we look periodically to see what we are getting for our tax expenditure dollars.

I think the advantages of such a system will be many. It will provide for better coordination of tax and budget expenditure programs because they will each be reviewed and authorized by the same committee. It will also require more careful and deliberate consideration of tax expenditure policy because Congress will be required to consider each tax expenditure as a Government program, and make a conscious decision as to whether it is a good program for the country. These questions tend to get lost when the subject is presented in tax language.

Tax expenditures are not necessarily bad. That is the last thing that my remarks or my bill are intended to imply. But just like Federal spending programs, the tax laws can become a haven for unwise subsidies, undeserved preferences and unneeded incentives that manage to escape regular scrutiny and consideration. I do hope that this legislation will stimulate thought and discussion among my colleagues on this $350 billion question.

Mr. President, the economy of this country cannot long tolerate the kind of deficits that are being talked about today. We must act to eliminate them and to be certain that they never return. I hope that Congress is ready to act this year on a variety of deficit-fighting measures, including these two bills that I am introducing today.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of these two bills be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the bills were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2285

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Federal Spending Control Act of 1984".

SEC. 2. (a) Title IV of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sections:

"LIMITATIONS ON AUTHORIZING LEGISLATION; AUTHORIZATIONS REQUIRED

"SEC. 405. (a) TIME PERIOD PRESCRIBED.—Except as provided in subsection (c), it shall not be in order in either the Senate or the House of Representatives to consider any bill or resolution, or any amendment thereto, which authorizes the enactment of new budget authority for a program for a period of more than four fiscal years or for an indefinite period.

"(b) AUTHORIZATION REQUIRED.—It shall not be in order in either the Senate or the House of Representatives to consider any bill or resolution or any amendment thereto which provides new budget authority for a program for any fiscal year beginning after two years after the effective date of this section, unless the provision of such new budget authority is specifically authorized by law.

"(c) WAIVER IN THE SENATE.—If any committee of the Senate determines that an authorization of the enactment of new budget authority for a period in excess of four fiscal years is necessary to accomplish the purposes for which the authorization is to be made, the committee may report a bill or resolution authorizing the enactment of new budget authority for a definite period in excess of four fiscal years. At the same time or after the committee reports such bill or resolution, the committee shall report a resolution to the Senate providing for a waiver of the provisions of subsection (a) which limit the authorization of the enactment of new budget authority to a period not in excess of four fiscal years and stating the reasons why such a waiver is necessary. The resolution shall be referred and considered in accordance with section 407.

"TERMINATION OF CERTAIN EXISTING AUTHORIZATIONS

"SEC. 406. (a) LIMITATION ON THE PROVISION OF NEW BUDGET AUTHORITY.—Except as provided in subsections (b) and (c), it shall not be in order in either the Senate or the House of Representatives to consider a bill or resolution providing new budget authority for any fiscal year beginning after the date which is five years after the effective date of this section if the provision of such budget authority is made pursuant to a law, in effect on the effective date of this section, authorizing the enactment of new budget authority for a period of more than four fiscal years or for an indefinite period.

"(b) EXCEPTIONS.—Subsection (a) shall not apply to the provision of new budget authority for—

"(1) payments to or from a trust fund established by the Social Security Act;

"(2) payments of interest on obligations constituting a part of the public debt of the United States; or

"(3) payments of refunds of internal revenue collections, but subsection (a) shall apply to new budget authority provided for payment of that portion of any tax refund of a taxpayer for any taxable period which exceeds the greater of—

"(A) such taxpayer's liability for payment of tax for such taxable period, or

"(B) the total amount of tax payments made by such taxpayer for such taxable period.

"(c) WAIVER IN THE SENATE.—If the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate determines that subsection (a) should not apply to a bill or resolution providing new budget authority for a particular program, the committee shall report a resolution to the Senate providing for a waiver of such subsection with respect to the consideration of such bill or resolution and stating the reasons why the waiver is necessary. The resolution shall be referred and considered in accordance with section 407.

"PROCEDURES FOR THE CONSIDERATION OF WAIVER RESOLUTIONS IN THE SENATE

"SEC. 407. (a) REFERRAL AND DISCHARGE.—Any resolution reported under section 405(c) or 406(c) shall be jointly referred to the Committees on Appropriations and the Budget of the Senate. Each such committee shall report such resolution to the Senate within ten days after the resolution is referred to it (not counting any day on which the Senate is not in session) beginning with the day following the day on which it is so referred, accompanied by that committee's recommendations and reasons for such recommendations with respect to the resolution. If either committee does not report the resolution within such ten-day period, it shall automatically be discharged from further consideration of the resolution and the resolution shall be placed on the calendar.

"(b) CONSIDERATION OF RESOLUTION.—During the consideration of any such resolution, debate shall be limited to one hour, to be equally divided between, and controlled by, the majority leader and minority leader or their designees, and the time on any debatable motion or appeal shall be limited to twenty minutes, to be equally divided between, and controlled by, the mover and the manager of the resolution. In the event the manager of the resolution is in favor of any such motion or appeal, the time in opposition thereto shall be controlled by the minority leader or his designee. Such leaders, or either of them, may, from the time under their control on the passage of such resolution, allot additional time to any Senator during the consideration of such debatable motion or appeal. No amendment to the resolution is in order.

"(c) EFFECT OF ADOPTION OF RESOLUTION.—If, after both committees have reported (or have been discharged from further consideration of) a resolution waiving the application of section 405 (a) or 406 (a) with respect to the consideration of a bill or resolution, the Senate agrees to the resolution by a rollcall vote, section 405 (a) or 406 (a), as the case may be, shall not apply with respect to the consideration of the bill or resolution to which the resolution so agreed to applies.

"(d) OVERSIGHT PLAN REQUIRED.—Whenever any bill or resolution is reported by a committee under the provisions of section 405 (a), or a resolution is reported by the Committee on Appropriations under the provisions of section 406 (c), the report accompanying such bill or resolution shall contain a plan for oversight hearings by the committee to determine progress being made toward the intended objectives of the program with which the bill or resolution is concerned.".

(b) The table of contents in subsection (b) of the first section of the Congressional Budget and Impoundment Control Act of 1974 is amended by inserting after the item relating to section 404 the following new items:

"Sec. 405. Limitations on authorizing legislation; authorizations required.
"Sec. 406. Termination of certain existing authority.
"Sec. 407. Procedures for the consideration of waiver resolutions in the Senate.".

EFFECTIVE DATE

SEC. 3. This Act and the amendment made by this Act shall take effect on the first day of the first regular session of the Congress which begins after the date of the enactment of this Act.

S. 2286

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Tax Expenditure Control Act of 1984".

SEC. 2. Title IV of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"AUTHORIZING LEGISLATION FOR TAX EXPENDITURES

"SEC. 405. (a) AUTHORIZATION REQUIREMENT.—It shall not be in order in either the House of Representatives or the Senate to consider any bill or resolution, or any amendment to a bill or resolution, which, directly or indirectly, enacts new tax expenditures unless such enactment is authorized by law.

"(b) REQUIRED REPORTING DATE.—It shall not be in order in either the House of Representatives or the Senate to consider any bill or resolution which, directly or indirectly, authorized the enactment of new tax expenditures to become effective during a fiscal year—

"(1) unless that bill or resolution is reported in the House or the Senate, as the case may be, on or before May 15 preceding the beginning of such fiscal year, and

"(2) if that bill or resolution authorizes the enactment of new tax expenditures to be effective during a period exceeding 10 consecutive calendar years.

"(c) REFERENCE.—A bill or resolution authorizing the enactment of new tax expenditures shall be referred to the committee of the House of Representatives or the Senate, as the case may be, which has jurisdiction over the activity which such new tax expenditure is intended to affect.

"(d) WAIVER IN THE SENATE.—The provisions of section 402(c) shall apply to the waiver of subsection (b)(1) of this section with respect to any bill or resolution to which such subsection applies.

"(e) NEW TAX EXPENDITURES.—For purposes of this section, the term 'new tax expenditures' means the enactment of a tax expenditure or the increase of an existing tax expenditure.".

SEC. 3. The amendment made by section 2 of this Act shall take effect on the first day of the first regular session of the Ninety-ninth Congress.

SEC. 4. Any tax expenditure enacted before the date of enactment of this Act shall be repealed on the earlier of—

(1) the termination date of such tax expenditure, or

(2) December 31, 1994.

PETROLEUM CONSUMER OVERCHARGE RESTITUTION ACT OF 1984

● Mr. PELL. Mr. President, the administration has announced it will submit to Congress legislation that would dramatically change the Department of Energy process of restitution for those consumers overcharged for the fuel bills in the 1970's.

According to the fiscal year 1985 budget message submitted to Congress, the proposed legislation would establish a petroleum overcharge restitution fund and turn over to a special account within the Department of Health and Human Services several hundred million dollars in funds collected from oil companies as a result of price control violations.

From this account the Congress would appropriate money for energy conservation and assistance programs, including low-income home heating assistance, programs for home weatherization, and energy grants to schools and hospitals.

On the surface this proposal would appear commendable. In fact, however, the proposal would amount to a seizure by the Federal Government of funds held in trust for consumers who were overcharged. The Federal Government would then use these consumer funds to pay the costs of programs previously supported by general revenue taxpayer funds.

In effect, the administration has spotted a pot of money collected from oil companies who illegally overcharged their customers and decided to use that money for existing energy programs despite the clear intent of the Congress to support those energy programs from general revenues.

The net result of the administration proposal is the use of consumer funds with no added benefit to consumers. The cost of these energy programs is simply shifted from general revenues of the Treasury to the consumers who were short-changed.

The Congress, in fact, has already made known its view of this idea. A year ago, the Congress directed that $200 million in oil overcharge funds be made available to the States for energy conservation programs and stipulated that the funds must "supplement and not supplant" money already appropriated for those programs.

The administration repeatedly has stated it will oppose any increase in taxes to help reduce the huge deficits in the administration budget. But in this proposal, the administration is happy to claim as its own the proceeds of an illegal tax imposed on consumers by oil companies, and use those proceeds to reduce its deficit.

There is an additional reason to oppose the administration proposal. The proposal makes these energy programs, low-income home heating assistance and weatherization assistance, and grants to schools and hospitals primarily dependent on the availability of funds recovered from oil companies for overcharges. There is no assurance whatsoever that the amount of oil overcharge funds recovered will be sufficient to maintain these programs at desired levels in future years.

There are estimates that total recovery of overcharges may be as much as $6 billion over the next few years. But that must be resolved by the courts. To make these energy assistance programs primarily dependent on such an uncertain source of funds is poor policy and could endanger the future of those programs.

There is a better solution, one which the Congress has previously approved.

I am today introducing legislation requiring the Department of Energy to transmit oil overcharge funds to State governments for energy conservation programs, including low-income energy and home weatherization assistance. These funds, which belong really to the consumers of this Nation, would be in addition to, not replacement for, funds appropriated by the Congress for these programs.

This legislation would preserve the right of overcharged consumers to the first claim on overcharge funds. Only in those cases in which it is impossible to identify individual overcharged consumers, or impractical to refund the overcharges to them, would the funds revert to the Federal Government for these consumer-directed energy programs administered by the State governments.

I support strongly the program of low-income home heating assistance, low-income home weatherization, and grants to schools and hospitals for energy conservation projects. Indeed, the schools and hospitals grant program is the result of legislation which I introduced. In my view, the administration proposal would place the future of these programs in peril, and would constitute a Treasury Department raid on funds that belong to overcharged consumers.

I urge the Senate to reject the administration proposal and to enact the legislation I am introducing today. I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

S. 2287

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Petroleum Consumer Overcharge Restitution Act".

SEC. 2. (a) From the acccounts held in escrow on the date of enactment of this Act as a result of alleged petroleum pricing and allocation violations, the Secretary of Energy is directed to exercise his remedial authority under the Emergency Petroleum Allocation Act of 1973 to disburse these funds immediately to the Governors or Chief Executive Officers of the States, less such amounts as may be necessary to pay all identifiable legitimate claims for such overcharges.

(b) In addition to the funds distributed under subsection (a), the Secretary of Energy shall distribute to the Governors or Chief Executive Officers of the States as promptly as is practicably feasible, all other amounts collected or hereafter collected as a result of alleged petroleum pricing and allocation violations which are—

(1) attributable to direct or indirect injuries to ultimate consumers or to otherwise unidentifiable parties; and

(2) not necessary to satisfy the claims of identifiable injured claimants who can demonstrate specific injury.

(c) The Secretary of Energy shall make disbursements under this Act based on the ratio, calculated by the Secretary, which—

(1) the consumption within each State of refined petroleum products (other than refinery feedstocks) during the period from September 1, 1973 until January 28, 1981 bears to

(2) the consumption within all States of such products during that period.

(d) The disbursement made under this Act shall be available for energy conservation programs of the States, including low-income energy assistance, schools and hospitals conservation programs, and other related weatherization activities.

SEC. 3. (a) The oil overcharge funds returned to States will supplement the funds for existing authorized energy programs, not to supplant the funds for existing programs. These funds may not be permanently deposited to the United States Treasury and returned to the States through the appropriation process.

(b) Not more than 10 percent of the funds available to each State under this Act may be used to meet administrative costs.

SEC. 4. The Comptroller General of the United States shall conduct a review or an investigation of the use of funds received under this Act by a State in order to insure compliance with the provisions of this Act.

SEC. 5. As used in this Act, the term "States" means the several States, the District of Columbia, Puerto Rico, and the territories and possessions of the United States. For the purposes of this Act, the term "energy conservation programs" used in Section 2d above means:

(A) the program under part A of the Energy Conservation and Existing Buildings Act of 1976 (42 U.S.C. 6861 and following);

(B) the programs under part D of title III of the Energy Policy and Conservation Act (relating to primary and supplemental state energy conservation programs; 42 U.S.C. 6321 and following);

(C) the program under part G of title III of the Energy Policy and Conservation Act (relating to energy conservation for schools and hospitals; 42 U.S.C. 6371 and following);

(D) programs under the National Energy Extension Service Act (42 U.S.C. 7001 and following); and

(E) the program under the Low-Income Home Energy Assistance Act of 1981 (42 U.S.C. 8621 and following).●

S. 2288. A bill to extend duty-free treatment to imports of chipper knife steel; to the Committee on Finance.

DUTY ON CHIPPER KNIFE STEEL

● Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation that would permanently eliminate the duty on chipper knife steel imported into the United States, beginning in April 1985, after the current temporary duty expires.

Chipper knife steel is designed solely to be used to manufacture wood-chipping knives for the pulp, paper, and forest products industries. The rate of the duty on chipper knife steel has been temporarily reduced as the result of legislation passed in each of the past two Congresses. The current temporary reduction is scheduled to expire on March 31, 1985. Although this expiration date is still more than a year away, if the duty on chipper knife steel were permanently repealed now, it could help chipper knife manufacturers in making their plans for future production. In a like manner, continued uncertainty about the quantity and price of chipper knife steel could lead to a curtailment in production and the loss of jobs in States like my own State of Michigan. It has been estimated that in Michigan alone, a permanent elimination of the duty on chipper knife steel could save well over 100 jobs over the next couple of years. Repeal of the import duty would put U.S. manufacturers of chipper knives in a much better position to compete with foreign manufacturers, which do not have to use the chipper knife steel subject to the U.S. duty in their productive processes.

Numerous governmental investigations have found that there has been virtually no domestic production of chipper knife steel during the past several years. In 1983, the U.S. International Trade Commission recommended that there be an exemption of chipper knife steel from the import quotas on specialty steel because of the inadequate domestic supply of chipper knife steel. Last July, President Reagan went along and exempted chipper knife steel from the specialty steel import quotas because of its inadequate domestic supply. Therefore, elimination of the import duty on chipper knife steel would not have an adverse affect on the domestic production of chipper knife steel, but it would help the employment situation for workers in the United States who manufacture chipper knifes.

Congressman ALBOSTA has introduced identical legislation in the House of Representatives. I urge the members of both the Ways and Means Committee and the Senate Finance Committee to give this legislation thorough and expedited attention.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of this legislation be printed following my remarks.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2288

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) item 606.93 of the Tariff Schedules of the United States (19 U.S.C. 1202) is amended—

(1) by striking out "8.3% ad val. + additional duties (see headnote 4)" in rate column numbered 1 and inserting in lieu thereof "Free"; and

(b) Item 911.29 of the Appendix to such Schedules is repealed.

SEC. 2. The amendments made by the first section of this Act shall apply with respect to articles entered, or withdrawn from warehouse for consumption, on or after April 1, 1985.●

By Mr. SPECTER:

S. 2289. A bill to amend the Vocational Education Act of 1963 to place certain community-based organizations on State, local, and national advisory councils, to provide for special consideration of certain proposals for vocational education grants, and to require a set-aside of certain allocations for vocational education programs; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

VOCATIONAL EDUCATION AND COMMUNITY-BASED ORGANIZATIONS ACT OF 1984

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, today, youth employment is in crisis. The youth employment crisis today has the potential for becoming tomorrow's social disaster.

It is estimated that 50 to 60 percent of black youth are unemployed. Hispanic barrios and Appalachian hollows are not far behind in these discouraging statistical reports.

This Nation is experiencing an economic recovery which is not reaching our youth population. At the same time, the small business owners who have 80 percent of the jobs, require employees with skills and work habits that members of the unemployed youth population do not have.

Increased opportunities to secure skills training and motivational training are essential if we are to begin solving this national problem.

That is why, Mr. President, I am determined to examine the tried and tested experience of Rev. Leon Sullivan, the Nation's foremost expert in manpower training and the nationwide network of OIC—Opportunities Industrialization Centers—to discover what has worked best in their 20 years of successful operation.

I find that this nonprofit, self-help, prevocational training program, teaching basic skills in reading, and writing, and computations, serves as a feeder to the skills training centers that have developed a placement record of 70 percent and a retention rate of 80 percent.

Originating in Philadelphia, Pa., OIC's are now located throughout the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, in Pittsburgh, McKeesport, Carlisle, West Chester, Chester, Erie, Monessen, Norristown, and beyond the State of Pennsylvania these successful programs exist nationwide in such diverse cities as Riverside and San Diego, Calif., Jacksonville, Fla., Columbia, S.C., Detroit, Mich., and Providence, R.I.

The Sullivan motivational and attitudinal training process which takes people who have been turned off and turns them on to the work ethic and the work habits that will result in increased productivity is badly needed as a model that can be replicated to undergird our existing vocational and technical training schools system.

A demonstration project, developed in cooperation with the National Institute for Education and the Philadelphia Board of Education is a second aspect of the OIC employment training system that will help meet the needs that we have identified. This project, approved by the president of the Teacher's Union, and the Pennsylvania State Superintendent of Schools, used certified teachers in OIC centers and provided diplomas to graduates from the principals of the high schools. Dropouts and delinquents who would never make it into the vocational training school were given on-the-job training by businesses in connection with OIC training under the umbrella of the public school system. The 4-year demonstration was judged as one of the most successful research and demonstration projects in the history of the institute.

The plan was to provide 100 percent Federal funds the first year; 75 percent the second year; 50 percent the third year, and 25 percent the fourth year. At the end of the 4th year a takeover by the State would take place. In the State of Pennsylvania it worked as planned. The Pennsylvania State Education Department approved the program for State funding.

The U.S. Senate passed the Career Education Act in 1977 and cited the OIC model in the accompanying report as being highly recommended to State school superintendents.

Mr. President, this proven track record of demonstrated effectiveness has led successive Congresses to include OIC by name in the Comprehensive Employment and Training Act and the Job Training Partnership Act. More than 50 Senators at one time or another cosponsored OIC bills. Results have led leaders of business and industry to form a National Industrial Advisory Council composed of the chief executive officers of major corporations, such as AT&T, General Motors, General Electric, General Foods, IBM, Pfizer Pharmaceuticals, Sears, R&R Donnelly, Sun Co., Gulf Oil, Campbell Soups, RCA, and Pepsico. These companies have pioneered with Reverend Sullivan in the public-private partnership approach to solving our national employment and training problems.

Because of this background, and the critical nature of today's youth-employment problems, I am recommending that the Senate pass legislation which will amend the Vocational Education Act of 1963 and provide for a prevocational motivational and basic literacy training system to reach the unreached ages 16 to 21 who are rapidly becoming a permanent underclass in our society.

Former alcohol abusers, ex-offenders, school dropouts, and the juvenile delinquents who are growing in number have been served successfully by OIC for a number of years, and the indication is that it can be done on a broader scale if our educational system targets special resources to inner cities where the danger and opportunities are the greatest.

This bill, which I am introducing today, addresses this problem. The bill seeks to close a gap which has existed since the passage of the Vocational Education Act of 1963. Presently, nonprofit, self-help, community-based organizations such as the Opportunities Industrialization Centers of America, Inc., are not assured participation in vocational education programs.

The exclusion of such organizations is indeed unfortunate, especially when one considers the success record of many community-based organizations in providing prevocational training, a component of vocational education which is essential in light of the alarming rate of functional illiteracy in this country—which the U.S. Department of Education estimates at 26 million.

I have cited from the State of Pennsylvania the work of one outstanding example OIC, under the leadership of its founder and chairman, Rev. Leon H. Sullivan. OIC has trained more than 700,000 Americans in more than 40 States and 150 rural and urban communities, providing remedial and supportive services which are needed by the hard-core structurally unemployed as preparation for vocational training.

In introducing the Vocational Education and Community-Based Organizations Act of 1984, I seek to improve and intensify existing vocational education programs by providing prevocational, self-help, motivational training organizations with access to our vocational system.

The bill has three main thrusts:

First. To place community-based organizations such as OIC on the various advisory councils and other boards which administer the vocational education program;

Second. To provide for special consideration of grant proposals for prevocational education and which meet certain other goals enumerated in the statement of purpose; and Third. To provide a set aside for prevocational education and training.

This act will allow States to improve existing vocational programs through encouragement and funding of State and local proposals which develop new self-help, community-based preparation programs that provide prevocational, motivational, attitudinal, and basic skills training. It will also assist in providing prevocational preparation targeted to inner-city youth, non-English-speaking barrios, and other urban and rural pockets of poverty.

In addition, the bill provides for cooperation between self-help, community-based organizations of demonstrated effectiveness and existing vocational and technical training institutions.

Further, the bill allows for the provision of intern programs of demonstrated effectiveness in developing cooperative partnerships with business, and industry, and vocational education institutions which improve the basic skills of prevocational students.

Finally, under this act, eligible community-based organizations which are dissatisfied with the final action on their application for funds can appeal the action of the State to the Secretary of the Department of Education.

I am especially pleased to introduce this bill in February 1984, during the 20th anniversary year of OIC, which was founded by Rev. Leon Sullivan in 1964. Reverend Sullivan, who serves as pastor of the 6,000-member Zion Baptist Church in Philadelphia, has pioneered in the field of manpower development, employment, and training for about a quarter of a century.

His unique contributions to both the Education and Labor Departments of the Federal Government has been recognized by Presidents from Johnson through to President Reagan—each of whom has visited the OIC and praised its successful track record and demonstrated effectiveness. He was appointed to the Manpower Policy Commission created by the Congress in 1973, and reappointed by Presidents Ford and Carter. As a recognized leader among businessmen, he has served on the boards of General Motors, the Girard Bank, the Mellon Bank, and the Philadelphia Savings & Loan.

As a community leader, he has served on the boards of the United Way and the Boy Scouts, and has received the Public Service Award of the United States, the Philadelphia Award, the Freedom Foundation Award, the Spingarn Award, the United States Public Service Award, and the Edwin Dahlberg Peace Award.

This great man and his great contribution toward the solution of the tragic youth crisis in America has unlocked the door of opportunity for disadvantaged young Americans of all races.

The business community is deeply concerned with the fact that we are not preparing American youth motivationally and attitudinally for the work force, and that we are not giving them the basic skills needed for the rapid technological changes taking place in our society. It is my hope that this bill introduced today will help correct what is wrong, fill in what has been missing—vocational training opportunities for those who will not make it unless brought into the vocational system by a general prevocational preparation through an outreach effort with adequate remedial and supportive services.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill in its entirety be inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

of section 101(b) and which provide for career intern programs of demonstrated effectiveness, utilize intermediary organizations with a proven record in developing cooperative partnerships with business and industry and vocational education instutitions or which improve the basic skills of prevocational students.".

SEC. 6. Section 195 of the Act is amended—

(1) by inserting after "agency" in paragraph (13) a comma and the following: "a self-help community-based organization"; and

(2) by adding at the end thereof the following:

"(22) The term 'self-help community-based organizations of demonstrated effectiveness' means organizations described in section 4(5) of the Job Training Partnership Act, such as Opportunities Industrialization Centers, National Urban League, Operation S.E.R. and 70,001, Inc.

"(23) The 'career intern programs of demonstrated effectiveness' means the model tested and recommended by the National Institute of Education, of the Opportunities Industrialization Centers type.

"(24) The term 'intermediary organizations with a record of demonstrated effectiveness in building partnerships with business and industry' means organizations such as the OIC National Industry Council, the National Alliance for Business, and the Amigos de SER.

SEC. 7. Section 103 of the Act is amended to read as follows: "There are authorized to be appropriated such sums as are necessary to carry out the purposes of this Act for the fiscal year 1985 and for each succeeding fiscal year ending prior to October 1, 1989.".

By Mr. WILSON (for himself and Mr. CRANSTON):

S. 2290. A bill to amend the act entitled "An Act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to construct, operate, and maintain the Auburn-Folsom South unit, American River division, Central Valley project, California, under Federal reclamation laws," enacted September 2, 1965; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

AUBURN DAM PROJECT

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, in the spirit of President Reagan's recent reaffirmation of this Nation's commitment to the sound development of our precious water resources, I am today introducing a bill designed to put a long delayed major dam project in my home State of California back on track. The proposed Auburn Dam and Reservoir, located on the American River, was first authorized by Congress in 1965—nearly 20 years ago. Today, this much needed project remains uncompleted. Only the dam's foundation work has been done, leaving a highly visible scar across the beautiful American River Gorge. Enactment of the bill before you now would serve as the first step in taking action to finally complete this project.

Delays in construction of this facility began in 1975 when a nearby earthquake raised questions of dam safety. By 1980, the project was redesigned to withstand any expected seismic disturbances. A supplemental environmental impact statement is now close to completion and new preliminary design specifications have been drawn up.

The consequence of all these delays is that the estimated cost of completing the project has exceeded the authorized cost ceiling. Originally authorized in 1965 at $424 million, indexing has increased this figure to $1.6 billion in 1984 dollars. The problem, however, is the estimated cost for the Auburn Dam and Reservoir now stands at $2.2 billion. This leaves a $600 million shortfall in financing authority.

Instead of proposing that Congress pick up the entire tab for meeing these inflated costs, the bill I am introducing today proposes that the Federal Government enter into a financing partnership with any interested project beneficiaries. Already, several public and private utilities, irrigation and water districts, and possibly the State of California have indicated an interest in sharing the upfront costs of completing the construction of this dam. As many of my colleagues know, cost-sharing on water resource projects is an idea that is heartily endorsed by this administration. The Auburn Dam project seems to me to be a perfect illustration of how we can put this partnership idea into effect.

This bill authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to enter into cost-sharing negotiations with interested parties and report back to Congress within a year with proposed agreements. Once Congress is in receipt of these cost-sharing agreements, modifications to the original project authorization legislation may be in order.

This bill is not asking for more money, it is not proposing a new water project for the West, and it entails no new or additional drains on the U.S. Treasury. All that it proposes is that interested project beneficiaries be allowed to participate in a project that is now only partially completed. Willing non-Federal entities have indicated that they will share in the costs of the project as long as they receive commensurate benefits.

Identical legislation is moving through the other body. In anticipation of its enactment, the Bureau of Reclamation is already beginning to set up a mechanism to expedite forthcoming cost-sharing negotiations. I understand the State of California is excited about this proposal and intends to work closely with the Bureau of Reclamation on this project. Additionally, my esteemed colleague from California has joined as an original cosponsor of this bill.

Mr. President, this legislation deserves fast track consideration. Even though we have many other matters to dispose of this session, I would not expect that consideration of this bill will take an inordinate amount of time.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2290

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Act entitled "An Act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to construct, operate, and maintain the Auburn-Folsom South unit, American River division, Central Valley project, California, under Federal reclamation laws" (Public Law 89-161; 79 Stat. 615), enacted September 2, 1965 (hereinafter referred to as the "Act"), is amended by inserting at the end thereof the following new section:

"SEC. 7. The Secretary is authorized and directed to enter into negotiations with non-Federal entities and may consummate agreements which shall include provisions for cost-sharing with such entities to provide assistance toward financing the construction, operation, and maintenance of the Auburn-Folsom South unit. No such agreements may take effect until funds are appropriated to carry out such agreements. Notwithstanding section 9(c) of the Recalamation Project Act of 1939, such agreements may provide a right for the participating non-Federal entities to share in the power and separable power facilities and other project services as the Secretary may deem appropriate. Not later than one year after the date of enactment of this section, the Secretary shall submit a report to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs of the House of Representatives and the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources of the Senate of the results of the negotiations, including copies of the proposed agreements.".

Mr. WILSON. Senator CRANSTON is out of town today. I ask that his statement of support for my Auburn-Folsom South unit cost-sharing bill be printed in the RECORD.

● Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I am pleased to cosponsor legislation to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to enter into negotiations with non-Federal entities to assist with the cost of constructing the Auburn Dam project in California. Today the total cost of the Auburn-Folsom South unit is $2.3 billion—far exceeding the $1.4 billion level permitted in the 1965 congressional authorization. Given this high cost, it is clear that substantial non-Federal cost sharing is going to be essential if the project is ever to be built.

I support the Auburn Dam project assuming it is economically justifiable and environmentally sound. But I want to make it clear that this bill does not reauthorize the Auburn-Folsom South unit. Reauthorization at this point is premature. The supplemental environmental impact statement on the Folsom South Canal, which will cover the issue of lower American River flows, will not be issued in draft until August 1984. The final EIS is not expected until September 1985. The supplemental EIS on Auburn Dam itself has not yet been prepared. The Department of the Interior has not yet revised the economic analysis of the project.

I am aware of the great interest in maintaining the flows of the lower American River. It is imperative that this issue be resolved—and the lower American protected—before proceeding with the needed project reauthorization. Additionally, in negotiating any cost-sharing agreements with non-Federal entities, the Department of the Interior must take into consideration the needs of the lower American River.

The legislation being introduced today will help provide additional information regarding the economic feasibility of the Auburn Dam project by determining non-Federal participation. The bill requires that the Secretary of the Interior report back to appropriate House and Senate committees regarding possible cost-sharing agreements.●

By Mr. HUMPHREY:

S. 2291. A bill to amend the Comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation, and Liability Act of 1980 (Superfund) to allow immediate access to the full amount which will be available to the fund, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

SUPERFUND IMPROVEMENT ACT OF 1984

● Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation to amend the Comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation, and Liability Act (CERCLA), better known as Superfund. My bill, the Superfund Improvement Act of 1984, addresses the issues of adequate and accelerated funding, the liability of municipalities for cleanups at municipally owned sites, and the need to deal responsibly with health concerns at hazardous waste sites.

Last November 18, I inserted in the RECORD a working draft of this legislation. At that time, I explained that only within the past year, under new leadership, has the Superfund moved forward as quickly as Congress had intended. We now find ourselves facing a situation in which the States and EPA are ready and able to undertake studies and cleanups at additional sites, but are prevented from doing so by a lack of sufficient funds. EPA has already determined how it will spend the $410 million fiscal year 1984 Superfund appropriation. Nonetheless, many States, including New Hampshire, could make good use of additional funds in 1984. The President recognizes this problem, and in his State of the Union Address said that he would request a $50 million supplemental appropriation for Superfund in 1984. While I believe this is an important step in the right direction, I am not convinced that it goes far enough.

To date, for the years 1981-84, Congress has appropriated approximately $885 million for the Superfund program. Given a total fund of $1.6 billion, this leaves over $700 million for fiscal year 1985, the last authorized year of the program. I believe that EPA could responsibly obligate a substantial portion of these funds in 1984, and most certainly an amount in excess of the $50 million supplemental that the President has said he will request. My legislation would solve this problem by allowing EPA access to all of the remaining funds in the hazardous substance response trust fund. The practical effect of this provision would be to accelerate the authorizations and appropriations under Superfund, and I would hasten to point out that this would not add to the overall $1.6 billion initial authorization.

In this respect, the Superfund Improvement Act of 1984 is a stopgap measure for allowing prompt action under Superfund. There is no question that the Superfund should and must be reauthorized beyond 1985, and I am convinced that this reauthorization should occur this year. In the interim, however, there is an urgent need to provide EPA with additional moneys, in excess of $50 million, to fund more site cleanups in 1984.

The second provision of this bill would limit the liability of municipalities for the cost of cleaning up municipally owned sites to no more than 50 percent of the total amount. At the current time, municipalities are liable for at least 50 percent of the total cleanup cost, and as much as 100 percent of the total cost. I believe this provision of the law is counterproductive. I know of a number of cases in which municipalities have intentionally dragged their feet on Superfund site cleanups because of a fear that they would be held liable for a substantial portion of the cleanup costs, and that they would be unable to shoulder this financial burden. This fear is so strong that in other cases communities have downplayed the nature and severity of hazardous waste problems at municipal landfills, and some have even made efforts to have sites removed from the Superfund's national priority list.

This is not a beneficial situation for any of the concerned parties—municipalities, local residents, and State and EPA officials—because the longer a site cleanup is delayed, the greater the overall cost is likely to be, and the more extensive the environmental damage. Hence, I believe that limiting the liability of States and political subdivisions for the cleanup costs at publicly owned hazardous waste sites is a reasonable and prudent measure which is in the best interests of the public health and protection of the environment.

The third element of the Superfund Improvement Act addresses the very important issue of health concerns raised by hazardous waste sites. In my own State of New Hampshire, and in other States as well, there are many citizens who are concerned that nearby hazardous waste sites may be affecting their health. Although the 1980 Superfund Act established the Agency for Toxic Substances and Disease Registry, as a part of the Centers for Disease Control, (CDC), in order to respond to these concerns, a lack of adequate funding has seriously hampered the Agency's efforts.

My bill deals with this problem on two levels. First, the bill authorizes $10 million for the Agency for Toxic Substances and Disease Registry (ATSDR) to distribute to the States in order to conduct initial health surveys or risk assessments at all hazardous waste sites in each State. Based on these initial assessments, the States would report their findings to the ATSDR along with requests for any further more detailed studies that they may feel are necessary.

The second element of this section earmarks 5 percent of each year's total Superfund appropriation for the ATSDR. At the current time, this Agency must submit its budget request to EPA, which reviews and adjusts the request, and in turn submits it to OMB as part of EPA's overall Superfund budget request. As a result, funding for the ATSDR has been inadequate. There is strong and widespread support among public health officials throughout the country for providing the ATSDR with a significant and guaranteed funding level. If this provision had been in effect in 1984, 5 percent of the total Superfund appropriation of $410 million would have translated into $20.5 million for the ATSDR. I believe this is a reasonable and realistic amount for addressing public health concerns raised by hazardous waste disposal.

The bill would also allow States to enter into cooperative agreements with the ATSDR in order to fund any additional studies that the States may feel are necessary in following up on the initial health surveys. States would also be able to enter into cooperative agreements to fund baseline health programs for addressing hazardous waste concerns. Where individual States are unable to run their own programs, the ATSDR would have responsibility. In most States, the public health departments would be likely to run such health programs, although in some States the environmental protection agency may hold this authority.

I believe this section of the bill, which provides for initial health surveys, the availability of funding for followup studies as well as diagnostic services and other programs, and a statutory delegation of authority to the ATSDR for addressing hazardous waste health concerns, constitutes a comprehensive and constructive approach to the problems which we face. The States and the Federal Government would be enabled to work cooperatively to meet the challenge.

Mr. President, I offer the Superfund Improvement Act of 1984 as a package of amendments that I believe addresses some of the most urgent problems that have arisen in the implementation of the Superfund program. In closing, Mr. President, let me reemphasize that this bill is not a substitute for a major reauthorization of the act. Rather, it is an interim measure, which addresses the immediate need to accelerate expenditures of Superfund moneys so that timely cleanups can go forward while we in Congress push separate legislation to reauthorize the program beyond 1985. I believe the other provisions dealing with municipal liability and health surveys also address extremely important and pressing concerns.

I invite my colleagues' support for this bill, Mr. President, and I ask unanimous consent that the text of the Superfund Improvement Act of 1984 be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2291

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SHORT TITLE

SECTION 1. This Act may be cited as the "Superfund Improvement Act of 1984".

ACCESS TO FULL AMOUNT AVAILABLE TO FUND

SEC. 2. (a) Section 111(e) of the Comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation, and Liability Act of 1980 is amended by striking out paragraph (4) thereof.

(b) Section 223(c)(2) of such Act is amended—

(1) in subparagraph (A), by striking out "for the following 12 months, and" and inserting in lieu thereof a period;

(2) by striking out subparagraphs (B) and (C); and

(3) by redesignating subparagraph (D) as subparagraph (B).

(c) Section 111(c)(3) of such Act is amended by striking out "subject to such amounts as are provided in appropriate Acts,".

(d) The amendments made by this section shall become effective on the date of the enactment of this Act.

STATE SHARE OF REMEDIAL COSTS FOR CLEANUP OF FACILITIES OWNED BY STATE OR LOCAL GOVERNMENTS

SEC. 3. (a) Section 104(c)(3)(C)(ii) of the Comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation, and Liability Act of 1980 is amended by striking out "at least 50 per centum or such greater amount as the President may determine appropriate" and inserting in lieu thereof "50 per centum, or such lesser amount as the President may determine appropriate".

(b) The amendment made by subsection (a) shall apply to contracts and cooperative agreements entered into on or after the date of the enactment of this Act.

USE OF FUND FOR SURVEYS, REGISTRY OF EXPOSED INDIVIDUALS, AND DIAGNOSTIC SERVICES

SEC. 4. (a) Section 111(c)(4) of the Comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation, and Liability Act of 1980 is amended—

(1) by inserting "in accordance with subsection (m)," after "(4)"; and

(2) by inserting "and health surveys" after "epidemiologic studies".

(b) Section 111 of such Act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(m)(1) For each fiscal year, an amount equal to not less than 5 percent of the total amount expended from the Fund for such fiscal year shall be used for the purpose of carrying out activities described in subsection (c)(4), including any such activities related to hazardous waste stored, treated, or disposed of at a facility having a permit under section 3005 of the Solid Waste Disposal Act.

"(2) Such activities shall be carried out by the Agency for Toxic Substances and Disease Registry established by section 104(i), either directly, or through grants to the States (or political subdivisions thereof) in the case of States (or political subdivisions) which the Administrator of such agency determines are capable of carrying out such activities.".

(c) Section 3012(c) of the Solid Waste Disposal Act (relating to hazardous waste site inventories) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(3)(A) In addition to the amounts authorized under paragraph (2), there are authorized to be appropriated for fiscal year 1985 an additional $10,000,000 to be used for conducting health surveys with respect to hazardous waste sites identified and eligible to be identified in the inventories conducted under this section and hazardous waste disposal facilities having a permit under section 3005.

"(B) The health surveys shall be carried out by the Agency for Toxic Substances and Disease Registry established under section 104(i) of the Comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation, and Liability Act of 1980, either directly, or through grants to the States (or political subdivisions thereof) in the case of those States (or political subdivisions) which the Administrator of such agency determines are capable of carrying out such surveys.

"(C) The amount appropriated for carrying out the surveys shall be allotted among the States in such manner as the Administrator of such Agency determines to be appropriate to carry out the purposes of this paragraph.

"(D) Any State or political subdivision carrying out a survey shall report the results of the survey to the Administrator of such agency, and shall include recommendations with respect to further activities which need to be carried out under section 111(m) of the Comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation, and Liability Act of 1980. The Administrator of such agency shall include the same recommendations in a report on the results of any survey carried out directly by the agency, and shall issue a final report which includes the results of all the surveys carried out under this paragraph.

"(E) For the purposes of this paragraph and section 111(c)(4) of the Comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation and Liability Act of 1980, the term "health surveys" shall include preliminary assessments of the potential risk to human health posed by individual sites and facilities subject to this paragraph, based on such factors as the nature and extent of contamination, the existence or portential for pathways of human exposure (including ground or surface water contamination, air emissions, and food chain contamination), the size and potential susceptibility of the community within the likely pathways of exposure, the comparisons of expected human exposure levels to the short-term and long-term health effects associated with identified contaminants and any available recommended exposure or tolerance limits for such contaminants, and the comparison of existing morbidity and mortality data on diseases that may be associated with the observed levels of exposure. A purpose of such preliminary assessments shall be to help determine whether full-scale health or epidemiological studies and medical evaluations of exposed populations shall be undertaken.".

(d) The amendments made by this section shall be effective with respect to fiscal year 1985 and each fiscal year thereafter.

By Mr. GORTON (for himself and Mr. GOLDWATER):

S. 2292. A bill to provide for continued access by the Federal Government to land remote sensing data from satellites and for other purposes; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

LAND REMOTE SENSING SATELLITE COMMUNICATIONS ACT OF 1984

Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, I am introducing today on my behalf and on behalf of the distinguished Senator from Arizona (Mr. GOLDWATER) a bill to provide for a continued U.S. land remote sensing capability and an orderly transfer of this capability to the private sector.

Our current experimental land remote sensing satellite (Landsat) system has established the United States as the undisputed world leader in remote sensing technology. Four satellites have been launched during the past 12 years, and a fifth, called Landsat D-prime, will be launched next month. Data from these satellites have enabled us to see the Earth in a way never previously possible, and our policy of nondiscriminatory data access, or "open skies," has made Landsat a provider of worldwide benefit and international goodwill.

Recently, other nations have begun developing their own land remote sensing systems. I must warn my colleagues that not only is our leadership in this area threatened, but uncertainty over the future of Landsat has jeopardized the existence of any U.S. land remote sensing capability at all. Our inability to resolve the debate between those who believe the Landsat system should be commercialized and those who feel the Government should continue to sponsor the system has left us with no plans for any capability after Landsat D-prime, which is expected to function for 3 years.

Last March, the administration proposed to commercialize the Landsat system. This decision was based on the fact that the system is very costly to operate and generates very little revenue. The idea behind commercialization is that the private sector could operate the technology at less expense than the Government, and that a private marketing effort could greatly expand the market for data.

The problem with the administration's proposal was that it included commercialization of our meteorological satellite (Metsat) system, an idea that had no congressional support. Last year, when I introduced a resolution opposing Metsat commercialization, I expressed my feeling that the outcry over the prospect of commercializing Metsat was preventing Congress from focusing on the more relevant issue of Landsat. Now that the resolution and its House companion have overwhelmingly passed and the Metsat commercialization proposal has been dropped, we can give Landsat commercialization proper consideration.

Mr. President, as chairman of the Commerce Committee's Subcommittee on Science, Technology, and Space, I have followed this issue very closely, and I have come to see two fundamental facts.

First, the market for land remote sensing data is currently very small, and will not develop without private sector initiative and marketing expertise. Several years of private marketing will be required to make land remote sensing a profitable business, and no adequate private systems are likely to be developed until the potential for profit exists.

Second, Landsat D-prime represents the final product of more than a billion dollars of Federal expenditure, and should not be turned over to the private sector for a price that would reflect only the revenues that can currently be realized from its operation.

The legislation I am introducing today would provide for a phased commercialization of Landsat, beginning with data marketing and expanding to space system management as market development enables wholly private systems to prosper.

Under this approach, the Government would maintain ownership of Landsat D-prime and contract for private marketing of the data and possibly private operations of the system. Concurrently, the Government would work with the private sector on development of a follow-on system with at least equivalent capabilities. Private involvement in system development would reduce Federal costs from the expense of constructing another experimental Government satellite, and private operation and data marketing would further develop the market for data. In the future, wholly private systems would be licensed by the Secretary of Commerce.

Last month the Department of Commerce issued a request for proposals asking private parties to bid for the Landsat system and development of a follow-on system. Current law stipulates that legislation must be enacted to permit any such transfer, and this legislation would authorize the transfer while setting forth conditions under which it is acceptable to the Congress.

Mr. President, I feel this legislation would insure continued U.S. involvement in remote sensing, expedite the development of an expanded data market, and minimize Federal expenses in transferring this capability to the private sector.

I hope the bill will stir debate on the issue, and I eagerly await the comments and suggestions of the private sector, the administration, and my colleagues.

I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2292

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act be cited as the "Land Remote Sensing Statellite Communications Act of 1984".

TITLE I—DECLARATION OF FINDINGS AND PURPOSES

FINDINGS

SEC. 101. The Congress finds and declares that—

(1) the Federal Government's experimental LANDSAT system has established the United States as the world leader in land remote sensing satellite technology;

(2) the continuous collection of land remote sensing data from satellites is of major benefit in managing the Earth's natural resources;

(3) private sector involvement in space can provide sound bases for the future growth of space-based technologies;

(4) it is necessary to determine the extent to which it is appropriate and in the national interest for the private sector to assume responsibility for civil land remote sensing satellite system operation and data management;

(5) the existing civil land remote sensing system of the United States involves important international commitments;

(6) civil land remote sensing involves relevant national security concerns;

(7) it is in the national interest to promote the establishment of private land remote sensing ventures;

(8) land remote sensing development has been inhibited by lack of market development and private industry is best suited to develop the data market;

(9) it is doubtful that the private sector alone currently can develop a total land remote sensing system because of the high risk and large capital expenditure involved;

(10) cooperation between the Federal Government and private industry is necessary to manage effectively the existing LANDSAT system so as to ensure data continuity, to honor international and national security responsibilities, and to broaden the data market enough to support self-sufficient private ventures; and

(11) such cooperation should be structured to minimize the amount of support and regulation by the Federal Government, while assuring continuous availability to the Federal Government of land remote sensing data.

PURPOSES

SEC. 102. The purposes of this Act are to—

(1) guide the Federal Government in achieving proper involvement of the private sector by providing a framework for gradual commercialization of land remote sensing, allowing an increasing private role as the market for data expands, and assuring continuous data availability to the Federal Government;

(2) preserve the leading position of the United States in civil land remote sensing, preserve the national security, and honor the international obligations of the United States;

(3) reaffirm the right of all nations to sense the Earth's surface and acquire land remote sensing data, so long as such data are made available to all potential users on a non-discriminatory basis; and

(4) minimize the duration and amount of further Federal investment necessary to assure data continuity while achieving commercialization of civil land remote sensing.

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 103. For purposes of this Act, the term—

(1) "LANDSAT system" means LANDSAT 4 and LANDSAT D-prime, and related ground equipment, systems and facilities;

(2) "non-discriminatory basis" means without preference, bias, or any arrangement that favors any purchaser or class of purchasers over another, such that—

(A) data products are made available to all potential buyers at standard, published prices;

(B) all purchasers are given the same opportunities for access to data, such as timeliness of availability and terms of delivery; and

(C) special arrangements, other than any arrangement for exclusive access to data by any purchaser, such as volume discounts, gathering of data with certain characteristics requested by a purchaser, and maintenance of secrecy regarding any such arrangements, are permissible if the availability and prices of such services are published and uniformly available to the data purchasers;

(3) "Secretary" means the Secretary of Commerce;

(4) "unenhanced data" means digital or minimally processed signals collected from civil land remote sensing satellites involving rectification of distortions, registration with respect to features of the Earth, and calibration of spectral response; the term does not include conclusions, manipulations, or calculations derived from such signals or combination of the signals with other data or information; and

(5) "United States private entity" means any non-governmental entity or consortium of entities, the majority of whose assets is owned by citizens of the United States, the majority of whose personnel is comprised of citizens of the United States, and whose principal place of business is in the United States.

TITLE II—OPERATION AND DATA MARKETING OF LANDSAT SYSTEM

OPERATION

SEC. 201. (a) The National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration shall be responsible for—

(1) the orbit and data collection of LANDSAT 4, and disposition of LANDSAT 4 upon the termination of its useful operation, as determined and published by the Secretary;

(2) the launch, orbit, and data collection of LANDSAT D-prime, and disposition of LANDSAT D-prime upon the termination of its useful operation, as determined and published by the Secretary;

(3) ground equipment and facilities which are used to operate the LANDSAT system; and

(4) provision of data to foreign ground stations under the terms of existing Memoranda of Understanding between the United States Government and nations that operate ground stations.

(b) The Secretary may extend any such Memoranda of Understanding if such extension provides for their expiration upon the termination of the useful operation of the LANDSAT system.

(c) The provisions of this section shall not prohibit the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration from continuing to contract for the operation of the LANDSAT system, so long as the Administration retains—

(1) ownership of the system;

(2) ownership of the unenhanced data; and

(3) authority to make decisions concerning operation of the system.

MARKETING OF UNENHANCED DATA

SEC. 202. (a) In accordance with the requirements of this title, the Secretary shall, to the extent provided in advance by appropriations Acts and in accordance with the provisions of subsection (c) of this section, contract with a United States private entity for the marketing of unenhanced data collected according to the provisions of section 201 of this title. Any such contract shall provide that—

(1) the contractor may set the prices of unenhanced data products, if the products are always available to all potential buyers at published, non-discriminatory prices and terms of access;

(2) the contractor shall compensate the United States Government for the right to sell the data by payment of an initial fee, a percentage of data sales receipts, or some combination of such fee and receipts;

(3) the contractor shall pay to the United States Government the full purchase price of any unenhanced data that the contractor elects to utilize for purposes other than sale, in accordance with paragraph (4) of this subsection; and

(4) the contractor shall not engage in any sale of processed data except in a manner consistent with applicable antitrust laws.

(b) Prior to entering into such a contract, the Secretary shall publish the requirements of subsection (a)(1) through (4) of this section, and the contract shall be subject to such requirements.

(c)(1) Any decision or proposed decision by the Secretary to enter into any such contract shall be transmitted to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation of the Senate and the Committee on Science and Technology of the House of Representatives for their review. No such decision or proposed decision shall be implemented unless (A) a period of 30 days of continuous session of Congress has passed after the receipt by each such committee of such transmittal or (B) each such committee before the expiration of such period has transmitted to the Secretary written notice to the effect that such committee has no objection to the decision or proposed decision. As part of such transmittal, the Secretary shall include the information specified in subsection (a) (1) through (4) of this section.

(2) For purposes of this section—

(A) continuity of session is broken only by an adjournment sine die; and

(B) days on which either House is not in session because of an adjournment of more than 5 days to a day certain are excluded in the computation of such period.

AWARDING OF THE CONTRACT

SEC. 203. The Secretary shall award any such contract on the basis of—

(1) the financial return to the United States Government, based on any initial fee offered for marketing rights and any percentage of data sales receipts offered to the United States Government; and

(2) the ability to expand the market for unenhanced land remote sensing data.

TITLE III—DATA CONTINUITY AFTER THE LANDSAT SYSTEM

PURPOSE

SEC. 301. It is the purpose of this title to—

(1) provide for a transition from operation by the Federal Government to private, commercial operation of land remote sensing satellite systems;

(2) determine, with minimal risk during the proposed transition period, whether wholly private operation of land remote sensing is in the best interests of the United States; and

(3) provide for the continuity of land remote sensing satellite data after the termination of the operation of the existing system, as described in title II of this Act.

DATA CONTINUITY

SEC. 302. The Secretary shall evaluate proposals from United States private entities for a contract for the development of a system capable of generating land remote sensing data and marketing such unenhanced data for a period of 6 years. Such evaluation and any solicitation of proposals shall be conducted by means of a competitive process. Such proposals, at a minimum, shall specify—

(1) the quantities and qualities of data expected from the system;

(2) the projected date upon which operations could begin;

(3) the number of satellites to be constructed and their expected lifetimes;

(4) any need for Federal funding to develop the system;

(5) any percentage of sales receipts offered to the Federal Government; and

(6) plans for expanding the market for land remote sensing data.

NOTIFICATION REGARDING AWARDING OF THE CONTRACT

SEC. 303. (a) The Secretary shall evaluate the proposals referred to in section 302 of this title and, to the extent provided in advance by appropriations Acts, may contract with a United States private entity for the development of a system capable of generating land remote sensing data and marketing such unenhanced data for a period of 6 years. As part of such evaluation, the Secretary shall analyze the expected outcome of each proposal, in terms of—

(1) the availability to the Federal Government of at least the quantities and qualities of data used by the Federal Government in fiscal year 1983;

(2) the availability of such data upon the expected termination of the LANDSAT system;

(3) the cost to the Federal Government of developing the recommended system;

(4) the potential to expand the market for data;

(5) any percentage of data sales offered to the Federal Government, in accordance with section 304 of this title; and

(6) such other factors as the Secretary deems appropriate and relevant.

(b)(1) Any decision or proposed decision by the Secretary to enter into any such contract shall be transmitted to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation of the Senate and the Committee on Science and Technology of the House of Representatives for their review. No such decision or proposed decision shall be implemented unless (A) a period of 30 days of continuous session of Congress has passed after the receipt by each such committee of such transmittal or (B) each such committee before the expiration of such period has transmitted to the Secretary written notice to the effect that such committee has no objection to the decision or proposed decision. As part of such transmittal, the Secretary shall include the information specified in subsection (a) (1) through (6) of this section.

(2) For purposes of this section—

(A) continuity of session is broken only by an adjournment sine die; and

(B) days on which either House is not in session because of an adjournment of more than 5 days to a day certain are excluded in the computation of such period.

MARKETING INCENTIVE

SEC. 304. In order to promote aggressive marketing of land remote sensing data, any contract entered into pursuant to this title may provide that the percentage of sales paid by the contractor to the Federal Government shall decrease according to stipulated increases in sales levels.

SALE OF DATA

SEC. 305. Any contract entered into pursuant to this title shall provide that—

(1) the contractor will offer to sell and deliver unenhanced land remote sensing data to all potential buyers on a non-discriminatory basis;

(2) the contractor will engage in any sale of processed data only in a manner consistent with applicable antitrust laws; and

(3) the contract shall not provide a guarantee of purchases of data by the Federal Government from the contractor.

REPORT

SEC. 306. Within 2 years after the date on which any such contract becomes effective, the Secretary shall report to the Congress on the progress and feasibility of the transition to total private financing, operation, and ownership of a land remote sensing satellite system, together with any legislative recommendations to accomplish such transition.

TERMINATION OF AUTHORITY

SEC. 307. The authority granted by this title shall terminate 10 years after the date of the beginning of any contract entered into according to the provisions of this title.

TITLE IV— PRIVATE LAND REMOTE SENSING SYSTEMS

GENERAL AUTHORITY

SEC. 401. In consultation with other appropriate Federal agencies, the Secretary shall license qualified United States private entities to operate civil land remote sensing satellite systems in accordance with the provisions of this title.

CONDITIONS FOR OPERATION

SEC. 402. (a) No party or consortium may operate any land remote sensing satellite system which is subject to the jurisdiction or control of the United States without obtaining a license pursuant to section 401 of this title.

(b) A party or consortium shall be licensed to operate its system if—

(1) unenhanced land remote sensing data are made available to all potential users on a non-discriminatory basis;

(2) in the case of a consortium, the system is administered by a central, responsible entity established by the consortium;

(3) no terms of the license issued under this title protect the license holder from fair competition from other license holders;

(4) the license provides that, before any party or consortium terminates its operations under the license, it will make disposition of any satellites in space in a manner satisfactory to the President; and

(5) the entity seeking to obtain the license agrees, as a condition for the receipt of such license, to provide to the Secretary any data generated under such license which the Secretary may request for the purpose of archiving, pursuant to section 602 of this Act.

(c)(1) The Secretary, in consultation with other appropriate Federal agencies, shall be responsible for protection of national security interests and adherence to international responsibilities of the United States which are relevant to operation of private land remote sensing satellite systems, including—

(A) responsibility for all outer space activities of non-governmental entities of the United States;

(B) liability for damage caused by space objects under registration or license by the Federal Government; and

(C) registration with appropriate international authorities of all objects launched into space by non-governmental entities of the United States.

(2) In order to carry out paragraph (1) of this subsection, the Secretary shall, before licensing any private land remote sensing satellite system, secure an agreement from the private entity or consortium that it will—

(A) furnish the Secretary with complete orbit and data collection characteristics of the system, obtain advance approval of any intended deviation from such characteristics, and inform the Secretary immediately of any unintended deviation;

(B) obtain advance approval from the Secretary of any agreement it intends to enter with a foreign nation, entity, or consortium involving foreign nations or entities; and

(C) operate the system in a manner that is consistent with international law.

(13) The Secretary, in order to carry out the responsibilities specified in this title, may—

(A) inspect the facilities or financial records of any entity that holds a license pursuant to this title;

(B) promulgate regulations to implement the provisions of this title; and

(C) provide, within the licenses or regulations issued, for penalties for noncompliance with the requirements of such licenses or regulations, including termination of license and civil penalties.

AGENCY ACTIVITIES

SEC. 403. Federal agencies are authorized and encouraged to engage in joint activities in satellite land remote sensing by forming consortia with private firms, in accordance with the provisions of section 401 of this title, if—

(1) such activities will not compete with United States private sector activities;

(2) such activities are appropriate to an agency's missions and activities; and

(3) appropriated funds are available for that purpose.

TERMINATION

SEC. 404. The authority contained in this title shall terminate at the expiration of 10 years after the date of enactment of this Act if no firm or consortium has been licensed and continues in operation under the provisions of this title.

TITLE V—RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

CONTINUED FEDERAL RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

SEC. 501. The Administrator of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration, the Administrator of the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration, and the heads of other Federal agencies shall continue land remote sensing research and development, and are encouraged to conduct experimental space remote sensing programs (including applications programs) and to develop remote sensing technologies in support of their authorized missions, using funds appropriated for those purposes. In carrying out such programs, Federal agencies are encouraged to cooperate with private industry.

USE OF EXPERIMENTAL DATA

SEC. 502. Data gathered in Federal experimental land remote sensing programs may be used in related research and development programs funded by the Federal Government, including applications programs, but not for commercial uses or in competition with private sector activities, except as permitted by section 503 of this title.

SALE OF EXPERIMENTAL DATA

SEC. 503. Data gathered in Federal experimental land remote sensing programs may be competitively sold en bloc (consistent with national security interests and international obligations of the United States) to any United States entity which will market the data on a nondiscriminatory basis.

TITLE VI—GENERAL PROVISIONS

"OPEN SKIES"

SEC. 601. (a) Unenhanced land remote sensing satellite data generated by any system operator under the provisions of this Act shall be made available to all users on a non-discriminatory basis, in accordance with the requirements of this Act.

(b) For the purposes of this title, the term "system operator" means a contractor under title II or III or a license holder under title IV of this Act.

ARCHIVING OF DATA

SEC. 602. (a) In order to preserve many of the public benefits of civil remote sensing from space, including long-term global environmental monitoring, the Secretary shall provide for long-term storage and maintenance of data, as described in subsection (b) of this section, and for access to such data.

(b)(1) The Secretary shall continue to provide storage, maintenance, and access for unenhanced data from the LANDSAT system.

(2) The Secretary shall provide storage, maintenance, and access for unenhanced data generated pursuant to title III of this Act. The Secretary may obtain and examine such data to determine whether such data have potential public value, and to store and maintain data that are determined to be of value.

(3) The Secretary may provide storage, maintenance, and access for unenhanced data generated by license holders under title IV of this Act if the Secretary finds that such data have sufficient public value.

(c) All data generated by any system operator under titles III or IV of this Act shall be made available to the Secretary by the system operator in a form suitable for processing for data storage, maintenance, and access. The Secretary may (as provided in advance by appropriations Acts) pay to such system operator reasonable costs for reproduction and transmittal of the data.

(d)(1) Copies of stored data may not be made available from the archive except (A) to the system operator originally providing the data, or (B) pursuant to paragraph (2) or (3) of this subsection.

(2) Copies of stored data may be made available to persons requesting such copies if the system operator who originally provided the data so authorizes the Secretary in writing.

(3) Copies of stored data may be made available to persons requesting such copies without authorization of the system operator after 10 years after the date of the generation of such data.

(4) Persons or system operators requesting and receiving copies of such data from the archive shall pay to the Secretary reasonable costs of reproduction and transmittal.

(5) Nothing in this subsection shall release the Secretary from the Secretary's obligation to provide data storage, maintenance, and access.

(e) In carrying out the functions of this section, the Secretary may use existing facilities or may contract with a private sector party or parties for performance of such functions, to the extent provided in advance by appropriations Acts.

NONREPRODUCTION

SEC. 603. Unprocessed land remote sensing data generated by any system operator under the provisions of this Act may be sold on the condition that such data shall not be reproduced and disseminated by the purchaser.

REIMBURSEMENT FOR ASSISTANCE

SEC. 604. The Administrator of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration, the Secretary of Defense, and the heads of other Federal agencies may provide assistance to operators of remote sensing systems under the provisions of this Act. Substantial assistance, such as launch services, shall be reimbursed by the operator.

RADIO FREQUENCY ALLOCATION

SEC. 605. The Federal Communications Commission is authorized and encouraged to allocate to any license holder under title IV of this Act access to Government radio frequencies and other civil radio frequencies appropriate for land remote sensing systems in a timely manner, consistent with the national interest.

CONSULTATION

SEC. 606. (a) The Secretary shall consult with the Secretary of Defense on all matters under this Act affecting national security. The Secretary of Defense shall be responsible for identifying and notifying the Secretary of those national security concerns of the United States which are relevant to activities under this Act.

(b) The Secretary shall consult with the Secretary of State on all international matters arising under this Act. The Secretary of State shall be responsible for identifying and notifying the Secretary of those international obligations and commitments of the United States which are relevant to activities under this Act.

By Mrs. HAWKINS:

S. 2294. A bill to require the registration of deposit brokers with the Securities and Exchange Commission, to require the Federal depository institution insuring agencies to better police the funds acquisition activities of newly insured and financially impaired depository institutions, to amend the Securities Exchange Act of 1934, the Federal Deposit Insurance Act, the National Housing Act, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs.

FEDERAL DEPOSIT INSURANCE REFORM ACT OF 1984

● Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, I am today introducing legislation to modernize and reform Federal Government insurance of deposits in banks and thrift institutions just as the Garn-St Germain Act, which the Congress passed in 1982, modernized and reformed the Nation's financial institutions. As a result of passage of the Garn-St Germain Act, financial institutions have become increasingly competitive. This is no less true when it comes to seeking new sources of funds for their deposits. Gathering deposits on a national basis through the use of brokerage intermediaries has become an increasingly popular and effective means of raising deposit dollars.

These changes in the way financial institutions raise their deposits have produced both positive and negative effects. The use of intermediaries to raise funds has made it possible for institutions of all sizes, including small- and medium-sized banks and thrift institutions, to tap national markets for their needed deposit dollars. This makes additional funds available for use in their local communities.

The brokerage intermediaries provide the consumer with an efficient vehicle for obtaining the maximum return on his or her investment dollars, consistent with the safety of Federal insurance of deposits. Financial institutions, too, use this new method to make their investment. Many credit unions, banks, and thrift institutions now place substantial amounts of idle funds with other institutions through brokerage intermediaries. Florida credit union managers tell me that with their small staffs there would be a great loss if they could not use brokers to seek out the highest return on investments.

At the same time, the Federal regulators have expressed concern that this ready availability of funds can lead to abuse by financial institutions and by the intermediaries who raise funds for them. They maintain that at the financial institution level, some institutions in weak financial condition have used brokerage firms to maintain their liquidity without giving adequate consideration to their ability to repay. Apparently some newly formed institutions, intent of rapid growth, have turned a virtue into a vice, and have grown faster than they are able to prudently invest,

Finally, because of uncertainty over the status of deposits as securities under the Federal securities laws, certain brokerage firms have not been subject to oversight of their activities by the Securities and Exchange Commission. This lack of oversight has been a major source of concern for Federal regulators and has left the consumer, without the protections which the Federal securities laws provide.

The Federal Deposit Insurance Reform Act of 1984, which I am introducing today, updates Federal law to bring it current with these important marketplace developments, the bill is simple and straightforward.

First, it updates the definitions of "broker" and "dealer" in the Federal Securities Exchange Act of 1934 by including persons in the business of engaging in transactions in deposits. Thus, these persons will be required to register with the Securities and Exchange Commission and will be subject to the requirements which apply to brokers and dealers which effect transactions in securities such as stocks and bonds. There is no good reason why the public should not have the protection which Federal securities laws provide when dealing with intermediaries who place deposits for them or engage in other transactions in deposits. As drafted, the bill would excempt from the definition of "broker" and "dealer," banks and thrift institutions, since they are already adequately supervised by the Federal banking agencies.

Second, the bill would recognize that the public can place deposits through registered broker-dealers and retain their insurance deposits. The bill rejects, as too extreme, a proposal by the Federal insurance agencies which would effectively deny insurance to members of the public who use registered brokers. Thus, the bill would preserve the benefits currently available to all insured institutions, including small- and medium-sized institutions, to raise capital on national markets—without the expense of national advertising campaigns or interstate branch networks. Often only the very largest institutions can afford to raise deposits in this way. The bill also means that the public can continue to enjoy the benefits of investing their dollars at maximum rates of interest with continued Federal insurance without the prohibitive expense of placing these funds themselves.

Third, the bill contains two important exceptions designed to safeguard the Federal insurance funds by granting the agencies the authority to restrict the use of brokers by new or financially impaired financial institutions.

In sum, the bill presents a balanced approach to the problem of bringing Federal insurance of deposits current with the marketplace realities of today. It reaffirms that insured deposits may be raised on a nationwide basis using qualified professionals. Finally, it recognizes that growth can be too much of a good thing, by providing authority to the agencies to limit growth for new or financially impaired institutions.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to join me in support of this legislation. I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be placed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2294

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Federal Deposit Insurance Reform Act of 1984".

SEC. 2. Section 3 (a) (4) of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 (15 U.S.C. 78c (a) (4)) is amended to read as follows:

"(4) The term 'broker' means any person engaged in the business of effecting transactions in securities or in deposits for the account of others, but does not include a bank of insured institution.".

SEC. 3. Section 3 (a) (5) of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 (15 U.S.C. 78c (a) (5)) is amended to read as follows:

"(5) The term 'dealer' means any person engaged in the business of buying and selling securities or deposits for his own account, through a broker or otherwise, but does not include a bank or insured institution, or any person insofar as he buys or sells securities or deposits for his own account, either individually or in some fiduciary capacity, but not as a part of a regular business.".

SEC. 4. Section 3 (a) of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 (15 U.S.C. 78c(a)) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"(41) The term 'deposits' means deposits of a bank which are, or are eligible to become, insured deposits within the meaning of section 3(m) of the Federal Deposit Insurance Act, or deposits or accounts of an insured institution which are, or are eligible to become, insured accounts within the meaning of section 401(c) of the National Housing Act.

"(42) The term 'insured institution' means an insured institution within the meaning of section 401(a) of the National Housing Act.".

SEC. 5. Section 3(m)(1) of the Federal Deposit Insurance Act (12 U.S.C. 1813(m)(1)) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following: "The Corporation may not deny or limit insurance coverage for any transaction involving an insured deposit effected by a broker or dealer, as those terms are defined in section 3(a) of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934, except in the case of a newly insured bank or a bank which is eligible for assistance pursuant to section 13(c) of this Act.".

SEC. 6. Section 405(a) of the National Housing Act (12 U.S.C. 1728(a)) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following: "The Corporation may not deny or limit insurance coverage for any transaction involving an insured account effected by a broker or dealer, as those terms are defined in section 3(a) of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934, except in the case of a newly insured institution or an insured institution which is eligible for assistance pursuant to section 406(f) of this Act.".

SEC. 7. The Securities and Exchange Commission, the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation, and the Board of Directors of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation shall each transmit an annual report to each House of the Congress respecting their implementation of the amendments made by this Act.●

By Mr. QUAYLE:

S. 2295. A bill to amend title 23, United States Code, to provide for purposes of determining the minimum allocation paid to any State, the amount of taxes treated as paid into the highway trust fund with respect to gasohol and certain methanol and ethanol fuels shall be determined as if such fuels were taxed as gasoline; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

HIGHWAY REVENUE EQUITY ACT

● Mr. QUAYLE. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce the Highway Revenue Equity Act which underscores one of our most important national priorities: The development and promotion of alternative energy sources, namely alcohol fuels or gasohol.

The purpose of this act is to correct an unintended consequence of the Surface Transportation Assistance Act of 1982. That law sought to find an equitable distribution formula for revenues paid into the highway trust fund, by guaranteeing each State a minimum 85-percent return on its revenues paid into the trust fund. Prior to this time, States such as Indiana, which has been diligent in building and maintaining its share of the interstate highway system, saw their gas tax payments diverted into other States and saw their highways and bridges begin to deteriorate. I strongly supported that 85-percent minimum payback provision in the Surface Transportation Assistance Act and I worked with a number of my like-minded colleagues to guarantee at least the 85-percent level of equity in the distribution of trust fund moneys which are critical to our highway system.

Now, however, we are faced with another situation which is simply unfair to States which produce and consume gasohol. My own State of Indiana, as well as other gasohol-consuming States, including California, Florida, Illinois, Michigan, North Carolina, Ohio, Oklahoma, Texas, and Wisconsin are being penalized by reduced payments from the highway trust fund—to the tune of millions of dollars.

We can all vividly remember the illustration of our Nation's dependence on foreign petroleum during the OPEC embargo of 1973 and the Iranian hostage crisis of 1979.

We all remember not only the long lines at service stations and skyrocketing cost of gasoline, but also the national humiliation of seeing ourselves held hostage by oil-rich nations. Such a scenario can be repeated if the unstable Mideastern nations decide to war among themselves or to punish the Western oil-importing nations once again. The citizens of this country strongly demanded at that time a national energy policy based on self-sufficiency, not foreign imports. One response adopted by Congress was the exemption of gasohol from the Federal excise tax on gasoline. Additionally, some 35 States seconded this effort by passing their own sales tax exemptions, designed to complement the current 5-cent Federal exemption, in an effort to promote gasohol sales.

The results of these incentives have been profound: In the month of January 1982, over 87 million gallons of gasohol were sold in this country. By December 1982, this figure had increased to over 280 million gallons sold per month, an increase of 322 percent in less than 1 year. The total gasohol sales throughout the country in 1982 were close to 2 billion gallons. In that 1 year, consumers saved 200 million gallons of gasoline by using gasohol as an alternative. In my own State of Indiana, gasohol sales have continued to dramatically increase to the point where almost 30 percent of all fuels sales in 1983 were gasohol. Along with other effective energy conservation and fuel-switching measures, we have succeeded in cutting our petroleum import bill by over 40 percent in just 5 years.

This success story is not without an unfortunate penalty. Most gasohol-consuming States are finding that as their gasohol sales have increased, their percentage allocations from the highway trust fund are decreasing. Indiana and the other 85 percent minimum States have been willing to promote gasohol consumption, but not at the expense of their highways. I believe that if we as a nation are committed to promoting alternative energy, we must support our States in their efforts to produce and consume gasohol. Even if Indiana did not subsidize the sale of gasohol—and the Indiana State Legislature is now considering an end to the existing 3-cent per gallon tax exemption—the favorable geographic location and strong local support would insure the continuing success of the gasohol industry in Indiana and other States which have supported its production and use.

The Surface Transportation Assistance Act provides that no State can receive from the highway trust fund less than 85 percent of its tax payments into that fund. Because gasohol is exempt from 5 cents of the Federal gasoline tax, the consumption of gasohol is excluded from the estimated tax payments made by each State into the trust fund. Consequently, gasohol-consuming States have been drastically hurt by the reduced return to highway trust fund moneys. Indiana will lose an estimated $21 million annually in highway trust fund moneys in fiscal year 1985 and following years because of increased gasohol sales stimulated by Federal and State tax incentives. The other 85 percent minimum payback States in this situation will lose a combined total of an estimated $122 million in highway trust fund moneys—funds which are critical to the maintenance and improvement of our highway system.

Furthermore, if Indiana and other States are forced into reducing their tax incentives for gasohol production and consumption by fear of losing highway trust fund moneys, this will only delay and impede our national effort to reduce dependence on foreign oil by developing our own national energy resources. I believe it is unfortunate that States like Indiana and several others, which tend to draw on alcohol fuels produced in other States because of the sales tax incentives, are being forced to move in reverse in their efforts to promote our national energy goals.

The legislation I am introducing today simply calls for the 85-percent minimum payback to be calculated based upon the State's contribution to the highway trust fund, as if gasohol sales are treated the same as gasoline sales. This legislation does not reduce the share of other States' allocations from the trust fund, nor does this legislation impair the integrity of the highway trust fund. The amount of moneys available for dispersal from the highway trust fund will still exceed the actual allocations made to the 85-percent minimum States, even after the adjustments for gasohol sales are computed. My bill is identical to one introduced as H.R. 3842 last year by my colleague from Indiana, Congressman SHARP.

No one will disagree that gasohol is an important component of our Nation's energy future. Its increased use has been successfully promoted in many States, and the reward for that success should not be the penalty of decreased allocations from the highway trust fund. If we truly want to provide incentives to indigenous sources of energy production, then we should not turn around and take this incentive away as we are currently doing through the highway trust fund allocations.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that after my remarks a copy of the Highway Revenue Equity Act be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2295

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. This Act may be cited as the "Highway Revenue Equity Act".

SEC. 2. Section 157(a) of title 23, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: "For the purpose of determining under this subsection the percentage or estimated tax payments attributable to highway users in any State paid into the Highway Trust Fund in any fiscal year, the amount paid into the Highway Trust Fund with respect to the sale of gasohol or qualified methanol or ethanol fuel by reason of the tax imposed by section 4041 (relating to special fuels) or 4081 (relating to gasoline) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 shall be treated as being equal to the amount which would have been so imposed with respect to such sale without regard to the following provisions of such code: section 4041(b)(2) (relating to exemption for qualified methanol and ethanol fuel), section 4041(k) (relating to reduced rate on fuels containing alcohol), and section 4081(c) (relating to reduced rate on gasoline mixed with alcohol).".

SEC. 3. The amendment made by this Act shall be effective for fiscal years beginning after September 30, 1984.●

By Mr. THURMOND:

S. 2296. A bill to permit the enlistment of a limited number of aliens in the Regular Army of the United States; to the Committee on Armed Services.

ENLISTMENT OF ALIENS IN THE ARMY OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, today I am introducing an updated version of legislation Congress passed more than three decades ago, known as the Lodge Act.

Under provisions of the Lodge Act, the Regular Army was allowed to enlist aliens without dependents between the ages of 18 and 35. This authority was granted for 3 years originally and was subsequently extended twice.

Mr. President, the original intent of the bill was to take advantage of the exodus of refugees from Eastern Europe following the Communist takeover of those countries.

In fact, there are still service members in the Army today who enlisted under provisions of the Lodge Act.

Mr. President, nations around the world are continuing to fall under the yoke of Communist rule and with that occurs a natural exodus of refugees. Previous experience with this measure produced some very fine and dedicated soldiers. Therefore, I feel that we could most certainly benefit again by passage of this legislation.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of this bill be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2296

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) notwithstanding section 3253 of title 10, United States Code, the Secretary of the Army may, under such regulations as he may prescribe and subject to the approval of the Secretary of State, accept original enlistments and reenlistments in the Regular Army of not more than 2,500 qualified aliens, without dependents, who are not less than eighteen years of age or more than thirty-five years of age.

(b) An alien may not be accepted for an original enlistment in the Regular Army under this Act for a term of less than five years. The term of reenlistments may be for such terms as the Secretary of the Army shall prescribe with the approval of the Secretary of State.

(c) Persons enlisted or reenlisted in the Regular Army under the authority of this Act shall be integrated into established units of the Army with citizen members and may not be segregated into separate organizations for aliens.

(d) An alien may not be enlisted or reenlisted in the Regular Army under this Act after September 30, 1987.

(e) An alien enlisted or reenlisted in the Regular Army pursuant to this Act who—

(1) subsequently enters the United States (or any territory or possession of the United States) pursuant to military orders;

(2) is otherwise qualified for citizenship;

(3) has completed five or more years of active duty in the Regular Army; and

(4) has been honorably discharged therefrom;

shall be deemed to have been lawfully admitted to the United States for permanent residence within the meaning of section 316(a) of the Immigration and Nationality Act (8 U.S.C. 1427).

By Mr. DOLE (for himself, Mr. DENTON, Mr. GRASSLEY, Mr. BENTSEN, Mr. HATCH, and Mr. JEPSEN)

S. 2299. A bill entitled the "Anti-Fraudulent Adoption Practices Act of 1984;" to the Committee on the Judiciary.

ANTI-FRAUDULENT ADOPTION PRACTICES ACT OF 1984

● Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I take this opportunity to introduce today the Anti-Fraudulent Adoption Practices Act of 1984. I am pleased to state that Senators DENTON, GRASSLEY, BENTSEN, HATCH, and JEPSEN join with me in sponsoring this very important legislation that will provide important legal protections to adoptive parents and birth mothers who might be victimized by the activities of persons who solicit money for the performance of adoption services that are never rendered.

The need for this legislation lies in a national tragedy which only recently came to my attention. It is a tragedy of people who prey on the emotions and frustrations of couples longing for children, of confused and distraught unwed mothers, and who do so with complete disregard for the welfare of the children who are the subject of adoption efforts. Early this year, Mr. John Grubb, police chief of the small town of Chase, Kans., contacted me about an alleged adoption scam which, he stated, had resulted in several couples in my State being defrauded of large sums of money upon the promise of adoption services that were not performed. Couples seeking to adopt children were promised, by the perpetrators of this scheme, that children available for adoption could be provided from the country of Mexico in a relatively short period of time and with little difficulty. Thousands of dollars were then obtained from these couples, who believed that their years of frustration and waiting would soon be ended. Tragically, however, their problems—as they soon discovered—were just beginning.

While some children were actually made available, as promised, early in the activities of this organization, the majority of the couples from whom money was obtained were left with neither their hopes fulfilled nor their money returned.

Information brought to my attention by victims and law enforcement officers in a number of States indicated that these fraudulent adoption activities may have been carried on in as many as 22 States, and involved over 100 couples. I and other Senators who join with me on this bill have requested that the FBI, INS, and IRS conduct a coordinated investigation to determine the precise extent of the problem.

The purpose of the legislation that is being introduced today is to provide additional statutory protections to those who might be victimized by a fraud of this type. In our examination of the laws governing adoptions, it has become apparent to us that a significant gap exists in the law's ability to prevent abuses of this type occurring. That gap occurs when the parties who operate so-called grey market adoption rings operate across State lines and in foreign commerce. The reason for this is quite simple: The States have only that degree of authority that can be exercised within their own boundaries. While one State may have laws that may be aggressively used to prosecute or prevent such acts, a neighboring State may not; and thus, the control of interstate adoption rings that operate nationwide is of necessity a Federal responsibility.

The legislation would accomplish two primary objectives: It would create a series of new Federal criminal statutes that are designed to; first, prohibit fraudulent acts in connection with the offer or performance of adoption services; second, prohibit the payment of compensation over and above expenses for adoption services performed, by limiting such compensation to fees of a State licensed adoption service, attorneys, and doctors providing professional assistance in connection with an adoption; and third, provide for civil remedies in the U.S. district courts for adoptive parents and birth mothers who are defrauded.

This bill is not intended to usurp the legitimate authority of the States to regulate adoption practices within the State as they see fit. What it is intended to accomplish is to provide uniform, national penalties and remedies for persons who are victimized by fraudulent adoption rings operating in interstate and foreign commerce.

Finally, I and my colleagues who join me in sponsoring the bill wish to make it clear that the bill is not meant, in any way, to prohibit or even discourage the availability of adoption services outside of the community of State licensed adoption agencies. The bill specifically excludes agreements between adoptive parents and birth mothers which may involve the payment of legitimate fees to professionals who perform valid services incident to the adoption from the reach of its provisions.

We look forward to working together in conducting hearings on the bill, and hope for early consideration in our respective committees. We believe the legislation will find favor with the vast majority of our colleagues and we welcome any and all who may wish to cosponsor.

Thank you, Mr. President. I ask unanimous consent that a brief summary of the bill included in the RECORD at the conclusion of these remarks.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SECTIONAL ANALYSIS—ANTI-FRAUDULENT ADOPTION PRACTICES ACT OF 1984

Sec. 101—Amends title 18 of the United States Code by providing for criminal sanctions for anyone committing fraud in the offering or providing of adoption services in international or interstate commerce. Sets a maximum penalty of $10,000 or 5 years or both.

Also provides criminal sanctions for anyone who solicits or receives compensation for arranging adoptions with the exception of: 1.) licensed agencies, 2.) fees received for professional medical or legal services, 3.) natural parent of a child and 4.) prospective adoptive parents. Sets a maximum penalty of $10,000 or 5 years or both for a violation.

Also provides criminal sanctions for anyone who uses force or duress to cause another person to travel in interstate or international commerce in connection with an adoption. Sets a maximum penalty of $20,000 or 10 years or both for a violation.

Defines certain terms used in this section.

Sec. 102—Technical change of chapter index.

Sec. 103—Amends title 42 of the United States Code by strengthening the Department of Health and Human Services' role in collecting adoption data, developing model adoption legislation for use by the States and investigating means to help the States in prosecuting violations of adoption laws.

Sec. 104—Opens the federal district courts to anyone who has been defrauded by an adoption service, regardless of the amount in controversy. Also allows for appropriate punitive damages and attorney's fee.●

● Mr. DENTON. Mr. President, I am pleased to join my colleague from Kansas, Senator DOLE, in the introduction of the Anti-Fraudulent Adoption Practices Act of 1984, as an original cosponsor.

The genesis for our proposed bill is the exposure of an adoption ring which promised children from Mexico to couples in 20 States. There have been several press accounts including a series of investigative reporting articles in the Fort Worth Star-Telegram.

These heartbreaking stories of so many disappointed families and vulnerable biological mothers exploited by false promises prompted me to work in cooperation with Senator DOLE to begin to explore remedies to the tragedy of black market adoption.

While I know of no such similar tragic cases of fraudulent adoption activities involving Alabama families, the potential certainly exists for families to be defrauded in much the same way as the couples who never received children from Mexico. I believe that some of my constituents may need protection in this regard, and this has been confirmed by an adoption expert in my State. I feel that the Anti-Fraudulent Adoption Practices Act will provide such protection for Alabamians.

As chairman of the Subcommittee on Family and Human Services, I have held several hearings on adoption in the past 3 years and the issue of black-market adoptions has often surfaced.

I have legislative jurisdiction over adoption services matters, including the Adoption Opportunities Act. This act directs the Secretary of the Department of Health and Human Services "* * * to study the nature, scope and effects of the placement of children in adoptive homes * * * by persons or agencies which are not licensed by or subject to regulation by any government entity."

In the Labor and Human Resources Committee report, which accompanies this legislation (S. 1003, the Child Abuse Prevention and Treatment and Adoption Reform Act Amendments of 1983), we have stated: "The committee supports and encourages legal interstate adoption; however, it remains concerned about the operation of illegal, black-market adoption activities which often occur across State lines."

Therefore, I will be making a request to Secretary Heckler to carefully examine the black-market activities which have been recently exposed and make suggestions to the States about ways the enforcement of the interstate compact for the placement of children can be vastly improved for nonagency adoptions.

Furthermore, I would like to see the Department of Health and Human Services, using the Department of Justice's expertise, help States develop better procedures for prosecuting those persons who operate illegal adoption rings.

I feel privileged to be working on the development of the Anti-Fraudulent Adoption Practices Act with as knowledgeable a person as Senator DOLE who, as chairman of the Finance Committee, also has jurisdiction over important adoption and foster care programs.

The proposal includes the following features:

Criminal penalties for any person who defrauds prospective adoptive parents or biological parents;

Civil remedies for prospective adoptive parents or biological parents who have been defrauded;

Criminal penalties for any person who coerces or entices biological parents or adoptive parents, or who makes a profit from arranging an adoption; and Activities for the Department of Health and Human Services which would aid States in prosecuting illegal adoption activities.

I look forward to working with Senator DOLE, with the other Senators cosponsoring this bill, and with concerned organizations in a sincere attempt to end black-market adoption activities which create tragedy for too many American families.●

● Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, I believe that my distinguished colleague from Kansas, Senator DOLE, has clearly outlined the need for this legislation. It is evident that this issue transcends the boundaries of a particular State or locality. While State law is applicable in cases where adoptions are intrastate, interstate adoptions have a potential vacuum inherent in the unavailability of sanctions for fraudulent practices.

In my own State of Iowa, 20 couples have listed complaints with the Office of Consumer Fraud. About eight of those couples are Iowans and the stories that they tell are mixed with frustration and dashed hopes. Linda and Mike Davis of Wapello, Iowa were promised that a child would be placed with them through a Mexican adoption agency with a local contact; 2 years and $5,000 later—no child. When asked about that period of her life, Linda Davis told my office, "How do you put a measure on an emotional rollercoaster? We were promised time after time that a child would be in our home within days, only to be continually disappointed—it was a terrible strain on our marriage."

By far the majority of adoptions in this country are conducted in a legal manner, providing valuable service to thousands of Americans seeking to open their homes to needy children and enrich the lives of all concerned. As the numbers of available children for adoption drop, families become the easy prey of scam operations. The legislation before us would impose the appropriate sanctions in such cases of abuse. And importantly, the Federal Government will focus on gathering information in an area that is lacking in statistical information.

I am pleased to add my name as a supporter of this legislation. I urge all of my colleagues to cosponsor this bill.●

● Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, I join my distinguished colleague from Kansas in introducing S. 2299, the Anti-Fraudulent Adoption Practices Act of 1984.

A recent series of articles that appeared in the Fort Worth Star Telegram clearly demonstrates the need for this legislation. According to those reports, a small group of unlicensed independent adoption brokers may have defrauded nearly 40 couples of up to $7,000 apiece by promising to find them adoptable babies.

Allegations of deceptive adoptive practices by this group have been made by couples in at least 20 States—from Hawaii to Pennsylvania. And if the accused brokers are to be believed, the actual number of fraudulent agreements may be as high as 400. One of the most serious allegations stemming from these reports is the charge that pregnant women are smuggled into the United States as a way of circumventing immigration requirements relating to adoption.

Unfortunately, Mr. President, the seamy scenario I have described may only represent the tip of the iceberg in the largely unregulated world of international and interstate adoption. A review of recent adoption statistics points to this unfortunate conclusion. Last year, according to the National Committee for Adoption, an estimated 2 million American couples were waiting to adopt children. Of these, only 60,000 were able to obtain a child. Foreign and interstate placements account for nearly 14 percent of reported adoptions—we have no reliable estimates of unreported independent placements.

As an adoptive parent, I sympathize with the desire of all prospective parents to bring a child into their homes. And I believe that States, whose jurisdiction over family law is well established, should continue to exercise primary responsibility for regulation of adoption practices. However, because a significant number of adoptions occur outside the reach of State statute, the Federal Government has a responsibility to insure against deliberate and unconsionable deception of vulnerable children and their families—both natural and adoptive.

Under the provisions of our bill, the Federal Government would work in concert with States to supplement—and not supplant—State adoption statutes. This much needed measure would make fraudulent practices by an adoption service that operates between States or internationally a Federal crime punishable by a fine of up to $10,000 and imprisonment of up to 5 years. Enactment of S. 2299 will provide access to the Federal courts for both prospective parents and pregnant mothers. In addition, this legislation will direct the Secretary of Health and Human Services to join with States in reviewing all adoption legislation to determine whether improvements in existing law should be made as a means of better insuring that adoptive children and their parents are protected.

I hope my colleagues will agree with the objectives of this bill and join us to secure its swift passage.●

● Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, it was recently reported in my home State of Utah that 21 couples wanting to be parents were defrauded in an alleged adoption scam. Through a Southwestern agency, these prospective parents and many others were told of special arrangements in which they could adopt orphaned Mexican children. However, the adoption agency in question seemed to have no intention of fulfilling, in good faith, its side of the contract. Thousands of dollars were lost, with inestimable emotional travail for the brokenhearted prospective parents. Their acute pain is not as great, however, as was the trauma of the young Mexican woman who paid the same Southwestern agency to send her daughters to temporarily live in U.S. homes. She planned to later immigrate and rejoin them, only to find that they had been permanently adopted by another American family who were similarly deceived by the disreputable firm in question.

Despite growing instances of these problems, there are no Federal statutes to prosecute those who victimize prospective parents with their agencies' fraudulent claims. There is no practical recourse for the waiting parents-to-be. There is no recourse for those who have been tricked into giving up their children. The Federal Government can investigate and uncover certain wrongdoings, but cannot effectively prosecute the accused perpetrators because of preexisting statutes of questionable relevance. There are today no criminal statutes to directly punish interstate or foreign adoption agencies guilty of fraudulent practices.

The examples of fraudulent practices I earlier described give adoption a bad name. Yet, adoption is an important part of American family life. But my heart reaches out to those who have been criminally victimized by those who would profit at the expense of a couple's desire to be parents of an adoptable child. I am also thinking of those parents who were misled about their legal guardian rights. For these reasons, I am pleased to be among the original cosponsors of legislation being introduced today by Senators DOLE, GRASSLEY, DENTON and me, entitled, the Anti-Fraudulent Adoption Act of 1984.

Our legislation makes adoption fraud a Federal offense carrying a maximum penalty of 5 years in prison and a $10,000 fine. It further opens the Federal courts to damage lawsuits by prospective parents and other victims of adoption agencies convicted of fraud. The bill also prohibits private adoption agencies from charging more than a "reasonable fee," attorneys' fees, medical services provided to the mother of the adoptive child, or other agency services.

This legislation does not restrict legal adoptions. Obviously, adoption is an important part of many American families. It simply increases the likelihood that adoption practices are ethically and legally aboveboard. I am hopeful that this legislation will minimize, if not end altogether, the fraudulent activities that may occur in private placement adoption agencies. I encourage my colleagues to join us in this effort.●

By Mr. COHEN (for himself, Mr. PERCY, and Mr. LEVIN):

S. 2300. A bill to amend the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949 to authorize multiyear contracts in certain cases; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

CIVILIAN AGENCY MULTIYEAR CONTRACTING ACT OF 1984

● Mr. COHEN. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation—the Civilian Agency Multiyear Contracting Act—which authorizes civilian procuring agencies to enter into multiyear contracts, not to exceed 5 years, when such contracts are determined to be in the Government's best interest. I am pleased to have Senators PERCY and LEVIN as cosponsors.

Each year, the Federal Government spends more than half of its discretionary budget on the procurement of property and services, ranging from weapons systems to janitorial services, from the private sector. In fiscal 1983, Government contracts worth over $175 billion were awarded. I am convinced that significant economies can be realized through the effective implementation of procurement reforms.

One such procurement reform, which enjoys widespread support within the procurement community, is multiyear contracting. Under the Federal Acquisition Regulation, effective April 1, 1984, multiyear contracting may be used when no-year or multiyear funds are available or, in the case of 1-year funds, when multiyear contracting is specifically authorized by statute. Otherwise, the Anti-Deficiency Act (31 U.S.C. 1341 et seq.) precludes contractual agreements requiring direct obligations in excess or in advance of appropriations.

The Department of Defense was granted broad multiyear contracting authority in 1980 (10 U.S.C. 2306(h)). My legislation would extend this authority Governmentwide and allow civilian procuring agencies to contract on a multiyear basis, provided the following criteria are met. First, appropriations must be available for the first year of the multiyear contract and there must be a reasonable expectation that, during the remaining years the contract is in effect, additional funding will be requested. Second, the agency head awarding the multiyear contract must determine that the contract will serve the best interests of the Government by No. 1, reducing costs, No. 2, promoting economies in administration, performance, and operation, No. 3, increasing quality of performance by or service from the contractor, and No. 4, encouraging effective competition. Third, during the proposed contract period, there will be a continuing need for the property or services, and such minimum need is expected to remain substantially and such minimum need is expected to remain substantially unchanged. Fourth, the specifications for the property or services being procured are expected to be reasonably stable. And fifth, the use of such contracting method will not inhibit small business participation.

Support for multiyear contracting dates back to the Commission on Government Procurement. In 1972, the Commission reported to Congress that the advantages of multiyear contracting exceed the disadvantages, and recommended that such method should be used, when appropriate, governmentwide. The General Accounting Office agreed in a 1978 report, entitled "Federal Agencies Should Be Given Multiyear Contracting Authority for Supplies and Services," recommending that legislation should be enacted, with appropriate safeguards, to provide such authority. The Office of Federal Procurement Policy also endorsed the concept of governmentwide multiyear contracting in its February 1982 proposal for a Uniform Federal Procurement System, as did the Grace Commission in its June 1983 Report on Procurement.

In preparing this legislation, I solicited the views of the procurement community to determine the potential benefits of multiyear contracting and the areas in which multiyear contracting would be used. I received responses from the following civilian agencies, contracting associations, and organizations, all of which supported the concept of multiyear contracting: the General Services Administration, the Department of Energy, the Department of Interior, the Department of Agriculture, the Department of Commerce, the Small Business Administration, the Department of Housing and Urban Development, the Computer and Business Equipment Manufacturers Association, the Associated General Contractors of America, the Aerospace Industries Association, the Electronics Industries Association, the Professional Services Council, the American Bar Association, and the National Academy of Public Administration.

According to the responses I received, there are numerous benefits associated with multiyear contracting. First, the Government stands to save money. Multiyear contracting authority, used appropriately, would provide significant reductions in the cost of procurement resulting from lower contract prices as well as lower administrative expenses. Annual contracts frequently involve start-up costs which must be recovered during the year. This has a direct impact on the price of property or services offered to the Government. Under a multiyear contract, such nonrecurring costs could be prorated over the life of the contract, thus reducing the unit cost of the work performed and consequently the price offered to the Government.

In some cases, multiyear contracting would allow agencies to take advantage of greater price discounts. As an example, the General Services Administration recently analyzed the pricing practices of a major automated data processing (ADP) equipment vendor, which showed that the vendor's pricing structure varied significantly based on its customer's ability to commit for multiple-year leases of equipment. Those customers—all commercial—who would commit to a 5-year lease were granted discounts ranging from 62 to 75 percent of the 1-year rates. The maximum volume discounts given to those customers who could only commit to a single year was 5 percent of the 1-year rate. In effect, customers such as the Government who leased equipment for several years, but who could only contractually commit themselves to a lease of 1 year, have paid as much in 2 years as other customers pay in 5 years.

Administrative costs to the Government could also be reduced. For annual contracts, agencies expend a significant amount of time and money to accomplish a variety of contract formation functions, including market research, preparation of solicitations, evaluation of offers, negotiation of price, terms and conditions, and technical analyses. Agencies could reduce their cost of doing business if these administrative activities were performed on other than an annual schedule. Similarly, multiyear contracting would reduce prospective contractors' administrative costs associated with bid or proposal preparation.

According to the 1978 GAO report, the GSA administered approximately 390 single-year janitorial contractors costing $43 million and approximately 2,000 single-year trash removal contracts costing about $7 million. Analysis by GSA officials at the time indicated that savings of $1.6 million annually could be achieved if the contracts were awarded for 4-year terms. This would amount to savings of $6.4 million over the life of the contracts. The estimated savings would accrue, according to the GAO, from reduced administrative requirements prior to contract award and improved operations efficiency through continuity in contract mangagement.

In addition to the savings in contract prices and administrative costs, the quality of performance and service from contractors could improve. The GAO stated in its 1978 report that multiyear contracting can improve contractor performance and service by reducing the uncertainty of continued Government business, providing continuity in the delivery of recurring supply and service needs, and enabling the contractor to maintain a stable, well-trained work force. The quality of the work performed generally improves during the contract term. Where annual contracts are required, the impact of the initial stages of the performance learning curve is felt each year. By using multiyear contracts, this impact is felt only in the initial year of the contract.

Finally, competition for contracts could increase. Many companies are unwilling or unable to make significant capital investments for 1-year contracts. Multiyear contracts would make such undertakings more attrative by providing longer periods of assured business, thereby stimulating competition. Small businesses in particular would now be able to bid for multiyear contracts by prorating nonrecurring startup costs which, for a 1-year contract, would preclude these businesses from competing. Moreover, by extending the Government's commitment to the contractor, multiyear contracting encourages financial assistance for small businesses enabling them to improve their competitive position.

An example of an annual procurement which would have been competitive had it been awarded on a multiyear basis involves a GSA contract for converting waste into fuel. The GSA received proposals from firms indicating an interest in contracting with GSA to collect trash from Federal buildings, convert it into refuse-derived fuel, and sell it back to GSA for burning in Federal heating plants. GSA's contracting authority for such a service contract, however, is currently limited to a 1-year period. Considering the large front end investment that would be required for a contractor to acquire the necessary equipment and facilities, potential contractors were unwilling to make such an investment for a 1-year contract. According the GSA, if multiyear contracting authority were enacted, GSA would be able to contract competitively for conversion of waste to fuel, with anticipated savings in cost and energy resources.

There are some disadvantages involved in multiyear contracting. By definition, Congress relinquishes a certain degree of control over the purse strings by permitting agencies to obligate funds in the outyears. The risk in making such a commitment is that the Government could be locked into prices that may subsequently decrease due to an economic downturn or a technological breakthrough. My legislation safeguards against this risk by establishing criteria that must be met before a multiyear contract can be used.

Congress also has the discretion to cancel or terminate a multiyear contract. There are, however, costs involved. Agencies are required under my legislation to pay cancellation or termination costs from appropriated funds which were either originally available for performance of the contract, currently available, but not otherwise obligated, for the procurement of similar property or services, or made available for the payment of such costs.

According to agency responses to the Oversight Subcommittee's survey, the prospective uses of multiyear contracting are varied and numerous. The General Services Administration anticipates that multiyear contracting could be used for recurring support services, such as janitorial, maintenance, and repair of real and personal property, protection, trash, and snow removal services. GSA would also consider using such authority selectively in the procurement of certain common use supplies and ADP and telecommunications equipment. Multiyear contracting could also be used for small demand items which, when bought in larger quantities, might encourage increased competition.

The Department of Agriculture listed numerous areas in which multiyear contracting would be considered, including shuttle bus service, janitorial services, requirement contracts for items such as back tags for cattle and bleeding needles, food stamp production, ADP services and equipment, telecommunication services and equipment, reforestation projects, road maintenance projects, and construction.

The Department of Interior stated that multiyear contracting may be used for construction programs, research programs, service contracts, such as janitorial and other routine services, management and operating contracts, seedling production, and reforestation contracts. Leases of equipment, in appropriate circumstances, would also be considered as possible candidates.

The National Academy of Public Administration put together a laundry list of potential uses, including first, procurement of services, such as janitorial, maintenance, utilities and a wide variety of building and base operations; second, lease-purchase arrangements, such as photocopying, communications, and computer equipment; third, high-volume usage of commercial articles, such as copying paper, typewriters, other office supplies, and automobiles; and fourth, procurement of specially designed equipment or highly specialized capital items, where a large investment is required in plant or equipment which could be amortized over several years.

Considering these many uses of multiyear contracting and the benefits to be gained, I am hopeful that my colleagues will lend their support to this legislative proposal.

I ask unanimous consent that a copy of the Civilian Agency Multiyear Contracting Act, along with a section-by-section analysis, be included in the RECORD following my statement.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS

Section 1.—The short title of this bill is the Civilian Agency Multiyear Contracting Act of 1984.

Section 2.—Section 2 amends title III of the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949 (41 U.S.C. 251 et seq.) by adding after section 305 (41 U.S.C. 255) a new section 306 on Multiyear Contracts.

Section 306(a) defines "multiyear contract" to mean a contract for the purchase of property or services for a period not exceeding five years.

Section 306(b) establishes the following criteria which must be met before an agency head may enter into a multiyear contract:

First, appropriations are available for the first year of the multiyear contract, and there is a reasonable expectation that, during the remaining years the contract is in effect, additional funding will be requested (section 306(b)(1)).

Second, the agency head awarding the multiyear contract determines that: (A) the contract will serve the best interests of the Government by reducing costs, promoting ecomonies in administration, performance and operation, increasing quality, and encouraging competition; (B) during the proposed contract period, there will be a continuing need for the property or services, and such minimum need is expected to remain substantially unchanged; (C) the specifications for the property or services being procured are expected to be reasonably stable; and (D) the multiyear contract will not inhibit small business participation (section 306(b)(2)).

Section 306(c) states that a multiyear contract may include a provision which makes performance under the contract for the second and subsequent years contingent on appropriations for such years, and a provision for the payment of a reasonable cancellation charge to the contractor if the performance of the multiyear contract is cancelled.

Section 306(d) provides that a multiyear contract shall be cancelled or terminated if appropriated funds are not available. In such case, the cost of the cancellation or termination shall be paid from appropriated funds which were either originally available for performance of the contract, currently available (but not otherwise obligated) for the procurement of similar property or services, or made available for the payment of such cost.

Section 306(e) states that this legislation was not intended to modify or affect any other provision of law which authorizes multiyear contracting.

Section 3.—Section 3 sets the effective date of this legislation at contracts entered into after September 30, 1984.

S. 2300

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Civilian Agency Multiyear Contracting Act of 1984".

SEC. 2. (a) Title III of the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949 (41 U.S.C. 251 et seq.) is amended by inserting after section 305 (41 U.S.C. 255) the following new section:

"MULTIYEAR CONTRACTS

"SEC. 306. (a) For the purposes of this section, the term 'multiyear contract', when used with respect to the purchase of property or services, means a contract for the purchase of property or services for a period not exceeding five years.

"(b) An agency head may enter into a multiyear contract for the purchase of property or services when—

"(1)(A) appropriations are available and adequate for the payment for such purchase only for the first fiscal year during which the contract is in effect; and

"(B) there is reasonable expectation that, during the period which the contract is in effect, such agency head will request funding for the contract at the level necessary to avoid concellation of the performance under, or termination of, the contract; and

"(2) such agency head determines that—

"(A) such a contract will serve the best interests of the Government by—

"(i) reducing costs under the contract;

"(ii) promoting economies in administration, performance, and operation;

"(iii) increasing quality of performance by or service from the contractor;

"(iv) encouraging effective competition;

"(B) during the proposed contract period—

"(i) there will be a continuing or recurring need for the property or services; and

"(ii) the minimum need for the property or services to be purchased is expected to remain substantially unchanged in terms of rate of production or performance, rate of purchase, and total quantity or extent of services;

"(C) the specifications for the property or services are expected to be reasonably stable, and the technical risks associated with the purchase are not excessive; and

"(D) such a contract will not inhibit small business concerns from submitting a bid or proposal for such contract.

"(c) A multiyear contract authorized by this section may include—

"(1) a provision that the performance under the contract during the second or any subsequent fiscal year included in the contract term is contingent on the appropriation of funds for such year; and

"(2) a provision for the payment of a reasonable cancellation charge to the contractor if the performance is cancelled pursuant to a provision described in clause (1).

"(d)(1) If appropriated funds are not available for expenditure on a multiyear contract during the second or subsequent fiscal year included in the contract term, the performance under the contract shall be cancelled for such fiscal year or the contract shall be terminated.

"(2) Any cost of the cancellation of performance under, or termination of, the contract shall be paid from appropriated funds which—

"(A) were originally available for performance of the contract;

"(B) are then currently available for the acquisition of similar property or services and are not otherwise obligated; or

"(C) are made available for the payment of such costs.

"(e) Nothing in this section is intended to modify or affect any other provision of law which authorizes multiyear contracting and is in effect on the date of enactment of the Civilian Agency Multiyear Contracting Act of 1984.".

(b) The table of contents at the beginning of such Act is amended by striking out the item relating to section 306 and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"306. Multiyear contracts.".

SEC. 3. The amendments made by section 2 of this Act shall take effect with respect to contracts entered into after September 30, 1984.●

By Mr. HATCH (for himself, Mrs. HAWKINS and Mr. INOUYE):

S. 2301. A bill to revise and extend programs for the provision of health services and preventive health services to establish a program for the provision of home and community-based services, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

HEALTH SERVICES, PREVENTIVE HEALTH SERVICES AND HOME AND COMMUNITY BASED SERVICES ACT OF 1984

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, today I am introducing the Health Services, Preventive Health Services and Home and Community Based Services Act of 1984. This bill would reauthorize the preventive health and health services block grant, the home health-care training program, and the tuberculosis, venereal disease, immunization programs. In addition, would authorize a home and community-based health services block grant and a 3-year demonstration project related to improving emergency medical services for children.

The bill includes reauthorization of the preventive health and health services block grant for fiscal year 1985 through fiscal year 1988. In order to receive allotments, States must prepare and submit to the Secretary descriptions of the intended uses of funds received. These descriptions must be made public in such a manner as to facilitate public comment.

States may use allotments for:

First. Preventive health services programs for the control of rodents, and community and school-based fluoridation programs;

Second. Establishing and maintaining preventive health service programs for screening, diagnosis, prevention, and referral for treatment of hypertension;

Third. Community-based programs for the purpose of demonstrating and evaluating optimal methods of organizing and delivering comprehensive preventive health services to defined populations, comprehensive programs designed to deter smoking and the use of alcoholic beverages among children and adolescents, and other risk-reduction and health-education programs;

Fourth. Comprehensive public health services formerly provided by States under section 314 of the Public Health Service Act.

Fifth. Provide grants and contracts to support establishment of home health agencies in areas where the services of such agencies are not available;

Sixth. Provide grants to support demonstration projects for the expansion and improvement of emergency medical service systems, including services for the treatment of critically ill children; and Seventh. Providing services to rape victims and for rape prevention.

This block grants for health protection and disease prevention has offered the States the opportunity to effectively administer the resources provided. The decentralization of decisionmaking processes from the Federal level to the States has worked, and States have responsibly assigned priorities to meet those health needs which are determined to be most pressing in their respective geographic region. Preliminary data from a soon to be released GAO report cites the overall effectiveness of the block grant approach to addressing many of our Nation's most serious, and preventable, public health problems.

The bill also reauthorizes the childhood immunization, tuberculosis, and venereal disease programs for fiscal years 1985, 1986, and 1987. These programs are high-priority preventive health services which are carried out in a partnership between the Federal Government, States, and localities. They are very important programs, critical to our Nation's public health. It is my hope, therefore, that the Appropriations Committee will see fit to fund them at the full authorization levels I am requesting.

Specifically, authorization levels of $35 million, $37.5 million, and $40 million for fiscal years 1985, 1986, and 1987, respectively, would be set for the childhood immunization program. Appropriation administration of safe and effective vaccines is one of the most cost-effective methods of preventing human suffering and reducing the economic costs resulting from vaccine-preventable disease. Without question, immunization programs make an important contribution to the public health as well as being cost effective. I would note the encouraging fact that immunization levels are at an all-time high of 95 percent, and cases of measles, rubella, tetanus, polio, and mumps have reached alltime lows.

For projects and programs for the prevention and control of venereal disease, this legislation would authorize levels of $50 million, $55 million, and $55 million for fiscal years 1985 through 1987. Although the programs for the prevention and control of venereal disease have made great strides in recent years in the treatment of gonorrhea and syphilis, there is still room for improvement. In 1984, it is estimated that outreach programs will provide services to 9.3 million adolescents and young adults. These efforts will prevent an estimated 6,500 cases of syphilis and more than 179,000 cases of gonorrhea and will result in the treatment of more than 760,000 veneral-disease patients. Currently, the venereal-disease-control program is focused primarily on syphilis and gonorrhea, but other sexually transmitted diseases are on the increase in this country. Research and treatment of genital herpes and nongonococcal urethritis are two problems which should receive additional attention. I would not think that many of the victims of sexually transmitted disease are innocent babies who acquire these diseases at birth. Increased emphasis should be appropriately placed on prenatal and neonatal care of these children.

This bill also authorizes preventive health service programs for tuberculosis at levels of $8 million, $9 million, and $10 million for fiscal years 1985, 1986, and 1987 respectively. This compares to a fiscal year 1984 appropriation of $5 million. Tuberculosis is still a major health concern and risk throughout the Nation, particularly in large cities and areas that have experienced significant refugee influx. Tuberculosis is medically treatable. The continuation of efforts to curb its growth could lead to its ultimate eradication. Thus, continuation of tuberculosis outreach programs to high incidence areas is a priority preventive health service for the Federal Government. I would like to note my respect for the outstanding efforts of my distinguished colleague from Florida, Senator PAULA HAWKINS, to focus the Senate's attention on the need for an effective tuberculosis-treatment program.

A new authority would also provide States with block grant funds to: coordinate all community-based and home health services; identify elderly and disabled individuals at risk of institutionalization; determine the needs of individual community based; make recommendations for cost-effective measures to meet those needs; and provide basic in-home support services, for example, homemaker/home health aide, for qualifying individuals.

Eligibility under the block grant would be limited to disabled individuals and elderly individuals who are over 65 and who are at risk of institutionalization. States must also assure that services provided under the block grant are not duplicative of those provided under other Federal programs.

Funds for this block would first be authorized at $20 million for fiscal year 1985 to enable States to plan and implement the block grant. Authorization levels of $150 million, $200 million, and $200 million are then authorized for 1986, 1987, and 1988 respectively for home and community-based services.

Home health care can result in enormous cost savings over the long run. There is a clear and audible consensus among health experts and representatives of elderly and disabled organizations to reorient our national health policy. At present there is an emphasis on institutionalized long-term care, and we need to encourage more appropriate nursing home care and improved home health services.

I have been involved in home healthcare legislation for the past 4 years. Although it has been a long and arduous process to develop a commitment within Congress regarding home health care, I feel we have been successful although much more needs to done.

I plan to continue to make home health care a major issue that Congress must deal with until programs are implemented that will improve the delivery of home services for our elderly and disabled citizens. That is why this legislation includes this home and community-based health services block grant. The proposal is a modification of my earlier bill, S. 1539.

Unless viable community-based services are developed to prevent unnecessary institutionalization of the elderly and disabled we can only expect that the numbers of persons in nursing homes will grow, especially as the proportion of elderly individuals in the population increases at a faster rate than other age categories. Congress, through the States, must act to assure an adequate, cost-effective, and humane alternative is readily available through home health care.

Finally, this bill would amend title XIX of the Public Health Service Act by providing a demonstration program relating the emergency health care for children who need treatment for trauma or critical care. Under the program, $2 million per year would be authorized for fiscal year 1985 through fiscal year 1987 for 1-year grants to no more than four States in any fiscal year. This will allow 12 States to participate over the 3 years although the Secretary may renew a demonstration project for 1 additional fiscal year if it is determined that the extension of the project will provide a significant benefit which will be useful to other States.

Of all the patients receiving care in hospital emergency departments approximately 20 to 35 percent are children. Yet various statistics suggest that insufficient attention has been placed on the needs of children. Although our emergency medical services programs have demonstrated their extraordinary ability to save lives, special priority needs to be given to upgrading their capacity to provide emergency care for children who are critically ill. In making this point, I would like to note the contribution of my distinguished colleague, Senator INOUYE, whose bill, S. 163, first brought to the Senate's attention the possibility that pediatric emergency care might need additional attention.

Mr. President, I request unanimous consent that the text of this bill be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"EMERGENCY MEDICAL SERVICES FOR CHILDREN

"SEC. 1909A. (a) For activities in addition to the activities which may be carried out by States under section 1904(a)(1)(F), the Secretary may make grants to not more than four States in any fiscal year to support a program of demonstration projects in such States for the expansion and improvement of emergency medical services for children who need treatment for trauma or critical care. Any grant made under this section shall be for a one-year period.

"(b) The Secretary may renew a grant made under this section to a State for one additional one-year period only if the Secretary determines that renewal of such grant will provide significant benefits through the collection, analysis, and dissemination of information or data which will be useful to other States.

"(c) To carry out this section, there are authorized to be appropriated $2,000,000 for fiscal year 1985 and each of the two succeeding fiscal years.".

HOME AND COMMUNITY-BASED SERVICES

SEC. 9. (a) Part A of title XIX (as amended by section 8 of this Act) is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"Subpart 2—Home and Community Based Services

"AUTHORIZATIONS OF APPROPRIATIONS

"SEC. 1910. (a) For the purpose of allotments to States to carry out the activities described in section 1910C, there are authorized to be appropriated $150,000,000 for fiscal year 1986, $200,000,000 for fiscal year 1987, and $200,000,000 for fiscal year 1988.

"(b) For the purpose of allotments to States for planning the implementation of this subpart, there are authorized to be appropriated $20,000,000 for fiscal year 1985.

"ALLOTMENTS

"SEC. 1910A. (a)(1) From the amounts appropriated under section 1910 for fiscal year 1985, the Secretary shall allot—

"(A) $150,000 to each of the several States, the District of Columbia, and Puerto Rico; and

"(B) $50,000 to each of American Samoa, the Virgin Islands, the Commonweath of the Northern Mariana Islands, Guam, and the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands.

"(2) Except as provided in paragraph (3), the Secretary shall allot to each State, from the remainder of the amounts appropriated under section 1910 for fiscal year 1985 which have not been allotted under paragraph (1), and from the amounts appropriated under such section for fiscal years 1986, 1987, 1988, an amount for each such fiscal year equal to the product of—

"(A) the total amount of such remainder for fiscal year 1985 or the total amount appropriated for fiscal year 1986, 1987, or 1988, as the case may be, multiplied by

"(B) the ratio (stated as a percentage) that the total number of elderly individuals residing in the State bears to the total number of elderly individuals residing in the United States, multiplied by

"(C) the quotient of—

"(i) the ratio (stated as a percentage) that the total number of elderly individuals residing in the State bears to the total population of the State, divided by

"(ii) the ratio (stated as a percentage) that the total number of elderly individuals residing in the United States bears to the total population of the United States.

"(3) Notwithstanding paragraph (2)—

"(A) the total amount of the allotment for each of the several States, the District of Columbia, and Puerto Rico for each of the fiscal years 1986, 1987, and 1988 shall not be less than one-half of one percent of the total amount appropriated under section 1910 for such fiscal year;

"(B) the total amount of the allotment for each of the Virgin Islands, Guam, and the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands for each such fiscal year shall not be less than one-fourth of one percent of the total amount appropriated under section 1910 for such fiscal year; and

"(C) the total amount of the allotment for each of American Samoa and the Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands for each such fiscal year shall not be less than one-sixteenth of one percent of the total amount appropriated under section 1910 for such fiscal year.

"(b) To the extent that all the funds appropriated under section 1910 for a fiscal year and available for allotment in such fiscal year are not otherwise allotted to States because—

"(1) one or more States have not submitted an application or description of activities in accordance with section 1910D for such fiscal year;

"(2) one or more States have notified the Secretary that they do not intend to use the full amount of their allotment; or

"(3) some State allotments are offset or repaid under section 1906(b)(3) (as such section applies to this subpart pursuant to section 1910D(e)); such excess shall be allotted among each of the remaining States in proportion to the amount otherwise allotted to such States for such fiscal year without regard to this subsection.

"(c)(1) If the Secretary—

"(A) receives a request from the governing body of an Indian tribe or tribal organization within any State that funds under this subpart be provided directly by the Secretary to such tribe or organization, and

"(B) determines that the members of such tribe or tribal organization would be better served by means of grants made directly by the Secretary under this subpart, the Secretary shall reserve from amounts which would otherwise be allotted to such State under subsection (a) for a fiscal year the amount determined under paragraph (2).

"(2) The Secretary shall reserve for the purpose of paragraph (1) from amounts that would otherwise be allotted to such State under subsection (a) an amount equal to the amount which bears the same ratio to the State's allotment for the fiscal year involved under subsection (a) as the total number of elderly individuals in the tribe during such fiscal year bears to the total number of elderly individuals residing in the State during such fiscal year.

"(3) The amount reserved by the Secretary on the basis of a determination under this subsection shall be granted to the Indian tribe or tribal organization serving the elderly individuals and disabled individuals for whom such a determination has been made.

"(4) In order for an Indian tribe or tribal organization to be eligible for a grant for a fiscal year under this subsection, it shall submit to the Secretary a plan for such fiscal year which meets such criteria as the Secretary may prescribe.

"PAYMENTS UNDER ALLOTMENTS TO STATES

"SEC. 1910B. (a) For each fiscal year, the Secretary shall make payments, as provided by section 6503(a) of title 31, United States Code, to each State from its allotments under section 1910A (other than any amount reserved under subsection (c) of such section) from amounts appropriated for that fiscal year.

"(b) Any amount paid to a State for a fiscal year and remaining unobligated at the end of such year shall remain available for the next fiscal year to such State for the purposes for which it was made.

"USE OF ALLOTMENTS

"SEC. 1910C. (a) Except as provided in subsection (c), amounts paid to a State under section 1910B from its allotment under section 1910A for any fiscal year beginning after September 30, 1985, may be used for the following:

"(1) Activities to coordinate home and community based services provided to elderly individuals and disabled individuals by public and private institutions and voluntary organizations in order to eliminate duplication in the provision of such services and to maximize the use of funds provided under this subpart and other Federal laws for such services.

"(2) The development of procedures and means to—

"(A) identify elderly individuals and disabled individuals, including elderly individuals and disabled individuals who are—

"(i) patients in hospitals who are at risk of prolonged institutionalization; and

"(ii) patients in skilled nursing facilities and intermediate care facilities who could return to the community if home and community based services were available;

"(B) identify geographic regions and population groups of such elderly individuals and disabled individuals who do not have access to home and community based services;

"(C) make recommendations for cost-effective measures to meet the needs of such elderly individuals and disabled individuals for home and community based services;

"(D) encourage and enhance the participation of families and voluntary organizations in providing home and community based services for elderly individuals and disabled individuals; and

"(E) develop and provide educational programs informing the public about all available home and community based services.

"(3) Pursuant to the procedures and means developed under paragraph (2), the identification of elderly individuals and disabled individuals described in subparagraph (A) of such paragraph, and for each elderly individual or disabled individual identified, the preparation of the recommendations described in subparagraph (C) of such paragraph.

"(4) The conduct of activities to provide education and information to the public and to medical and social service professionals concerning home and community based services provided by public and private institutions and organizations.

"(5) The provision to elderly individuals and disabled individuals of—

"(A) homemaker or home health aide services provided by an individual who has successfully completed a training program approved by the Secretary;

"(B) medical social services under appropriate direction;

"(C) dietary services provided by or under the supervision of a registered dietitian;

"(D) physical, occupational, speech, or respiratory therapy;

"(E) adult day care services;

"(F) drugs and biologicals when necessary for an elderly individual or a disabled individual to receive in the home of such individual other services provided under this subpart;

"(G) respite care services for a period not to exceed 14 days;

"(H) any other supportive services, including patient and family training, which may be appropriate and necessary to prevent the institutionalization of an elderly individual or a disabled individual, except that funds provided to a State under this subpart shall not be used for the purchase of professional nursing or physician services; and

"(I) case management services.

"(b) In determining which activities to conduct with funds provided under this subpart, a State shall give priority to the activities described in paragraphs (1) through (4) of subsection (a).

"(c) The Secretary may provide technical assistance to States in planning and operating activities to be carried out under this subpart.

"(d) A State may not use amounts paid to it under section 1910B to—

"(1) provide inpatient services;

"(2) make cash payments to intended recipients of services, except that a State may use amounts paid to it under section 1910B to establish a system under which—

"(A) the State provides vouchers to elderly individuals and disabled individuals which may be used by such individuals to pay providers of services described in subsection (a) for such services; and

"(B) such providers present such vouchers to the State for redemption for cash payments for the provision of such services;

"(3) purchase or improve land, purchase, construct, or permanently improve (other than minor remodeling) any building or other facility, or purchase major medical equipment; or

"(4) satisfy any requirement for the expenditure of non-Federal funds as a condition for the receipt of Federal funds.

The Secretary may waive the limitation contained in paragraph (3) with respect to a fiscal year beginning after September 30, 1985, upon the request of a State if the Secretary finds that there are extraordinary circumstances to justify the waiver and that granting the waiver will assist in carrying out this subpart.

"APPLICATION AND DESCRIPTION OF ACTIVITIES; REQUIREMENTS

"SEC. 1910D. (a)(1) In order to receive an allotment for a fiscal year under section 1910A each State shall submit an application to the Secretary. Each such application shall be in such form and submitted by such date as the Secretary shall require.

"(2) Each application required under paragraph (1) for an allotment under section 1910A for a fiscal year beginning after September 30, 1985, shall contain assurances that the legislature of the State has complied with the provisions of subsection (b) and that the State will meet the requirements of subsection (c).

"(b) After the expiration of the first fiscal year beginning after September 30, 1985, for which a State receives an allotment under section 1910A, no funds shall be allotted to such State for any fiscal year under such section unless the legislature of the State conducts public hearings on the proposed use and distribution of funds to be provided under section 1910B for such fiscal year.

"(c) As part of the annual application required by subsection (a) for an allotment for a fiscal year beginning after September 30, 1985, the chief executive officer of each State shall—

"(1) certify that the State agrees to use the funds allotted to it under section 1910A in accordance with the requirements of this subpart;

"(2) provide assurances that such chief executive officer will establish an appropriate mechanism to coordinate activities of State agencies which administer programs relating to health, welfare, rehabilitation, and the elderly and the provision of home and community based services by State and local agencies and public and private institutions and organizations;

"(3) provide assurances that such chief executive officer will designate or establish a State agency to administer funds provided under this subpart and the plan developed under paragraph (2) in a manner which will insure, to the maximum extent feasible—

"(A) that the needs of elderly individuals and disabled individuals for home and community based services identified under section 1910C(a)(3) will be met; and

"(B) that services provided to elderly individuals and disabled individuals under this subpart will not duplicate services to elderly individuals and disabled individuals provided under other provisions of Federal law;

"(4) certify that the State will coordinate the provision of home and community based services with funds provided under this subpart with activities conducted to provide such services by voluntary, religious, and community organizations and local governments;

"(5) provide assurances that the State will make reasonable efforts to provide services under this subpart through agencies and providers rendering services under the State's medicaid plan approved under title XIX of the Social Security Act; and

"(6) certify that the State agrees that Federal funds made available under section 1910B for any period will be so used as to supplement and increase the level of State, local, and other non-Federal funds that would in the absence of such Federal funds be made available for the programs and activities for which funds are provided under that section and will in no event supplant such State, local, and other non-Federal funds.

The Secretary may not prescribe for a State the manner of compliance with the requirements of this subsection.

"(d) The chief executive officer of a State shall, as part of the application required by subsection (a) for any fiscal year beginning after September 30, 1985, also prepare and furnish the Secretary (in accordance with such form as the Secretary shall provide) with a description of the intended use of the payments the State will receive under section 1910B for the fiscal year for which the application is submitted, including information on the programs and activities to be supported and services to be provided. The description shall be made public within the State in such manner as to facilitate comment from any person (including any Federal or other public agency) during development of the description and after its transmittal. The description shall be revised (consistent with this section) throughout the year as may be necessary to reflect substantial changes in the programs and activities assisted by the State under this subpart, and any revision shall be subject to the requirements of the preceding sentence.

"(e) Except where inconsistent with the provisions of this subpart, the provisions of section 1903(b), paragraphs (1) through (5) of section 1906(a), and sections 1906(b), 1907, 1908, and 1909 shall apply to this subpart in the same manner as such provisions apply to subpart 1 of this part.

"DEFINITIONS

"SEC. 1910E. For purposes of this subpart—

"(1) The term 'elderly individual' means an individual who has attained the age of 65 years.

"(2) The terms 'Indian tribe' and 'tribal organization' have the same meaning given such terms in section 4(b) and section 4(c) of the Indian Self-Determination and Education Assistance Act.".

(b) Such part is further amended—

(1) by amending the heading of such part to read as follows:

"PART A—PREVENTIVE HEALTH, HEALTH SERVICES, AND HOME AND COMMUNITY-BASED SERVICES";

(2) by inserting after the heading of such part the following:

"SUBPART 1—PREVENTIVE HEALTH AND HEALTH SERVICES"; AND

(3) by striking out "this part" and inserting in lieu thereof "this subpart" each place it appears in sections 1902(d)(1)(A), 1902(d)(1)(B), 1904(a)(1), 1904(a)(3), 1904(b), 1905(c)(1), 1905(c)(3), 1905(c)(6), 1905(c)(8), and 1905(d).

By Mr. HATCH:

S. 2302. A bill to consolidate existing Federal vocational education programs, to simplify requirements for States and other recipients participating in Federal vocational education programs, and to authorize certain State and national programs for the development of vocational skills in the work force that will improve productivity and economic growth, and for other purposes, to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

VOCATIONAL EDUCATION CONSOLIDATION ACT OF 1984

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, today I am introducing a bill to simplify, improve, and consolidate Federal programs assisting vocational education. The principal purpose of the bill is to merge existing vocational education grant programs administered by the Secretary of Education into a single, simplified grant to appropriate State agencies. This bill will also reduce the administrative burden, paperwork, and intermittent offensive on-site compliance reviews required by existing legislation, and allow State and local educational agencies maximum flexibility over the use of Federal funds. It will also assist the States in ensuring handicapped and disadvantaged students equal access to vocational education programs.

The bill I am introducing today is actually a refinement of Senate bill 1039 which I introduced in April 1983. Since that time my staff has worked with countless groups accepting the challenge I gave to women's groups and others at that time to help the administration and me improve upon S. 1039 and make it more responsive to the needs of those who receive the benefits of Federal vocational education funds as well as make the program administrators less encumbered with Federal red tape.

This is both the administration's bill and my bill, because we have worked very closely together in incorporating important changes from the bill of last year. Foremost among the changes is dropping adult education reauthorization from the bill. Later on I will be introducing a new reauthorization bill for adult education now being developed jointly with the administration.

The bill also differs from last year's proposal in the following respects:

First. States would be required to use at least 10 percent of the funds they receive under the act, not including funds going for State administration, to meet the special needs of the handicapped and at least 20 percent to meet the special needs of the educationally disadvantaged.

Second. The State allocation formula includes a "hold-harmless" provision, which would be phased out over a 3-year period, in order to moderate the impact of making changes in the formula.

We believe that these new provisions would ensure that special needs populations receive an equitable level of services and would ease the transition into a new State allocation formula.

The remainder of the bill closely follows last year's consolidation proposal. Part A, General Provision, is a simplification of parallel provisions of the current Vocational Education Act (VEA). At least 95 percent of all funds appropriated would be made available for State programs; the Secretary would be authorized to set aside up to 5 percent for discretionary projects in areas of particular national importance. The VEA formula for State allotments (based on population and inverse per capita income) would be modified to include an unemployment factor, target more heavily on older populations, and eliminate constraints on the income factor. In order to participate in the program, each State would have to file an annual proposed use report, which would replace all of the State plans, reports, and evaluations required under existing law. The report would include a simple explanation of proposed objectives, activities to be carried out, and allocations of funds, as well as other basic assurances and descriptions.

Part A would also provide for State audits, an annual Secretary's report to Congress and continuation of the National Advisory Council on Vocational Education. Membership requirements for the Council would be simplified from current law.

Part B of the bill would authorize State programs. A single, consolidated grant would replace the existing categorical programs for basic grants, program improvement and supportive services, special programs for the disadvantaged, consumer and homemaking education, State advisory councils and State planning grants. The setasides for postsecondary and adult programs and for guidance and counseling are also eliminated, as are the program matching, maintenance-of-effort and most other fiscal requirements. However, as noted above, each State would have to use at least 10 percent of the State grant for services for the handicapped and at least 20 percent for services for the educationally disadvantaged.

Under subpart 1 of part B, States would be required to use at least 30 percent of their grants for programs and projects specifically related to economic development. From these funds the States would support such activities as training needed for new businesses entering their areas, retraining or skilled workers who have lost their jobs because of technological or economic changes, development of training programs in new occupational fields and entrepreneurship training for men and women who want to start their own businesses. Encouragement is offered for these locally designed programs to be coordinated or jointly administered with business and industry, so that the training provided is truly related to local skilled work force needs.

One of the most significant features of subpart 2 of part B of the bill is the authority for States to continue to designate a full-time sex equity coordinator to oversee programs designed to eliminate sex bias and sex stereotyping in vocational education. This subpart would also support and strengthen the traditional activities in vocational education such as cooperative education, work-study programs, remedial instruction in basic or employability skills, support services such as day care and the occupation of homemaker (consumer and homemaking education).

Part C of the bill would authorize national discretionary programs in vocational education. Most of the activities currently allowable or mandated in existing legislation are authorized, such as a National Center for Research in Vocational Education, programs for Indian tribes and Indian organizations, the National Occupational Information Coordinating Committee and other program improvement activities designed to meet national skilled work force needs that are no respectors of State boundaries, and in some instances, the boundaries of our Nation. In this regard, although the bill does not specifically state that the Secretary may use discretionary funds for demonstration or other activities which would help some of our neighbors in Latin America to learn how to establish vocational education and training programs to improve their econimic well-being and better utilize the fruits of modern technology, I construe the term "Programs of National Significance" to mean that it is of national significance for us to be able to export to Central and South American countries the vocational education know-how of our country to compliment the vast amounts of other economic aid we are providing our neighbors to the south. I am aware that countries on the continent of Europe are now sending teams to help our neighbors establish vocational and other educational programs while we sit idly by and do virtually nothing to help provide long-range solutions to a vexing economic problem—upgrading the quality of the work force, and concomitantly the quality of life.

Another significant feature of the new bill is the Secretary's authority to utilize discretionary funds to develop demonstration and model programs to promote sex equity in vocational education. I would hope that the Secretary would move vigorously in implementing this authority. While much has been accomplished in vocational education to remove bias and sex stereotyping, much remains to be done.

In summary, Mr. President, the changes made in this year's bill would ensure that special-needs populations receive an equitable share of Federal support. I would hope that these changes, along with the deletion of adult education from the bill, will make the bill acceptable to all parties concerned about vocational education. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, that the bill, along with a section-by-section analysis of it, be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD immediately following my remarks.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

VOCATIONAL EDUCATION CONSOLIDATION ACT
SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS

PART A—GENERAL PURPOSES

Section 101 establishes the purpose of the Act as the authorization of State and national programs which will promote economic development by addressing the needs of youth and adults in all communities for vocational education, strengthening State and local systems of vocational education, enhancing equal opportunities in vocational education for all students, overcoming sex stereotyping and sex bias in vocational education, addressing the national need of employers for a skilled work force, addressing the training needs of displaced workers, and coordinating with other programs of training and employment. An additional intention is that States participating in programs under the Act be afforded broad discretionary authority in planning, developing, administering, coordinating and operating these programs.

Section 102 authorizes $731,314,000 for this Act for fiscal year 1985 and such sums as are necessary for fiscal years 1986 through 1989. It further provides for expenditure of funds appropriated under the Smith-Hughes Act.

Section 103 authorizes the Secretary to set aside, for National Programs, up to 5 percent of the funds appropriated under the Act.

Section 104 prescribes a method for allotting funds to the States. Funds are to be allotted on the basis of population and number of unemployed persons in three age cohorts and inverse per capita income. Section 104 also provides for a declining minimum State allotment (initially at ninety percent of the fiscal year 1984 level) during fiscal years 1985 through 1987. In fiscal years 1988 and 1989 no State may receive less than $100,000. (If funds are not available to satisfy these requirements, allotments to States will be reduced proportionately.)

Section 105 describes the requirement of a Proposed Use Report that a State must submit to the Secretary in order to participate in programs funded under Part B. The report must designate a single State agency that is responsible for the administration or supervision of the administration of Part B programs. It will describe the goals the State will seek to achieve, the characteristics of the individuals to be served, how the Federal funds will be used, how the funds will be distributed within the State, and the anticipated results. It will further describe how the State will provide vocational education students with access to basic skills instruction, how equal opportunity in vocational education will be enhanced for all students, how the State will address sex stereotyping and sex bias in vocational education, and how the State job training coordinating councils and private industry councils or other private sector representatives will be involved in planning and carrying out vocational programs. The report will include assurances regarding proper administration, fiscal control, fund accounting, submission of reports, and the participation of private school students. Finally, the report will contain an assessment of programs and projects supported during the most recently completed program year. Prior to submission, the report will be made public in the State.

Section 106 provides for State audit of activities funded under Part B.

Section 107 requires that the Secretary submit an annual report to Congress on the status of vocational and adult education in the Nation.

Section 108 establishes a National Advisory Council on Vocational Education, with members appointed by the President.

Section 109 makes certain sections of the General Education Provisions Act applicable to programs conducted under this Act.

PART B—STATE PROGRAMS

Section 120 states that the Secretary shall make grants to the States (in accordance with Section 104) for establishing, expanding, and improving vocational education programs. A State may set aside that portion of the grant required for State administration. Of the remainder, at least 30 percent must be used for programs and projects under Subpart 1 (Economic Development and Skilled Work Force Training), and at least 30 percent for programs and projects under Subpart 2 (Strengthening State and Local Systems of Vocational Education). In addition, States must use at last 10 percent of their total Subpart 1 and Subpart 2 funds to meet the special needs of handicapped persons and at least 20 percent of their total Subpart 1 and Subpart 2 funds to meet the special needs of educationally disadvantaged persons. Funds under this part may be used to pay for up to half of the administrative expenses at the local level. Funds also may be used to pay for State or local advisory councils, but not for stipends or construction.

Section 121 provides that States may use funds under this part directly or to make grants or enter into contracts with other eligible recipients for the purpose of carrying out programs and projects under Part B.

Section 122 states the purpose of Subpart 1 as supporting Economic Development and Skilled Work Force Training programs and projects. Training conducted under this Subpart must correspond to specific State or local economic needs or plans.

Section 123 describes the types of activities that may be funded under Subpart 1, including retraining persons whose jobs have been lost or jeopardized by technological or economic change; training for skilled occupations needed to revitalize business and industries that are essential to State or local economic well-being; training for skilled occupations which are needed to attract the entry of new businesses into a State or community; related research, curriculum development, and instructor training; and training in entrepreneurship. Recipients must give careful consideration to the needs of persons who have lost their jobs or whose jobs are jeopardized by technological or economic change.

Section 124 states the purpose of Subpart 2 as supporting programs, projects, services, and activities for strengthening State and local systems of vocational education.

Section 125 describes the types of activities that may be funded under Subpart 2, including joint programs with business, industry, and labor; support services (except for stipends) for homemakers and single heads of households; programs designed to reduce sex stereotyping and sex bias in vocational education; cooperative and work-study programs; programs for persons with limited English proficiency; remedial instruction in basic skills; acquisition or replacement of equipment; consumer and homemaking education; and student organizations.

PART C—NATIONAL PROGRAMS

Section 130 requires the Secretary to use funds reserved under Section 130(a) to support any or all activities authorized by sections 131, 132, 133, and 134.

Section 131 authorizes the Secretary to conduct research, develop programs, collect and disseminate information, and develop State and local leadership in vocational education. The Secretary is also authorized to support a National Center for Research in Vocational Education.

Section 132 authorizes the Secretary to make contracts, grants and cooperative agreements with Indian tribes and organizations for vocational education programs and projects consistent with tribal economic development plans.

Section 133 authorizes support of the National Occupational Information Coordinating Committee established under the Job Training Partnership Act.

Section 134 authorizes activities of Program Improvement for Meeting National Skilled Work Force Needs. These may include exemplary job training programs for persons who have lost their jobs or whose jobs are jeopardized by technological or economic change; demonstration programs designed to reduce sex stereotyping and sex bias in vocational education; model or demonstration training programs; collaborative programs, including employment and training programs, with business, industry, and labor and with other agencies of the Federal government; programs designed to expand the use of volunteers in providing vocational education; activities in the areas of rural vocational education and rural family education; and special training programs and projects designed to address critical shortages of skilled workers which the Nation requires.

PART D—DEFINITIONS

Section 140 provides definitions for a number of terms used in the Act.

PART E—CONFORMING AMENDMENTS; REPEALS; EFFECTIVE DATE

Section 150 would make a number of conforming amendments to the Job Training Partnership Act and other Acts.

Section 151 repeals the Vocational Education Act. The effective date of this Act is July 1, 1985.

S. 2302

Be it enacted by the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Vocational Education Consolidation Act of 1984".

PART A—GENERAL PROVISIONS

DECLARATION OF PURPOSE

SEC. 101. (a) The purpose of this Act is to authorize state and national programs which will promote economic development by: (1) addressing the needs of youth and adults, in all communities, for vocational education; (2) strengthening the ability of state and local systems of vocational education to promote and respond to economic development; (3) enhancing equal educational opportunity in vocational education for all students, including those with special needs such as the handicapped, the educationally disadvantaged, and those with limited English proficiency; (4) overcoming sex stereotyping and sex bias in vocational education; (5) addressing the national need of employers for a skilled and literate workforce; (6) addressing the training needs of displaced workers; and, (7) coordinating with other programs of training and employment to ensure the most efficient use of resources.

(b) It is the intent of Congress that states participating in programs authorized by Part B of this Act be afforded broad discretionary authority in planning, developing, administering, coordinating and operating those programs.

AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS

SEC. 102. (a) For the purpose of carrying out this Act there are authorized to be appropriated $731,314,000 for fiscal year 1985 and such sums as may be necessary for fiscal years 1986 through 1989.

(b) Funds appropriated by the first section of the Smith-Hughes Act (that is, the Act approved February 23, 1917, 39 Stat. 929, as amended) shall be considered as funds appropriated pursuant to this section.

SET-ASIDE FOR NATIONAL PROGRAMS

SEC. 103. From the amount appropriated pursuant to section 102 for any fiscal year the Secretary may set aside up to 5 per centum of that amount for national programs under section 130.

STATE ALLOTMENTS

SEC. 104. (a) Subject to section 103, the Secretary shall allot the funds appropriated under section 102 to each state for each fiscal year in the following amounts—

(1) 40 per centum according to the ratio which the product of the State's allotment ratio and the sum of the State's population aged fifteen through nineteen and the number of unemployed persons in the State aged fifteen through nineteen bears to the sum of the corresponding products for all the States;

(2) 40 per centum according to the ratio which the product of the State's allotment ratio and the sum of the State's population aged twenty through forty-four and the number of unemployed persons in the State aged twenty through forty-four bears to the sum of the corresponding products for all the States; and

(3) 20 per centum according to the ratio which the product of the State's allotment ratio and the sum of the State's population aged forty-five through sixty-four and the number of unemployed persons in the State aged forty-five through sixty-four bears to the sum of the corresponding products for all the States.

(b)(1) The allotment ratio of a State, other than an insular area, for any fiscal year is one minus one half of the quotient obtained by dividing the per capita income for the State by the per capita income for all the States (excluding the insular areas).

(2) The allotment ratio of an insular area is .6.

(3) The Secretary shall compute allotment ratios on the basis of the average of the appropriate per capita incomes for the three most recent fiscal years for which data, satisfactory to the Secretary, exist.

(c)(1) Notwithstanding subsection (a), the Secretary shall allot to each State—

(A) for fiscal year 1985, no less than 90 per centum of the amount it received under the Vocational Education Act of 1963 (other than section 105 of that Act) for fiscal year 1984;

(B) for fiscal year 1986, no less than 85 per centum of the amount it received under the Vocational Education Act of 1963 (other than section 105 of that Act) for fiscal year 1984;

(C) for fiscal year 1987, no less than 80 per centum of the amount it received under the Vocational Education Act of 1963 (other than section 105 of that Act) for fiscal year 1984; and

(D) for fiscal year 1988 and 1989, no less than $100,000; and

(2) Amounts required to comply with paragraph (1) shall be derived by proportionately reducing the allotments of all other States, subject to adjustments needed to avoid reducing any State below the minimum amount.

(3) If insufficient funds are appropriated to comply with paragraph (1), the allotment of each State shall be reduced proportionately.

(d)(1) The Secretary may reallot all or a portion of a State's allotment for any fiscal year if the State does not submit a Proposed Use Report under section 105, or indicates to the Secretary that it does not need the full amount of its allotment for that fiscal year. The Secretary may fix one or more dates during a fiscal year upon which to make reallotments.

(2) The Secretary may reallot funds on a competitive basis to one or more States that demonstrate a current need for additional funds under this Act. Any funds reallotted to another State shall be deemed to be part of its allotment for the fiscal year in which the funds are reallotted.

(e) For the purpose of determining allotments under this section—

(1) population shall be based on the latest data that are satisfactory to the Secretary;

(2) unemployed population shall be based on the average of the appropriate unemployment data for the three most recent fiscal years for which data, satisfactory to the Secretary, exist;

(3) the term "per capita income" means, for any fiscal year, the total personal income in the calendar year ending in such year, divided by the population of the area concerned in that year; and

(4) the term "insular area" means the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, Guam, American Samoa, the Virgin Islands, the Northern Mariana Islands, and the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands.

PROPOSED USE REPORT

SEC. 105. (a) Any State desiring to participate in the program authorized by Part B of this Act during any fiscal year shall submit to the Secretary an annual Proposed Use Report which describes the vocational education goals the State seeks to achieve, the characteristics of the individuals to be served, how the Federal funds will be used to achieve the purposes of this Act, how the funds will be distributed within the State (including any allocation formulas to be used), and the results the State anticipates. The Proposed Use Report must designate the single State agency or instrumentality that is responsible for the administration or supervision of the administration of the State's program under Part B, including its compliance with all the requirements of this Act.

(b) In addition to the information required by subsection (a), the Proposed Use Report must:

(1) describe how the States will—

(A) provide access for all vocational education students to instruction in the basic skills that are needed for employment;

(B) use funds awarded under Part B to enhance equal educational opportunity in vocational education for all students, including those with special needs such as the educationally disadvantaged, the handicapped, and those with limited English proficiency;

(C) use funds available under Part B to overcome sex stereotyping and sex bias in vocational education programs; and

(D) involve the State job training coordinating council and private industry councils established under the Job Training Partnership Act, as well as other representatives from business, industry, finance, labor, and agriculture in planning and carrying out vocational education programs funded under Part B so that those programs reflect the skilled labor needs of employers and current technology.

(2) contain assurances that the State will—

(A) provided for such methods of administration as are necessary for the proper and efficient administration of programs under this Act;

(B) provide for such fiscal control and fund accounting procedures as are necessary to ensure proper disbursement and use of Federal funds paid to the State;

(C) comply with requests of the Secretary for reports that are necessary to carry out his functions under this Act;

(D) provide for the participation of students who are enrolled in private schools in programs, projects, services, and activities at the secondary level that are supported by funds awarded under Part B, consistent with State law, and the number of those students in the area to be served who share the need for vocational education which the program, project, service or activity is designed to address;

(E) maintain continuing public administrative direction and control over funds used to provide programs, projects, services, and activities to students in a private school; and

(F) distribute funds to eligible recipients on the basis of annual applications, approved by the State, which describe the activities to be supported with Federal funds.

(c) Each Proposed Use Report must contain an assessment of the vocational education programs supported with Federal funds during the State's most recently completed program year, including an assessment of the extent to which the State met the goals established for that year.

(d) Prior to submitting it to the Secretary, the State shall make the Proposed Use Report public in a manner that facilitates comment from interested agencies, groups, and individuals.

AUDITS

SEC. 106. Each State shall obtain financial and compliance audits of any funds which the State receives under this Act. Such audits shall be made public within the State on a timely basis. The audits shall be conducted at least every two years by an organization or person independent of an agency administering activities under the Act. The audits shall be conducted in accordance with the Comptroller General's Standard for Audit of Governmental Organizations, Program, Activities, and Functions.

SECRETARY'S REPORT

SEC. 107. The Secretary shall submit to Congress each fiscal year a report on the status of vocational education in the Nation. The report must contain concise analyses of the information in Proposed Use Reports under section 105, as well as other appropriate information gathered by the Secretary.

NATIONAL ADVISORY COUNCIL ON VOCATIONAL EDUCATION

SEC. 108. (a) There shall be a National Advisory Council on Vocational Education during the period for which funds are appropriated under section 102. The President shall appoint members of the Council for terms of three years, except that the President may select initial members of the Council for terms of one or two years. The Council shall have a a majority of its members persons who are not educators or administrators in the field of education. The Council shall meet at the call of the Chairman, whom the President selects, but not less than three times a year. The Chairman of the National Commission for Employment Policy shall be a member of the Council.

(b) The National Advisory Council shall—

(1) advise the President, Congress, the Secretary, and the head of any other appropriate Federal department or agency concerning the administration of vocational education programs supported under this Act as well as the implementation of other laws that affect vocational education, and employment and training programs;

(2) make whatever reports or recommendations to the President, Congress, the Secretary, and the head of any other appropriate Federal department or agency as are appropriate and reasonable, and include in any such report the comments of the National Commission for Employment Policy;

(3) identify, in conjunction with the National Commission for Employment Policy, the vocational education and training and employment needs of the Nation and assess the degree to which existing vocational education, training and employment, vocational rehabilitation, adult education, special education, and other programs represent a coordinated and effective approach to meeting those needs;

(4) conduct whatever hearings, studies, or other fact-finding activities are needed to enable the National Advisory Council to carry out its functions; and

(5) conduct independent evaluations of other programs conducted under this Act, and publish the results.

(c) The Council may accept gifts if their acceptance will better enable it to carry out its functions under this section.

GENERAL EDUCATION PROVISIONS

SEC. 109. Only the following sections of the General Education Provisions Act shall apply to programs conducted under this Act: sections 412 (a) and (b), 415, 416, 417, 420, 422(a) (1) and (2), 426(a), 432, 433, 437, 438, 439, 440, 451, 452, 454, 455 and 456.

PART B—STATE PROGRAMS

USE OF FUNDS

SEC. 120. (a) The Secretary, in accordance with the amount allotted to each State under section 104, shall make grants to the States for the purposes of establishing, expanding, and improving vocational education programs, projects, services, and activities in accordance with subparts 1 and 2.

(b) Each State shall use the amount granted under subsection (a) to carry out programs, projects, services, and activities authorized by this part in the following manner—

(1) first, the State may set aside that portion of the amount granted under subsection (a) required for the State's administration of the programs, projects, services, and activities described in its Proposed Use Report; and

(2) from the remainder, the State shall use—

(A) no less than 30 per centum to carry out programs, projects, services, and activities authorized by subpart 1; and

(B) no less than 30 per centum to carry out programs, projects, services, and activities authorized by subpart 2.

(c)(1) A State shall use (A) no less than 10 per centum of the funds under subsection (b)(2) to meet the special needs of handicapped persons, and (B) no less than 20 per centum of the funds under subsection (b)(2) to meet the special needs of educationally disadvantaged persons.

(2) A State may use funds under subsection (b)(2) to pay up to 50 per centum of the cost of an eligible recipient's administration of programs, projects, services, and activities described in its approved annual application.

(d) A State may use funds granted under subsection (a) to pay for the cost of any State or local advisory council which assists the planning, implementation, or evaluation of a program, projects, service or activity under this Act.

(e) A State may not use funds granted under subsection (a) to pay the cost of stipends or construction.

ELIGIBLE RECIPIENTS

SEC. 121. (a) A State may use the funds received under section 120 directly, or to make grants to or enter into contracts with eligible recipients, for the purpose of carrying out programs, projects, services, and activities authorized by this part.

(b) A State may prescribe the manner in which grants and contracts are made to eligible recipients and may prescribe whatever terms, consistent with Federal requirements, are reasonable and necessary for the proper and efficient administration of programs, projects, services, and activities authorized by this part.

SUBPART 1—ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT AND SKILLED WORK FORCE TRAINING

STATEMENT OF PURPOSE

SEC. 122. It is the purpose of this subpart to assist States to provide vocational education programs, projects, services, and activities that foster State and local economic development by training persons, including displaced workers, in the occupational skills needed by business and industry. Skilled work force training conducted under this subpart must correspond to current State or local economic needs or plans that are specifically described in the Proposed Use Report.

AUTHORIZED ACTIVITIES

SEC. 123. (a) In order to achieve the purposes of this subpart, a State shall, in accordance with section 120(b)(2)(A), use funds for one or more of the following—

(1) retraining persons whose jobs have been lost or jeopardized by technological or economic change for occupations in which there is a current or projected shortage of workers;

(2) training for skilled occupations needed to revitalize businesses and industries that are essential to State or local economic well-being;

(3) training for skilled occupations which are needed to attract or otherwise promote the entry of new businesses and industries into a State or community;

(4) conducting applied research and developing information for dissemination to the public on occupational skills in emerging or rapidly changing trades, crafts, businesses, and industries, including activities carried out in cooperation with the National or State Occupational Information Coordinating Committee;

(5) developing new curricula or innovative pilot programs for emerging or rapidly changing trades, crafts, businesses, and industries;

(6) providing vocational education for persons who are out of school, unemployed, and who live in an economically depressed area;

(7) training or retraining vocational education instructors (through exchange programs between business or industry and the school, where feasible);

(8) improving the quality of vocational education courses leading to the development of a skilled work force through the acquisition or replacement of equipment.

(9) providing training in entrepreneurship and the skills necessary for entrepreneurship; and

(10) providing any vocational education program, project, service, or activity that promotes the purposes of this subpart.

(b) Each State and eligible recipient shall give careful consideration to the needs of persons described in subsection (a)(1) by making its best efforts to recruit those persons for participation in the programs, projects, services, and activities supported with funds under this subpart.

SUBPART 2—STRENGTHENING STATE AND LOCAL SYSTEMS OF VOCATIONAL EDUCATION

STATEMENT OF PURPOSE

SEC. 124. It is the purpose of this subpart to strengthen State and local systems of vocational education so that all persons, regardless of sex, (including handicapped persons, educationally disadvantaged persons, and persons with limited English proficiency) can participate in vocational education programs that are designed to provide needed job skills and foster economic development.

AUTHORIZED ACTIVITIES

SEC. 125. In order to achieve the purpose of this subpart a State shall, in accordance with section 120(b)(2)(B), use funds for one or more of the following—

(1) strengthening State and local vocational education systems by promoting the active participation of representatives from business, industry, labor, finance, and agriculture in vocational education through joint training programs and shared facilities, and by coordinating these programs with programs under the Job Training Partnership Act;

(2) providing necessary support services (except stipends) for vocational education students, including students preparing to obtain employment in occupations traditionally associated with members of the opposite sex, current or former homemakers seeking employment, and single heads of households who lack adequate job skills;

(3) providing programs, projects, services, and activities designed to reduce sex stereotyping and sex bias in vocational education, including the support of full-time personnel to assist the State in achieving sex equity in all its vocational education programs;

(4) providing cooperative vocational education programs involving agreements between schools and employers;

(5) providing vocational education programs, projects, services, and activities designed to meet the special needs of persons with limited English proficiency;

(6) providing work study programs which address the vocational education needs of economically disadvantaged students;

(7) providing remedial instruction in basic skills for vocational education students who need it to benefit from vocational instruction;

(8) providing new training courses for adults who wish to improve current occupational skills or who wish to develop skills for new careers;

(9) strengthening secondary and postsecondary programs and projects to provide high quality instruction in new or developing trades, crafts or occupations that are technologically demanding;

(10) improving the quality of vocational education in the most economical manner possible through the acquisition or replacement of equipment and necessary minor remodeling of vocational education facilities;

(11) providing programs for the occupation of homemaker (consumer and homemaking education);

(12) providing industrial arts and pre-vocational guidance programs;

(13) providing support to vocational student organizations that are an integral part of a vocational education program;

(14) providing career guidance, counseling, placement, and follow-up services, including use of the Employment Service, as appropriate;

(15) providing vocational education programs, projects, services, and activities for incarcerated persons nearing their release; and

(16) providing any vocational education program, project service, or activity that meets the purposes of this subpart.

PART C—NATIONAL PROGRAMS

USE OF FUNDS

SEC. 130. The Secretary shall use funds set aside under section 103 to support one or more of the programs, projects, services, or activities authorized by sections 131, 132, 133, and 134. In any fiscal year the Secretary may use these funds for particular types of programs, projects, services, or activities authorized by these sections.

RESEARCH

SEC. 131. (a) The Secretary may support directly, or through grants, contracts, or cooperative agreements to public or private institutions, agencies, or organizations, one or more of the following—

(1) research and development activities on problems of national significance in vocational education;

(2) studies addressing national problems, such as defense preparedness, that are caused by shortages of skilled workers;

(3) the collection and dissemination of information on research and program improvement activities in vocational education;

(4) the collection of information to facilitate national planning and policy development in vocational education; and

(5) the development of State and local leadership resources in vocational education.

(b) The Secretary may support a National Center for Research in Vocational Education to conduct one or more of the activities authorized under subsection (a).

PROGRAMS FOR INDIAN TRIBES AND INDIAN ORGANIZATIONS

SEC. 132. (a) The Secretary may, upon the request of any Indian tribe that is eligible to contract with the Secretary of the Interior for the administration of programs under the Indian Self-Determination Act or under the Act of April 16, 1934, make one or more grants, contracts, or cooperative agreements with a tribal organization of that Indian tribe to plan, conduct, and administer vocational education programs, projects, services and activities that are authorized by part B of this Act and are consistent with tribal economic development plans.

(b) The Secretary shall review applications and award funds under subsection (a) on a competitive basis.

OCCUPATIONAL INFORMATION DATA SYSTEM

SEC. 133. The Secretary may extend financial and technical assistance to support the National Occupational Information Coordinating Committee established under section 464 of the Job Training Partnership Act.

PROGRAM IMPROVEMENT FOR MEETING NATIONAL SKILLED WORK FORCE NEEDS

SEC. 134. The Secretary may support directly, or through grants, contracts, or cooperative agreements to public or private institutions, agencies, or organizations, one or more of the following—

(1) the development, demonstration, evaluation validation, and dissemination of exemplary job training programs and projects for persons whose jobs have been lost or jeopardized by technological or economic change;

(2) the development and demonstration of programs and projects designed to reduce sex stereotyping and sex bias in vocational education;

(3) the development, demonstration, evaluation, and dissemination of skilled work force training programs and projects (including the curricula for such programs or projects) for rapidly changing occupations or occupations necessary for economic development;

(4) the development and demonstration of collaborative vocational education programs and projects that combine the resources of business, industry, labor, education, finance, agriculture, and public and private training and employment programs;

(5) the development of vocational education programs and projects that incorporate the principles of entrepreneurship;

(6) the development, demonstration, and evaluation of programs and projects designed to train or retrain vocational education instructors through exchanges between business or industry and the schools;

(7) the development, demonstration, and evaluation of programs or projects designed to expand the use of volunteers in providing vocational education;

(8) the improvement of rural vocational education and rural family education;

(9) special training programs and projects, developed independently or in combination with other public or private training programs, designed to address critical shortages of skilled workers which the Nation requires;

(10) joint planning and coordination of programs and activities supported under this Act (or other laws that affect vocational education and training and employment programs such as the Job Training Partnership Act) with other Federal departments and agencies as well as representatives of business and industry, labor unions, and education and training organizations; and

(11) other programs or projects, including technical assistance and training, that are consistent with the purposes of this Act, and designed to support the efforts of States to improve the overall quality of the vocational education they provide.

PART D—DEFINITIONS

SEC. 140. As used in this Act—

(1) The term "acquisition" means taking ownership of property, receiving property as a gift, entering into a lease-purchase arrangement, or leasing the property. The term includes processing, delivery, and installation of property.

(2) The term "administration" means those activities of a State or eligible recipient that are reasonable and necessary for the proper and efficient performance of its duties under this Act, including State supervision, and the development of the Proposed Use Report.

(3) The term "construction" includes the construction of new buildings, the acquisition, expansion, and alteration of existing buildings, and includes site grading, improvement, and architect fees. The term does not include minor remodeling needed to accommodate equipment used for instructional purposes.

(4) The term "educationally disadvantaged" means, when used with respect to an individual, a person who has one or more academic deficiencies (such as inadequate writing, reading, or mathematical skills) and who therefore requires special services and assistance in order to succeed in vocational education programs.

(5) The term "eligible recipient" means a public or private agency, organization, or institution capable of administering a vocational education program. The term may include public corporations and community-based organizations.

(6) The term "handicapped" means, when used with respect to an individual, a person who is mentally retarded, hard of hearing, deaf, speech impaired, visually handicapped, seriously emotionally disturbed, orthopedically impaired, or other health impaired person, or a person with specific learning disabilities, who by reason thereof requires special education and related services, and who, because of that person's handicapping condition, cannot succeed in the regular vocational education program without special education assistance or who requires a modified vocational educational program.

(7) The term "limited English proficiency," with reference to an individual, means a person—

(A)(i) who was not born in the United States;

(ii) whose native language is other than English; or

(iii) who comes from an environment where a language other than English is dominant; and

(B) who therefore has substantial difficulty understanding, speaking, reading, or writing English.

(8) The term "Secretary" means the Secretary of Education.

(9) The term "State" includes, in addition to the several States, the District of Columbia, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, the Virgin Islands, Guam, American Samoa, the Northern Mariana Islands, and the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands.

(10) The term "vocational education" means an organized instructional program that is directly related to the preparation of persons for employment, paid or unpaid, in an occupation that does not require a baccalaurate or advanced degree.

(b) Funds appropriated for use during fiscal years 1984 or 1985 under the Vocational Education Act of 1963 that are not obligated by July 1, 1985 by a State or other recipient shall remain available for obligation in accordance with the requirements of this Act.

(c) In order to effect a smooth transition to the consolidated program authorized in this Act, the Secretary may, prior to the effective date of this Act, promulgate regulations, establish dates for the receipt of Proposed Use Reports under section 105, and take other actions he deems necessary.

(d) This Act shall take effect July 1, 1985.

By Mr. HATCH:

S. 2303. A bill to revise and extend the alcohol and drug abuse and mental health services block grant; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

ALCOHOL AND DRUG ABUSE AND MENTAL HEALTH SERVICES BLOCK GRANT AMENDMENTS OF 1984

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President and distinguished colleagues, today I am introducing legislation which would reauthorize the alcohol and drug abuse and mental health block grant for 3 years.

In 1981, through the Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act we changed the funding mechanism for these services by authorizing the ADMH block grant. This act replaced the categorical service programs supported by the Government for the previous 20 years. I am pleased to report that the States have successfully completed the transition from these categorical services to locally controlled and administered programs. Local communities can now offer alcohol, drug abuse and mental health services with more flexibility to meet the needs of their local citizens.

I recommend to my colleagues their favorable consideration and support of this reauthorization. This bill contains only a few relatively small changes. First, we are proposing the appropriations for 3 years at the following levels: fiscal year 1985, $473,300,000; fiscal year 1986, $486,469,000; and fiscal year 1987, $501,063,070.

Second, the amendment calls for a review of the allocation of funds to the States by the Secretary of Health and Human Services. Under the current formula for allocation, there appears to be inequitable distribution of funds to the various States. This bill instructs the Secretary to ask for a review to determine whether a more equitable formula can be designed. By April 1985, the Secretary shall have reported back to Congress with findings and recommendations.

Third, the bill addresses the concern that data collected has not been useful. The bill proposes that the Secretary work with appropriate national organizations to insure that State and local governments have access to a model format for collecting data so that such data may be made available to the States. I believe that this language will provide the vehicle to compare State programs and yet still keep the data collection process from becoming too burdensome and expensive for the States.

Fourth, the bill makes modifications in audit requirements and repeals certain transition language.

Finally, the bill addresses the problem of increased substance abuse among women. Empirical data has begun to emerge that shows women are increasing their use of alcohol and drugs—including prescription drugs. The cost of substance abuse to our society is staggering. More research is needed on treatment and prevention programs that are effective in reducing the ill health effects of substance abuse among women.

Increased awareness of the effects of alcohol and drugs in the unborn fetus is included within this proposal with a focus on educational efforts for mothers in their childbearing years. This measure would amend the alcohol, drug abuse and mental health block grant to set up a demonstration program for treatment and prevention efforts aimed at women. An additional authorization of $7 million is provided for these demonstration projects.

State proposals should be flexible in their expansion of services to women alcoholics and drug addicts. The following areas are some that have been suggested as appropriate:

First, the development of separate and discrete services for women alcoholics and drug addicts in the following components of treatment: inpatient; outpatient; halfway house and; extended care;

Second, the development of programs which provide residential and therapeutic care for women alcoholics and drug addicts and their children;

Third, the development of programs which provide access to vocational and educational services including counseling and training for women alcoholics and drug addicts who are returning to or entering the labor force for the first time;

Fourth, the development of services—inpatient and outpatient—for pregnant women alcoholics and drug addicts;

Fifth, the development of incentives for alcoholics and drug abuse personnel to create diversionary programs for women alcoholics and drug addicts in the criminal justice system;

Sixth, the development of programs which address the subpopulations of women alcoholics and drug addicts, that is, victims of violence, elderly women, minority women, youth, adult children of alcoholics, single heads of households, incarcerated women; and

Seventh, the development of employee assistance programs in female intensive industries.

The data indicates that women are experiencing increased ill health effects as a result of their increased use of abusive substances. But it is also evident that existing treatment modalities do not address the treatment of women, which in some cases varies from existing treatment methods. We must change this trend.

I ask unanimous consent that the full text of my bill be included in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks along with a bill, summary sheet and a "Fact Sheet on Women, Alcohol, and Other Drug Abuse" prepared by the North American Women's Commission.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SUMMARY OF "ALCOHOL AND DRUG ABUSE AND MENTAL HEALTH SERVICES BLOCK GRANT AMENDMENTS OF 1984"

A straight three-year reauthorization with only a few modifications.

Funding:

Fiscal year 1985—$472,300,000 [1]
Fiscal year 1986—$486,469,000
Fiscal year 1987—$501,063,070

REVIEW OF ALLOCATION OF FUNDS—FORMULA ALLOCATION

Language reads: The Secretary shall review with appropriate State and local government representatives the distribution of funds allotted to the States under this part during each of the fiscal years 1982, 1983, and 1984 for the purpose of determining whether a formula for the distribution of such funds can be devised which is more equitable than the formula specified under subsections (b) and (c). In conducting such review, the Secretary shall consider—

1. The financial resources of the various States;

2. The populations of the States;

3. Any relevant conditions or circumstances which have changed since the date of enactment of this part; and

4. Any other factor which the Secretary may consider appropriate.

By April 1, 1985, the Secretary shall prepare and transmit to the Congress a report concerning the review conducted under this subsection which includes such recommendations as the Secretary considers appropriate.

Retains existing set-asides between alcohol, drug abuse services, and mental health services; and retains set-aside between alcohol and drug abuse services including 20 percent set-aside for prevention programs.

Uniform data tool shall be developed by the Secretary to be made available to the State for multi-State data collection acitivities.

The portion of S. 2146, the treatment, research, and prevention of substance abuse among women which provides $7 million per year as additional funds for States to develop services to meet the needs of women and substance abuse.

Changes audit requirements to every two years.

FACT SHEET ON WOMEN, ALCOHOL, AND OTHER DRUG ABUSE

(Prepared by the North American Women's Commission)

The number of women in the United States with alcohol and other drug problems is much larger than commonly assumed.

There are approximately 10 million alcoholics in the United States. Many experts estimate that up to one-half of the alcoholic population are women.

According to Marty Mann, the founder of the National Council on Alcoholism: "My guess is that if you added up all the problem drinkers in this country, the hidden as well as the revealed, the sex ratio would be just about 50 : 50."

Women are more likely to be cross-addicted—68 percent of all psychoactive drugs are prescribed to women.

"Generally speaking, women are more likely to use and have problems with mood drugs than men are: Two of every three mood prescriptions are written for women, especially women in the 40-59 age range." [1]

The number of women who drink has increased since World War II. In 1978, 66 percent of women were drinkng regularly, as compared to 77 percent men.

The percentage of women entering Alcoholics Anonymous has risen from 22 percent in 1968, to 26 percent in 1972, to 29 percent in 1977, and to 31 percent in 1980.

Women with alcohol and other drug problems experience a profound sense of isolation accompanied by feelings of guilt and shame. These feelings, along with denial of the problem, often stand in the way of women seeking help. When women do seek treatment, they present complicated medical and psychological problems which require specialized services.

A woman with an alcohol or other drug problem faces a double stigma. She is an addict and she is viewed as a "fallen woman."

"There is evidence presented in the literature that drug-abusing women entering treatment are likely to present chronic medical and complicated psychosocial problems that require special attention from the agencies that serve them." [2]

Pregnant alcoholics and drug addicts are often excluded from services or are subjected to inappropriate services, that is, heroin addicted mothers are often maintained on methadone in an outpatient setting.

It is estimated that only 1 in 10 husbands stay in marriages with alcoholic wives whereas, 9 in 10 wives stay in marriages with alcoholic husbands. (National Council on Alcoholism).

Alcohol and drug dependent women report an alarmingly high number of incidents of sexual abuse. According to Wilsnack: "Thus when alcoholic or drug-dependent women are asked about experiences with incest or rape, the rates appear high, ranging from 12 percent to 53 percent for incest or other childhood sexual abuse, and up to 74 percent for all sexual abuse combined." [3]

Although progress has been made, alcohol and drug dependent women often do not have access to or receive appropriate services.

According to statistical material published by the National Institute on Alcohol Abuse and Alcoholism (Feb. 1981), the ratio of men to women admissions to treatment programs is approximately 5 to 1; nationally, there are 375 women's treatment establishments out of a total of 5,577; 82.5 percent of intakes to treatment were men, 17.5 percent women.

The number of women entering treatment varies by State. For example, according to the Maryland Alcoholism Control Administration's Annual Report for fiscal year 1983, the percentage of women entering treatment was as low as 13.8 percent. The Office of Alcohol and Drug Abuse Prevention for the State of Maine reports that 24 percent of the individuals treated in 1983 were women.

Many experts believe that women have needs which are not being met by the existing treatment system. "Many primary care centers are based on a man's needs. Women are usually diagnosed as having added psychological problems because they have chemical dependency symptoms that are different from men's. They are not sicker than men, they are sick different. They need to be in treatment that normalizes their life experiences." [4]

Most treatment programs do not provide child care or adequate altenatives for women who are entering treatment.

Female intensive industries lag far behind male intensive industries in their development of employee assistance programs.

Research on women with alcohol and other drug dependencies has been sorely neglected. Curlee's observation of over 15 years ago still holds true. According to Curlee: "studies on alcoholism tend to either ignore women entirely or to simply assume that alcoholism is the same regardless of the sex of the sufferer."

EFFECTIVE DATE

SEC. 11. This Act and the amendments and repeals made by this Act shall take effect on October 1, 1984.

By Mr. BOSCHWITZ (for himself, Mr. BOREN, Mr. JEPSEN, and Mr. PRYOR):

S. 2304. A bill to enhance U.S. food aid, restore competitive position of the United States in agricultural export markets, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition and Forestry.

FOOD AID AND EXPORT MARKET PROMOTION ACT

● Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Mr. President, over the past decade the United States has been the world's largest exporter of agricultural products. The United States currently supplies 80 percent of the soybeans, 60 percent of the feed grains, 40 percent of the wheat and cotton, and 20 percent of the tobacco and rice moving into the world trade.

The value of these exports increased from approximately $7 billion in 1970 to around $44 billion in fiscal year 1981. These exports have created more than 800,000 domestic jobs in related industries, and have taken production of 2 out of every 5 acres of U.S. cropland. In addition, these exports generate about one-fourth of all farm cash receipts and contributed nearly $30 billion to our balance of trade at their height in 1981.

Despite the many benefits of international trade in farm products, the United States finds itself currently facing a major agricultural trade dilemma. The gross value of our agricultural exports in fiscal year 1983 was $34.5 billion, a decline of 21 percent from the 1981 level. Over the same period, the volume of export shipments declined from 162 million metric tons to 145 million metric tons—10.5 percent.

There are a number of reasons for the recent declines in the value and tonnage of U.S. agricultural exports: The worldwide recession, strength of the U.S. dollar, increased debt burdens facing U.S. customers, and the increased use of export subsidies by the European Community and other countries.

In response to this trade dilemma, I am introducing the Food Aid and Export Market Promotion Act, along with Senators BOREN, JEPSEN, and PRYOR. The purpose of this legislation is twofold: First, to expand agricultural exports through existing credit and food aid programs; and second, provide the Secretary of Agriculture with additional export credit tools aimed at developing markets for U.S. agricultural exports in countries with economies that are strong enough so that they can start phasing out of Public Law 480, yet not strong enough to move completely to GSM-102.

Our ability to effectively compete in agricultural trade in the decade ahead will greatly depend on our ability to provide more creative financing for potential customers. The export credit initiatives included in this bill will provide the Secretary of Agriculture with the tools necessary to expand U.S. agricultural exports in a number of key markets. The food aid provisions will allow our country to maintain its fine tradition of helping the hungry around the world.

On February 23, I will chair a hearing of the Subcommittee on Foreign Agricultural Policy to consider this bill. It is my hope that these initiatives will receive the solid support of humanitarian organizations as well as agricultural groups. Both have much to gain by its implementation.

With the help of my colleagues, I think this bill can be passed expeditiously. I invite all of you to join as cosponsors in the effort to turn the tide toward increasing agricultural exports.

I ask unanimous consent that a summary of major provisions follow my remarks.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FOOD AID AND EXPORT MARKET PROMOTION ACT

SUMMARY OF MAJOR PROVISIONS

Sec. 2. Mandate that $7 billion of GSM-102 credit guarantees be made available in Fiscal Year 1984. The Administration has approved $4 billion in guarantees for FY84, compared to $5.15 billion in FY83.

Under the GSM-102 program, the Commodity Credit Corporation guarantees commercial loans made to finance exports of U.S. agricultural products with repayment periods of 6 months to 3 years.

Sec. 3. Increase the authorization level for Title II of P.L. 480 from $1.0 to $1.5 billion. The increased Title II authority would be available to meet increased needs for food assistance. Title II commodities are given as outright food grants to needy nations.

Sec. 4. The authority for overseas commodity donations under Section 416 of the Agricultural Act of 1949 would be expanded to allow donations of any CCC-owned commodities without counting them against P.L. 480 allocations. (Currently, only dairy products can be given away under this authority.)

Sec. 5. The Budget Reconciliation Act of 1982 mandated that between $175 and $190 million of CCC funds be used for export promotion in each of the Fiscal Years 1983-1985. Approximately $70 million remains to be used in FY84.

The bill would direct the Secretary to use at least $25 million in FY84 and $50 million in FY85 for the intermediate credit programs (GSM-201 and GSM-301).

GSM-201 is a direct credit program which provides CCC financing for the exportation of breeding livestock with repayment terms of 3-10 years. GSM-301 is a direct credit program for infrastructure development with repayment of 3-10 years.

Section 5 also amends the existing intermediate credit programs to:

(a) Provide the Secretary with the flexibility to set the repayment terms and the interest rate. Currently, the Secretary is required to set repayment terms over a 3-10 year period with interest rates that reflect those of short-term U.S. Treasury notes.

(b) Provide the Secretary with the authority to establish an intermediate credit guarantee program. Under this provision, the CCC would guarantee a commercial loan which calls for repayment within 3-10 years. In addition, the Secretary would be authorized to use CCC funds to buy-down the interest rate offered by the commercial lender.

Sec. 6. Mandate a GAO study to investigate our existing food aid programs. The study must be completed within 120 days of the enactment of the legislation.

The purpose of this study would be to evaluate:

(a) the needs of recipient countries relative to global food aid needs;

(b) the use to which recipients put the food aid once it is received;

(c) the nutritional and economic success of the programs; and

(d) the extent to which the ultimate consumer knows that the aid is coming from the United States and how this information could be provided more effectively.●

By Mr. BOSCHWITZ (for himself and Mr. DURENBERGER):

S. 2305. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to make certain local organizations of police and firefighters exempt from taxation; to the Committee on Finance.

TAX EXEMPTION FOR INCOME RECEIVED BY CERTAIN POLICE AND FIREFIGHTER'S PENSION FUNDS

● Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Mr. President, I am introducing legislation today which would provide a permanent tax exemption for the income received by certain local police and firefighter's pension funds. There is no additional cost to this legislation, since the affected organizations are already exempt under a 1981 IRS letter. It would merely give them a permanent place in the Tax Code, thus easing their fears of a future change in their status, and allow them to more effectively plan and budget for the future.

In 1975, an IRS Revenue Ruling (75-199) dealt with an organization that was formed to provide sick benefits for its members and pay death benefits to the beneficiaries of members. In that organization membership was restricted to individuals of good moral character and health who belonged to a particular ethnic group and resided in a stated geographical area.

The ruling held that since the benefit from the organization was for its members and there was only minor and incidental benefit to the community as a whole, the organization does not qualify for exemption from Federal income tax under section 501(c)(4) of the Code. (That code section provides a tax exemption for the income of "Civic leagues or organizations not organized for profit but operated exclusively for the promotion of social welfare, or local associations of employees, the membership of which is limited to the employees of a designated person or persons in a particular municipality and the net earnings of which are devoted exclusively to charitable, educational or recreation purposes.")

Then in 1981 the IRS reopened the issue through revenue ruling 81-58 which addressed the question of whether or not a nonprofit police officer association providing retirement and death benefits qualified under the above-mentioned section of the Tax Code as a social welfare organization.

The association in question was formed to promote the professional development of its members, to educate the public to recognize and appreciate the value of the services of the members, and to provide a lump-sum payment to each member upon retirement or a lump-sum payment to beneficiaries upon the member's death. The membership benefit program constituted the primary activity of the organization. It's primary sources of income were contributions by the general public and fundraising events.

The ruling held that although there was incidental benefit to the community, primary benefits were limited to members. Therefore, it was not operated for the promotion of social welfare and did not qualify for the 501(c)(4) exemption.

However, the IRS on December 14, 1981, essentially reversed both of the above rulings for some police and fire pension organizations with a special letter relating to the Mankato Fire Department Relief Association. That letter determined that ruling 81-58 did not apply to the Mankato organization for the following reasons:

The services they provide (the payment of pensions to retired members) are services that in other communities are provided by municipal or State governments and supported by tax funds. The Government recognizes its activities as its responsibility and thus in the public interest. Because of the significant State involvement, they provide a service that the Government recognizes as lessening its burden. Therefore they serve the common good and general welfare of the people within the meaning of section 501(c)(4) of the code.

Mr. President, in Minnesota alone there are 626 pension funds that would be affected by this legislation; of that number, 29 are local police relief associations; 22 are local salaried firefighter's relief associations; and 575 are volunteer firefighter's relief associations. Over 24,000 people have retirement coverage provided by these associations.

All 626 local relief associations are nonprofit corporations. Most of their financial support which is derived from sources other than investment income comes from tax revenue contributed by either the State of Minnesota or the local municipalities in which the relief associations are located.

There are several reasons why these organizations feel that their situation differs from the organizations described in revenue ruling 81-58:

First. The association described in 81-58 is a general fraternal organization of individuals without any precise legal form and not required or specifically authorized by law; whereas Minnesota local relief associations are nonprofit corporations organized under the general nonprofit corporate laws of the State, are established for a specific purpose, and are either required or specifically authorized to be established by one or more legislative enactments. For members of a Minnesota local relief association, membership in the local relief association is mandated by law or corporate bylaw and is not a matter of personal choice.

Second. The association described in the revenue ruling only provides retirement benefit coverage which supplements the regular retirement benefit coverage provided to the police officers by another retirement fund established or maintained by the employing political subdivision, whereas Minnesota local relief associations provide the regular retirement benefit coverage for police officers, salaried firefighters or volunteer firefighters and are established or maintained by the city in which they are located.

Third. The association described in the revenue ruling is only funded from private, nongovernmental sources, like personal contributions or fundraisers, whereas Minnesota local relief associations are primarily funded from State and municipal tax revenue, with the level of both State and municipal contributions mandated by law.

In addition to the above arguments in favor of the exemption, these organizations are similar in legal structure, organization, and function to other tax exempt public pension funds, notably teacher retirement associations.

I believe this to be an extremely important piece of legislation for all of our police and firefighter's organizations, and I urge its adoption.●

By Mr. PRYOR:

S. 2306. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to provide that a defined contribution plan qualified under section 401(a) will not be a disqualified person with respect to a private foundation merely because it owns more than 20-percent interest in a corporation, partnership or trust which is a substantial contributor to the foundation; to the Committee on Finance.

REMOVAL OF CERTAIN IMPEDIMENTS FOR EMPLOYEE STOCK OWNERSHIP PLAN

● Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation which is designed to remove provisions in existing law that prevent an Employee Stock Ownership Plan (ESOP) from owning more than 20 percent of a company in certain situations. This bill, if enacted, will result in virtually no revenue loss to the Federal Government. It will, however, encourage the formation of ESOP's and will remove a barrier that now prevents some ESOP's from increasing their holdings. As such, it is an extension of the previously expressed congressional support for employee stock ownership.

Mr. President, ESOP's have been encouraged for quite some time through our tax system. The Senator from Louisiana, the former chairman of the Finance Committee, Mr. LONG, has been the leader in this effort. ESOP's have been used by many companies to give the employees a stake in the venture, and I believe they have been a very useful incentive in many, many situations.

Since ESOP's have been preferred for many years, Mr. President, it seems to me that we should remove existing barriers that prevent them from operating effectively.

Under existing law, Mr. President, section 4943 of the Internal Revenue Code imposes a 5-percent tax on the excess business holdings of a private foundation. This tax, enacted in the private foundation reforms made in 1969, is designed to prevent private foundations from holding large amounts of stock in companies, and therefore, controlling them. The provision is there for a good reason, Mr. President, but I do not think it should operate in such a manner so as to exclude ESOP'S from owning more than 20 percent of the stock of the company. This occurs as a result of the definitions and rules under that section and section 4946 of the Code. If the corporation has made certain contributions to the foundation in prior years, and if an ESOP subsequently acquires more than 20 percent of the corporation's stock, they both become disqualified persons under the foundation rules. Serious tax consequences result, Mr. President, and as a practical matter, if a corporation has an ESOP and a foundation, there is a good chance it may have run afoul of these complex provisions, and the end losers might be the employees, people we have historically tried to help by encouraging ESOP formation. The bill I am introducing today, Mr. President, provides that an ESOP could acquire more than 20 percent of a company's stock without becoming a disqualified person. Additionally, it would also allow the ESOP to buy stock from the foundation without running afoul of the rules of section 4941, which deals with sales between the foundation and a disqualified person.

In short, Mr. President, it seems that if we are going to encourage ESOP's, we should do so, and where rules exist that prohibit employee stock ownership for no reasonable policy reason, they should be removed. That is what my bill attempts to do. I urge my colleagues to carefully consider this bill, and I hope it can be favorably acted upon by the Senate in the near future.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2306

Be it enacted by the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) section 4946(a)(1)(C) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to definition of disqualified persons) is amended to read as follows:

"(C) an owner (other than a defined contribution plan (as defined in section 414(i)) which satisfies the requirements of section 401(a)) of more than 20 percent of—

"(i) the total combined voting power of a corporation,

"(ii) the profits interest of a partnership, or

"(iii) the beneficial interest of a trust or unincorporated enterprise which is a substantial contributor to the foundation,"

(b) Effective date.—

The amendment made by subsection (a) of this Act shall apply to plan years beginning after the date of enactment of this Act.●

By Mr. BOSCHWITZ (for himself, Mr. DANFORTH, and Mr. TSONGAS):

S. 2307. A bill making a supplemental appropriation to carry out title II of Public Law 480; to the Committee on Appropriations.

SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATION

● Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Mr. President, by autumn of 1972, 5 years of relentless drought had brought famine to millions of people in the sub-Saharan region of West Africa known as the Sahel. By 1973, the severity of the situation had become painfully apparent to the rest of the world. In that year, the late Senator Hubert Humphrey of Minnesota, who was then the chairman of the Senate Subcommittee on Africa, introduced a bill calling for $30 million to be spent on relief to the starving. Even after this aid had been requested, however, the issue became a political and bureaucratic football that was tossed around in Washington for months. Washington's slow response to this need allowed the famine to take the lives of 200,000 to 300,000 people.

Today, more than 150 million people in at least 24 countries on that same continent now face starvation because of another more serious drought. Already, in Mozambique alone, an estimated 100,000 have died of starvation. In most countries this is the second year of the drought and their food supplies have been exhausted.

In response to this situation, the United States has provided about 187,000 metric tons of food—valued at $73.2 million—to Africa. This is about 11 percent of the 1.7 million tons of food that have been contributed by countries around the world.

The U.S. Agency for International Development (AID) has requested an emergency food aid supplemental appropriation for Africa in the amount of $90 million. This is a useful step, but it seems inadequate to meet the need. The U.N. Food and Agriculture Organization (FAO) has estimated that, in order to avoid widespread starvation in the 24 countries facing food emergencies, an additional 1.6 million metric tons of food must be provided by June of this year. This amount of food translates into $640 million worth of aid.

Traditionally, the United States has met about 40 percent of this type of food need. We should again strive to meet that goal. However, in the interest of acting promptly to save the lives of the millions of men, women, and children now facing starvation, I, along with Senators DANFORTH and TSONGAS, am introducing a bill to appropriate $150 million in immediate food aid to the famine-stricken countries in Africa. This bill will provide about 375,000 metric tons of food—less than 25 percent of the amount that is likely required. While this aid is being distributed, Congress can reassess Africa's needs and our ability to meet them.

I am very much aware that it is difficult for many in Congress to vote for more foreign aid in a time of spending constraints. However, I urge my colleagues to keep in mind that providing aid to Africa will have positive effects on the economy of the United States as well. The money we are requesting for this aid will be spent on U.S. agricultural commodities—which we have in abundance. Also, the processing of these commodities will generate additional employment in our land.

Despite the economic difficulties faced by our Nation, we are by any measure richly blessed. At this time of crisis in Africa, it is both our privilege and our responsibility to come to the aid of those who are in such desperate need. Time is of the essence. I invite my colleagues to cosponsor this supplemental appropriation bill and to help me in seeking its prompt passage.●

By Mr. HATCH:

S. 2308. A bill to revise and extend provisions of the Public Health Service Act relating to the provisions of primary health care services; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

PRIMARY HEALTH CARE ADMENDMENTS OF 1984

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I am today introducing the "Primary Care Block Grant Admendments of 1984."

In 1981, Congress created four different health block grants, one of which was the primary care block grant. This primary care block, which includes the community health center (CHC) program, was established as a voluntary program giving States the option of applying to the Secretary for an allotment to administer the program themselves or allowing the Federal Government to continue administering the program.

Under the primary care block grant, States must meet a number of requirements in order to receive allotments. Among other things, this block requires matching payments by the States for a categorical program whose costs have previously been fully paid by the Federal Government.

I believe that this matching requirement, as well as other provisions in the block, has been unnecessarily harsh. To this point, I note that only one State and the Virgin Islands have received allotments under this block.

It is necessary to get more States involved in the primary care block grant. The Department of Health and Human Services has taken a useful first step by developing formal relationships with the States, first, to increase the State's familiarity with the CHC program generally as well as with individual centers through involvement in grant reviews and project monitoring activities; second, to involve States in primary care needs/demands assessments, in CHC program resources management, and in developing funding plans for the State; and third, to assess all primary care resources in the State, analyze the organization and distribution of those resources, and plan for allocations of Federal and State primary care manpower and funds to identified areas of greatest need. Through these efforts, an increased awareness of the need for primary care services within individual States has been created.

I am encouraged by the Department's efforts, but I am convinced of the need to amend the primary care block grant statute to further encourage State participation. Several States have expressed interest in participating and are likely to do so with the changes I am proposing.

My proposal would continue the optional nature of the block by allowing the Federal Government to continue funding CHC's in States that are not interested in receiving allotments under the block grant.

The State's matching requirement would be reduced from 20 percent and 33⅓ percent to 10 percent for each of the 3 fiscal years that authority is extended.

Under the revised block grant, States would continue to be required to fund Federal grantees during the first year States receive allotments, but at levels the State deems appropriate.

My bill would continue current law provisions for funding CHC's which meet the requirements of the section 330 categorical authority and which serve medically underserved populations, but would require the active involvement of the Governor of a State in the entire medically underserved designation process.

In addition to those criteria which the Secretary must now consider in designating medically underserved areas, he would also be required to take into account those factors deemed relevant by the Governor.

Finally, my bill would require the Secretary to prepare a report by March 30, 1985, which would review the current formula used for alloting funds to the States and would make recommendations on a more equitable distribution of funds to the States. Among other things, this report should examine the merits of using medically underserved populations in the determination of the amount of a State's allotment. I am confident these changes will encourage more States to be involved in primary health care service delivery and to apply for allotments under the primary care block grant.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2308

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, that this Act may be cited as the "Primary Health Care Amendments of 1984".

REFERENCE

SEC. 2. Except as otherwise specifically provided, whenever in this Act an amendment or repeal is expressed in terms of an amendment to, or a repeal of, a section or other provision, the reference shall be considered to be made to a section or other provision of the Public Health Service Act.

PRIMARY CARE BLOCK GRANT

SEC. 3. (a) Section 1921(c) is amended to read as follows:

"(c) For grants under subsection (a), there are authorized to be appropriated $2,500,000 for the period beginning on October 1, 1984, and ending on September 30, 1987.".

(b) Section 1922 is amended to read as follows:

"AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS

"SEC. 1922. For allotments under section 1924 and for grants under section 330, there is authorized to be appropriated $340,000,000 for fiscal year 1985, $345,000,000 for fiscal year 1986, and $350,000,000 for fiscal year 1987.".

(c) Section 1924 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(c)(1) The Secretary shall conduct a study for the purpose of devising a formula for the distribution of funds available for allotment to States under this section which is more equitable than the formula specified under subsections (a) and (b). In conducting such study, the Secretary shall consider—

"(A) the financial resources of the various States;

"(B) the populations of the States;

"(C) any relevant conditions or circumstances which have changed since the date of enactment of this part, including any changes in the number of individuals in medically underserved populations; and

"(D) any other factor which the Secretary may consider appropriate.

"(2) In conducting the study required by this subsection, the Secretary shall consult with appropriate representatives of State and local governments.

"(3) By April 1, 1985, the Secretary shall prepare and transmit to the Congress a report concerning the study conducted under this subsection which includes such recommendations as the Secretary considers appropriate.".

(d)(1) Section 1926 (a)(1) is amended by striking out "1983 and 1984" and inserting in lieu thereof "1985, 1986, and 1987".

(2) Section 1926 (a)(2) is amended—

(A) by striking out the first sentence and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "From amounts paid to a State under section 1925 for the first fiscal year for which such State receives an allotment under section 1924, and from the State funds required to be made available under paragraph (4) for such fiscal year, a State shall make grants to each community health center which received a grant for its operation under section 330 (d) for the fiscal year immediately preceding such fiscal year and which meets the requirements of this paragraph; and

(B) by striking out the second sentence.

(3) Section 1926 (a) (3) is amended—

(A) by striking out "1983 and 1984" in the first sentence and inserting in lieu thereof "1985, 1986, and 1987";

(B) by striking out "fiscal year 1983" in the second sentence and inserting in lieu thereof "the first fiscal year for which a State receives an allotment under section 1924";

(C) by striking out "fiscal year 1984" in such sentence and inserting in lieu thereof "any fiscal year succeeding the first fiscal year for which the State receives an allotment under section 1924"; and

(D) by striking out "for the fiscal year" each place it appears in such sentence and inserting in lieu thereof "for such succeeding fiscal year".

(4) Section 1926 (a) (4) (A) is amended to read as follows:

"(4) (A) In any fiscal year for which a State receives an allotment under section 1924, the State shall make available, from State funds, for the grants described in paragraphs (2) and (3) for such fiscal year and for State administrative expenses for such grants for such fiscal year an amount equal to 10 percent of its allotment.".

(5) Section 330 (b) (3) is amended by striking out the second, third, fourth, and fifth sentences and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "The Secretary may not designate a medically underserved population unless, prior to such designation, the Secretary consults with the chief executive officer of the State in which the population is located and local officials in such State. In making recommendations to the Secretary, such chief executive officer and local officials may consider unusual local conditions which are a barrier to access to or the availability of personal health services. The Secretary shall prescribe criteria for determining the specific shortages of personal health services of an area or population group, which shall—

(A) take into account criteria recommended under the preceding sentences by the chief executive officer of a State or local officials in a State; and

(B) include infant mortality in an area or population group, other factors indicative of the health status of a population group or residents of an area, the ability of the residents of an area or of a population group to pay for health services and their accessibility to them, and the availability of health professionals to residents of an area or to a population group.".

MIGRANT HEALTH CENTERS

SEC. 4. The first sentence of section 329 (h) (1) is amended by striking out "and" after "1983," and by inserting before the period a comma and "$42,000,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1985, $43,200,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1986, and $43,600,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1987".

EFFECTIVE DATE

SEC. 5. This Act and the amendments made by this Act shall take effect on October 1, 1984.

By Mr. MOYNIHAN:

S. 2309. A bill to authorize the offer and payment of rewards for information and services concerning terrorist activities; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

ANTI-TERRORISM REWARDS ACT OF 1984

● Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I rise to introduce the Anti-Terrorist Rewards Act of 1984, which would authorize a $10 million fund to be available for payments for information and services leading to arrest, conviction or other appropriate resolution in cases of terrorist acts, including those acts abroad that are directed at U.S. persons and property.

If we in the United States begin 1984 with some trepidation—as we surely do—it is not only because the horrors of totalitarianism described by Orwell continue, but also because another barbarous phenomenon, known as terrorism, has come to challenge our civilization. Terrorist acts abroad this past year killed 274 Americans. Of the 1983 fatalities, most (241) were our marines who were snuffed out by one of the largest man-made explosions in history. There have been smaller nuclear explosions. Even before this incident, a car bombing of our Embassy in Beirut killed 17 Americans, as well as 63 foreign nationals.

While the bomb seems to be an increasingly popular weapon of terrorists, they also continue to employ more discrete methods. For example, in May, Lt. Comdr. Albert Schaufelberger, who served the U.S. Military Assistance Group in El Salvador, was killed in San Salvador on the campus of the University of Central America. In November, Navy Capt. George Tsantes, Jr., who served in Athens with the Joint Greece United States Military Advisory Group, was shot to death on his way to work.

As we mourn these victims, we must express gratitude that, at home, we have so far been largely spared. Yet we cannot ignore the awful possibilities. Terrorist bombs continue to explode in New York and other major cities. And who in this body did not sense our country's vulnerability as we stood on the spot where a bomb was detonated in the Capitol on November 7? It takes no stretch of the imagination to contemplate a group aching to perpetrate some outrageous act during the summer Olympic games in Los Angeles. Or elsewhere.

I say these things not to arouse emotions. No such inducement is required. To the contrary, we must be able to speak of these matters and consider what we might and must do without losing our composure or our liberties. Certainly, we say something of an overreaction in the Capitol when increased security procedures initially imposed undue restrictions on the press who cover our deliberations. Happily, however, this was soon rectified. And we can also take some comfort that our security officials did not require us to hang red or yellow identification badges around our necks, although this might avoid some embarassment for us when we are not recognized by the Capitol Police.

It is clear that the times require our intelligence and law enforcement agencies to exercise especial vigilance. But they need help. It has long been the custom of our country, and other democracies as well, to offer payments to citizens and informants who assist in the detection of crimes and the apprehension of criminals. This concept might be extended to offering rewards for assistance in dealing with those who have committed or would commit terrorist acts against U.S. persons and property abroad. At present, there is no statutory authorization for the State Department to do so.

Mr. President, the bill I have introduced would create a $10 million fund from which the Secretary of State could pay rewards for information or services, leading to arrest, conviction, or other appropriate resolution, concerning terrorist acts abroad directed against U.S. persons and property. I do not wish to be understood as suggesting that this measure would be sufficient in all terrorist cases. But it could be useful. The Secretary would be accorded broad latitude as to when and how to make offers and payments. For example, in cases where Americans were killed or U.S. property damaged in countries with whom we have friendly relations and which have operating judicial systems, the Secretary might make arrangements through their governments to post a schedule of rewards. This approach might well be taken with Greece and El Salvador with respect to the Tsantes and Schaufelberger cases. At present these cases remain unsolved. A substantial reward may provide an incentive for a citizen with information or, perhaps, a coconspirator to come forward.

Consider how a reward might help in the Tsantes case. The group claiming credit for his murder—"November 17," after the date of the suppression in 1973 of a demonstration against the former ruling military junta in Greece—also claimed credit for the 1975 assassination in Athens of Richard Welch who served there as the CIA's Chief of Station. There are other linkages; for example, ballistics tests show that the same gun was used in both killings. The Greek Government offered rewards totaling above $130,000 for information concerning the Welch murder; no reward has been offered in the Tsantes case. No prosecution was ever brought in the Welch case and the Greeks appear no closer to apprehending those responsible for killing Tsantes.

It is doubtful that conventional police work will achieve any results. Mr. President, what is needed is a significant break—a witness, someone who will come forward and name names or provide a significant lead. The posting of a substantial reward, perhaps as high as $1 million, might well prompt someone to come forward. If this bill passes, I would expect the State Department to make such an offer in this case. It is worth a try. The principle that two of the world's foremost democracies will not tolerate terrorism is worth the price of such an award.

Mr. President, the foregoing are cases in which rewards might be used to help identify and apprehend terrorists. It is of paramount interest to prevent terrorist acts. To do so requires timely information—which is typically difficult to acquire as terrorist cadres do not lend themselves to penetration. The Secretary could fashion approaches to offers and payments which take this problem into account and provide incentives for coconspirators to betray their treacherous comrades.

The bill would also provide the Attorney General similar broad authority to offer and pay rewards concerning domestic terrorism cases. Again, knowledge that large payments are available to informants might well help deter terrorist activities. The Attorney General would draw on the same $10 million available to the Secretary of State. In this connection, it should be noted that current authority to pay rewards is generally limited to $25,000 to $50,000 to any one person, except in the case of the Presidential Assassinations Act which has a $100,000 maximum. One advantage of the bill would be to permit ample payments, even exceeding $100,000 in meritorious cases.

In view of the broad authority which would be given to the Secretary of State and the Attorney General, the bill requires that they exercise it under guidelines which would be submitted to the appropriate committees of Congress for review. Semiannual reports on all offers and payments of rewards would be required under this act.

As is generally the case in reward statutes, no payments could be made under this bill to any office or employee of the United States or any State or local government who furnishes information or renders services in the performance of his or her official duties.

Mr. President, I believe that this bill would make a modest, but nonetheless, important contribution to our Nation's efforts to combat terrorism. I urge my colleagues to support this measure.●

S. 2310. A bill to establish Senior Citizen Tutorial Volunteer Network programs which will provide opportunities for senior citizens to work in elementary and secondary schools and in the home with educationally disadvantaged children and their families; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

SENIOR CITIZEN TUTORIAL VOLUNTEER NETWORK ACT OF 1984

● Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I am today introducing legislation which would establish Senior Citizen Tutorial Volunteer Network programs to provide supplemental educational and related services to educationally disadvantaged children attending chapter 1 schools.

The purpose of this legislation is to upgrade the basis skills of educationally disadvantaged children. This would be achieved by utilizing the reservoir of skill and talent that exists among senior citizens and parents in the school community.

Specifically, under my proposal, senior citizen volunteers would work directly with disadvantaged children who would be benefited by tutoring. Most of the time of senior citizen volunteers would be spent in the classroom or in the home providing services to pupils in small groups or on a one-on-one basis as needed. The remainder of the time would be spent serving as liaison to the families of the children with whom the volunteer is working. The liaison activities could include:

First, assisting the parent in carrying out home learning activities in basic skills;

Second, advising and supporting parents in creating a home environment conducive to study, including work space, monitoring homework, time-management and scheduling;

Third, serving as a regular contact for reporting progress and sharing problems and concerns of such children.

Programs that involve senior citizens and parents in the education of their own children are by no means new. Many researches have concluded that increasing the interest of parents in their children's education, developing ways of conveying that interest to the children, and engaging senior citizens and parents in the actual teaching of children are effective ways of increasing academic achievement and discipline in the schools.

As president of the Washington, D.C., based Home and School Institute, one of the program models on which this legislation is based, Dr. Dorothy Rich has a long record of service and experience with parents, senior volunteers, and schools across the Nation. In testimony before the Senate Labor and Human Resources' Subcommittee on Aging, Family, and Human Services on March 22, 1983, she revealed:

> Research on the importance of the family as educator is very clear . . . these programs work for a wide range of families, including those who have little time, little money, and little formal education.
> A question that needs to be addressed is not how to use the school to strengthen the family, but how to use the potency and impact of the family to strengthen the school. Research has clearly shown that the efforts of schools which do not involve families do not result in achievement for children. What is needed is a real and substantive partnership between home and school. And this needs to happen now. It's traditionally safe to say that we need to know more before taking action, etc., but in my judgment we already know a great deal.

Since 1978, the University of Pittsburgh Center for Social and Urban Research has been studying the affect senior citizens participating in its generations together senior citizen school volunteer program have had on children's growth and learning. Dr. Sally Newman, director of the program which is also one of the models on which my proposal is based determined that:

> As a result of these programs there is an improvement in the academic performance and social behavior of children and youth and an improvement in the self-esteem, mental, and physical health of the elderly. Over 35,000 youth and 1,500 older persons have benefitted from their participation in these programs that currently are in over 50 schools in Western Pennsylvania. We know this model works. . . . We are particularly supportive of this intergenerational effort that will enable a population of youth who may be educationally disadvantaged to keep pace with more fortunate youth.

During the growth of the program from 1978 through 1983, Dr. Newman collected information from participating teachers and senior volunteers on their perception of the program's impact. Consistent positive reporting from a variety of communities, and at all grade levels, suggests that the generations together SCSV model can be successfully replicated in other school districts. The data summary from the 1982-83 program impact questionnaires showed that:

98% of the senior citizen volunteers gave an overall rating of Excellent or Good to the program;

97% of the teachers gave an overall rating of Excellent or Good to the volunteers' contribution to the classroom.

95% of the senior citizen volunteers felt that there was adequate use of their time.

86% of the senior citizen volunteers felt that there was adequate use of their skills, interests, and experience.

The National Committee for Citizens in Education (NCCE), a national advocacy group, has systematically compiled the results of two dozen recent studies, all of which point to the same conclusion: Parents involvement in schools in almost any form improves student achievement. NCCE's studies cover children of all ages and families in many parts of the country. Consistently, NCCE'S research shows that:

Involvement is positively related to achievement, even in areas with severe poverty . . . schools with a well established mechanism for parent involvement have better overall achievement than schools which do not, regardless of the social background of the parents.

Although the recent reports on the condition of education receiving wide discussion, focus almost exclusively on what takes place in the classroom, they do, to some degree, recognize the impact of forces outside the school on children's academic performance. For example, the National Commission on Excellence observes that schools are continually called on to provide solutions to personal, social, and political problems that the home and other institutions either will not or cannot resolve. The Commission concludes the report with a word to parents and students in which it exhorts parents to recognize that they have a responsibility as the first and most influential teacher of their children. Parents are asked to engage actively in their children's education. As another, perhaps more relevant example, the recent report from the Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching describes a communications gap between home and school. The Carnegie report concludes:

For schools to be effective, parents must be involved. To increase participation, we recommend that there be a Parent-Teacher-Student Advisory Council at every school. We further recommend that a parent-volunteer program be established in all the nations secondary schools.

There is an urgent need for implementation of my proposal. The various pilot projects that are taking place around the country cannot meet the demand and the challenge in its entirety. Project Help in Benton Harbor, Grand Rapids, and East Lansing, Mich., and in South Bend, Ind., have all achieved substantial gains in reading for first graders and kindergarteners. The grandpeople project at Emerson Elementary School in Riverside, Calif., is a success story, and families learning together of rural South Carolina recently reported that 92 percent of participating parents felt that the program made their children confident and enjoy school more. Replications of the program have taken place in Nazareth, Pa., and Rockford, Ill.

Again, they cannot meet the demand and the challenge in its entirety. It is estimated that over 11 million children of low-income families need help in basic skills. The current chapter 1 program for the education of disadvantaged children reaches less than half that number.

The modest cost of my proposal would be $6 million a year for a 5-year funding cycle. Funds would be used to provide training to senior citizen volunteers, teachers, and other elementary and secondary school personnel involved in the programs, to adapt and develop appropriate curriculum materials to be used, and to provide assistance to senior volunteers to pay expenses necessary to such programs.

Applicants eligible for program funding under the competitive grants process would be local educational agencies entitled to receive assistance under title 1 of the Education Consolidation and Improvement Act of 1981, and public agencies or private nonprofit organizations applying jointly with one or more such local educational agencies.

Time is of the essence, I hope we can speedily consider this much-needed legislation.

I am pleased that Senators BOREN, HEINZ, and COCHRAN have joined me as cosponsors of this much-needed legislation.●

By Mr. HATCH:

S. 2311. A bill to amend the provisions of the Public Health Service Act relating to health maintenance organizations; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

HEALTH MAINTENANCE ORGANIZATION AMENDMENTS OF 1984

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I am today introducing the Health Maintenance Organization Amendments of 1984. One of the most significant factors in the explosive growth of our Federal deficit has been the rapid escalation of Federal health care payments, principally through the medicare and medicaid programs. Health care has also taken an ever-increasing proportion of private income. Many initiatives have been taken and many alternative delivery systems have been developed to try to contain this growth. One of the most promising and successful developments in this respect has been the rise of health maintenance organizations (HMO's).

HMO's collect fixed, prepaid premiums from their members, usually through employers, and typically for comprehensive service on a per capita basis. The health care provider receives a fixed income and thus has no incentive to provide unnecessary health services, since a greater than expected call on resources may be uncompensated. This contrasts with the normal fee-for-service arrangement in which the more services a patient uses, the more a provider is likely to be paid. By spreading financial risk, HMO's remove the incentive for overuse. The health care costs of some HMO's are 40 percent less than those under regular insurance plans, and the average hospital utilization rate for HMO's is likewise lower than that for conventional plans. Furthermore, HMO's have been shown to deliver good quality care, and to naturally encourage greater emphasis on preventive health practices.

Despite these virtues, however, HMO's spread very slowly. In an effort to stimulate their expansion, Congress in 1973 passed the Health Maintenance Organization Act, title XIII of the Public Health Service Act. That act preempted restrictive State laws and set organizational, financial, and benefit standards for those HMO's that wanted to become federally qualified. It also provided loans, contracts, and grants to assist in their planning, formation, and initial operation. Since that time, and with the help of the Federal legislation, HMO's have found increasing acceptance among employers, enrollees, and health providers alike. With total enrollments of over 13 million nationwide, HMO's are now enjoying ready access to private financing for their formation. And indeed a growing number of them are for-profit, and profitable, organizations.

With this acceptance has come a phaseout of Federal financial assistance. At this time only a few loans to young HMO's already in place are being continued—no Federal funding for new HMO's has been appropriated, nor is any needed. Indeed, the number of HMO's forming and applying for Federal qualification has been greater since Federal support has ceased. Thus it appears that this part of the program has been successful in helping the industry get on its feet, and has served its purpose.

However, the balance of the Federal program is of continuing importance in maintaining Federal standards and in insuring the access to HMO's of many employees across the country. Thus it gives me pleasure to introduce at this time the Health Maintenance Organization Amendments of 1984, which will improve the operation of the act and reauthorize a limited range of support functions for 3 years.

These amendments continue the loan fund through fiscal year 1987 in order to honor our commitment to the few HMO's which have remaining eligibility under existing loans, and for handling any defaults on loans or guarantees already made. They would also extend for 3 years the training and technical assistance functions performed by the Department of Health and Human Services in administering the program.

Next, the bill would make some minor but beneficial changes in the operation of the act. HMO's may, but are not required, to offer health services called supplemental services. These amendments would allow HMO's to set their fees for such services based on experience rather than on community rating principles. This should result in HMO's becoming more competitive with conventional insurance in this area and increasing the number of such services that HMO's will offer to their enrollees.

This legislation would repeal, for private HMO's, the requirement that one-third of their governing boards must be composed of enrollees of that organization. There is widespread consensus that this requirement is not useful, since the one-third figure confers on the enrollee group no control, while the fiduciary responsibilities of directors require them to make their decisions based on what is best for their organization and its shareholders, whether they are enrollees, doctors, or officers of the HMO itself. Further, this requirement has had the effect of impeding the spread of HMO's by making it difficult for existing HMO's to set up subsidiaries in other service areas.

The bill also repeals the requirement that HMO's periodically requalify in order to retain their Federal status. I am of course concerned that HMO's, once qualified, remain fiscally sound and continue to adhere to other Federal standards, and I have in the past favored the requalification requirement. However, DHHS now has in place a review and monitoring program, backed by the Secretary's authority to withdraw Federal qualification, which is adequate to insure compliance by HMO's on a continuing basis. Under these circumstances, retention of the requalification provision serves no real purpose and is simply a burdensome formality.

Finally, the amendments contain several housecleaning provisions designed to update the act. Sections 4, 5, and 6 would repeal unneeded support authorities which are no longer being funded or which have never been funded. Other sections further update the act to reflect the lack of new Federal financial support for new HMO's, eliminate a little-used report, and update the digest of State HMO laws and regulations annually instead of quarterly.

Mr. President, the fact that these proposed amendments are little more than fine tuning of the Health Maintenance Organization Act of 1973 indicates not only the smooth functioning of that law as administered by the Department of Health and Human Services, but also the basic sound health of the HMO industry itself. Nevertheless, I feel we should not let pass the opportunity of reauthorization without making such beneficial adjustments as may seem wise in light of our experience with the program since it was last amended in 1981.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2311

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Health Maintenance Organization Amendments of 1984".

SUPPLEMENTAL HEALTH SERVICES

SEC. 2. Section 1301(b)(2) of the Public Health Service Act (hereafter in this Act referred to as "the Act") is amended by striking out the second sentence.

MEMBERSHIP REPRESENTATION ON POLICYMAKING BODIES

SEC. 3. Section 1301(c)(5) of the Act is amended to read as follows:

"(5) in the case of a public health maintenance organization, have an advisory board to the policymaking body of the public entity operating the organization—

"(A) which is organized to assure that—"(i) at least one-third of the members of the board will be members of the health maintenance organization; and

"(ii) there will be equitable representation on the board of members from medically underserved populations served by the health maintenance organization; and

"(B) to which policymaking authority for the organization may be delegated;".

ELIMINATION OF AUTHORIZATION OF SUPPORT FOR FEASIBILITY SURVEYS, PLANNING, AND INITIAL DEVELOPMENT COSTS

SEC. 4. (a) Sections 1303, 1304, and 1307 (c) of the Act are repealed.

(b) Section 1306 of the Act is amended—

(1) by striking out "grant, contract, loan," each place it appears (except in subsection (b)(5)) and inserting in lieu thereof "loan",

(2) by striking out "in the case of an application for assistance under section 1303 or 1304, such application meets the application requirements of such section, and in the case of an application for a loan or loan guarantee," in subsection (b)(1),

(3) by striking out "1304," in subsection (b)(2), and

(4) by striking out "grants, contracts, loans," in subsection (c) and inserting in lieu thereof "loans",

(c) Section 1307 of the Act is amended—

(1) by striking out "grant, contract, loan," each place it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "loan",

(2) by striking out "grant, contract, or" in subsection (a)(1), and

(3) by striking out "such assistance" in subsection (a)(1) and inserting in lieu thereof "the loan".

(d) Section 1309(a) of the Act is amended—

(1) by striking out paragraph (1), and

(2) by striking out "(2)".

(e) The first sentence of section 1317(b) of the Act is amended—

(1) by striking out clause (1), and

(2) by redesignating clauses (2) and (3) as clauses (1) and (2), respectively.

(f) The amendments made by this section do not apply to any grant made or contract entered into under title XIII of the Act before October 1, 1984.

LIMITATION ON LOANS AND LOAN GUARANTEES FOR INITIAL COSTS OF OPERATION

SEC. 5. (a) The last sentence of section 1305(a) of the Act is amended by inserting before the period ", and unless the Secretary has made a grant or loan to, entered into a contract with, or guaranteed a loan for, the organization in fiscal year 1981, 1982, 1983, or 1984 under this section or section 1304(b) (as in effect before October 1, 1984)".

(b) The amendment made by subsection (a) does not apply to any loan or loan guarantee for the initial costs of operation of a health maintenance organization made under title XIII of the Act before October 1, 1984.

S.J. Res. 229. Joint resolution to proclaim the week beginning April 22, 1984, as National Dance Week; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NATIONAL DANCE WEEK

● Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I rise today, on behalf of myself, my two distinguished colleagues from Arkansas, Mr. BUMPERS and Mr. PRYOR, and my distinguished colleague from Rhode Island (Mr. PELL), to introduce a joint resolution proclaiming the week beginning April 22, 1984, as National Dance Week.

Dance invites our participation in and appreciation of human movement, as artistic expression, exercise, and therapy. And the invitation has resulted in a most successful pas de deux: In the last 20 years, professional dance companies have grown nearly 400 percent; while the audience for professional dance, through live performance and through television, has expanded by more than 2,000 percent.

In our theaters and festivals, ballet and public schools, churches and synagogues, dance marks our celebrations of life. Terpsichore's beguiling and pleasing embrace merits this national vote of homage.

I ask unanimous consent that the full text of the resolution be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 229

Whereas, more and more professionals and amateurs are involved in dance for their livelihood and avocation, as well as for artistic expression, aesthetic appreciation, emotional outlet and physical fitness;

Whereas, within the past two decades the number of dance companies grew from 100 to 400, while their audiences increased from about 1 million to twenty million, with nearly twice that number viewing dance on television;

Whereas, dance companies are an important artistic and cultural asset in over 200 communities throughout the country, with professional dance companies touring to 350 cities and towns each year;

Whereas, the total budget for America's dance companies rose to over $100 million last year supporting not only thousands of dancers but similar numbers of craft and service personnel who directly benefit from the economic activity generated by dance companies;

Whereas, the number of dance students in universities, private colleges, public schools and studios is increasing rapidly throughout the country;

Whereas, dance is an ethnically and racially diverse activity that serves as a forum for cultural integration.

Whereas, national recognition and promotion will help dance to enrich the lives of Americans of all backgrounds, lifestyles and interests. Now therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the week beginning April 22, 1984 is designated as "National Dance Week" and the President of the United States is authorized to issue a proclamation calling upon Federal, State and local government agencies and programs, thereby showing their support of dance in America.●

By Mr. SPECTER:

S.J. Res. 230. A joint resolution to designate the week of October 7, 1984, through October 13, 1984 as "National Birds of Prey Conservation Week"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NATIONAL BIRDS OF PREY CONSERVATION WEEK

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, today it is my pleasure to introduce legislation designating October 7 to 13, 1984, "National Birds of Prey Conservation Week," on behalf of my distinguished colleague from Pennsylvania, Congressman DON RITTER, and myself.

People sometimes deride resolutions designating special weeks or days, and you might wonder why birds of prey deserve special recognition. There are over 1 million Americans who regularly observe hawks and other birds of prey. To them, the critical importance of these birds to our environment is clear, and it is on their behalf that I am introducing this resolution.

In the past, public attitudes toward birds of prey have been a product of ignorance, and, in 1982, 40 of the 53 birds of prey species were listed by one or more State conservation agencies as endangered, extirpated, threatened, or of concern. Yet, these birds play a vital role as indicators of the quality of the environment and ecosystem they inhabit because they are at the top of their food chain and are, thus, very sensitive to environmental changes. They are essential to our ability to monitor the health of our environment and to recognize problems before they become disasters. Similarly, management to benefit birds of prey will also benefit a wide spectrum of other wildlife species.

The creation of National Birds of Prey Conservation Week would focus public attention on the value of these birds in wildlife communities and stimulate support for the management of their habitats and the preservation of important hawk migration outlooks. It would also direct the public toward esthetic appreciation of these splendid birds and away from the illegal shooting of them which continues to be prevalent in some areas. In addition, it would encourage schools to include birds of prey teaching units in their science curricula.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of this joint resolution be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 230

Whereas hawks, owls, and other birds of prey are vital ecological components of the wildlife communities in which they live, and are important environmental indicators of ecosystem quality;

Whereas forty of the fifty-three species of birds of prey that occur regularly in the United States have been listed by one or more State conservation agencies as endangered, extirpated, threatened, or of concern;

Whereas public attitudes regarding birds of prey are changing to one of appreciation and understanding; and

Whereas over a million Americans are birdwatchers who regularly observe hawks and other birds of prey every autumn at migration outlooks located on major raptor flyways scattered from California to Maine, and from Minnesota to Florida and Texas: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the week of October 7, 1984 through October 13, 1984 is designated as "National Birds of Prey Conservation Week", and the President of the United States is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon individuals to observe such a week by considering the importance of birds of prey in wildlife communities.

By Mr. THURMOND (for himself, Mr. BAUCUS, Mr. DOLE, Mr. GRASSLEY, Mr. HATCH, Mr. LAXALT, Mr. LEAHY, Mr. HEFLIN, Mr. BINGAMAN, Mr. CHAFEE, Mr. CHILES, Mr. COCHRAN, Mr. CRANSTON, Mr. DOMENICI, Mr. DURENBERGER, Mr. GOLDWATER, Mrs. HAWKINS, Mr. HELMS, Mr. INOUYE, Mr. JOHNSTON, Mrs. KASSEBAUM, Mr. LUGAR, Mr. MOYNIHAN, Mr. NUNN, Mr. STAFFORD, Mr. STEVENS, and Mr. TSONGAS):

S.J. Res. 232. Joint resolution to authorize and request the President to designate the month of May 1984, as "National Physical Fitness and Sports Month"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NATIONAL PHYSICAL FITNESS AND SPORTS MONTH

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, again this year, I am pleased to introduce, along with 25 of my colleagues, including seven distinguished members of the Committee on the Judiciary, a joint resolution designating the month of May as "National Physical Fitness and Sports Month."

We no longer view physical exercise as solely for entertainment purposes. In the past few decades, a large segment of the population of this country has become conscious of and involved in the ever-growing fitness movement. Physical activity should be an important part of life each day for persons of all ages and abilities.

Interest in sports begins at an early age. Nearly 30 million boys and girls take part in age-grouped team sports and other organized out-of-school physical activity. More than 6 million teenagers and over 600,000 college students compete in interscholastic and intramural athletic programs.

One of every two adults in the United States engages regularly in some type of exercise and/or sports. A third of us swim; a fourth ride bicycles; and a fifth play one of the racquet sports. More than 20 million people in this country run. The number of physically active women and men has doubled in 10 years and continues to grow rapidly.

Not only are fitness and sports programs a source of pleasure and personal satisfaction by which we refresh and strengthen ourselves, but they also are good preventive programs of health care. Therefore, it is essential that we publicize fitness programs, designed to improve the quality of our lives. We must make all Americans aware of the benefits offered with such programs increasingly available to everyone. Accordingly, I am introducing this joint resolution which requests President Reagan to declare May 1984 as "National Physical Fitness and Sports Month."

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a copy of the resolution be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 232

Whereas one of every two adults in our country is a regular participant in exercise and sports;

Whereas the number of physically active men and women has doubled in ten years and continues to grow rapidly;

Whereas today we recognize that physical activity is an important part of daily life for people of both sexes and of all ages;

Whereas physical activity is vital to good health and is a rich source of pleasure and personal satisfaction;

Whereas our physical fitness and sports programs are one of the primary means by which we strengthen our bodies and refresh our spirits; and

Whereas it is essential that we make fitness and sports programs increasingly available so that all of our citizens will be able to experience the joys and benefits they offer; Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation designating the month of May, 1984, as "National Physical Fitness and Sports Month", and to call upon Federal, State, and local government agencies, and the people of the United States to observe the month with appropriate programs, ceremonies, and activities.

By Mr. THURMOND:

S.J Res. 233. A joint resolution to authorize the President's Commission on Organized Crime to compel the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of information; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

ORGANIZED CRIME COMMISSION AUTHORITY TO SUBPENA WITNESSES

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President; at the request of the Department of Justice, I am introducing today a joint resolution to authorize the President's Commission on Organized Crime, of which I am a member, to compel the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of information.

In order to meet the mandate placed upon it by the President, the Commission must be given the power to quickly and efficiently collect all relevant information from all sources. While I have some questions concerning the scope of the authority being sought, this proposal is an appropriate vehicle for further consideration by the committee.

I ask unanimous consent that the resolution and accompanying letter be inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 233

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That for purposes of this joint resolution—

(a) The term "Commission" means the Commission established by the President by Executive Order 12435, dated July 28, 1983, as it now exists and as it may be extended pursuant to amendments to that order.

(b) An oath taken before the Commission, or before a member of the Commission or a member of the staff of the Commission designated by the Commission for such purpose, shall be deemed to be an oath taken before a competent officer or person within the meaning of section 1621 of title 18, United States Code (relating to the offense of perjury).

(c) A proceeding before or ancillary to the Commission shall be deemed to be a matter within the jurisdiction of, or before, a department or agency of the United States within the meaning of section 1001, of title 18, United States Code (relating to the offense of making a false statement) and section 1505 of title 18, United States Code (relating to the offense of obstruction of proceedings).

(d) A proceeding before or ancillary to the Commission shall be deemed to be an official proceeding within the meaning of section 1512 of title 18, United States Code (relating to tampering with a witness, victim, or an informant) and section 1513 of title 18, United States Code (relating to retaliating against a witness, victim, or an informant).

(e) For the purposes of section 7, the terms "agency", "individual", "maintain", "record", and "accounting" have the meanings set forth in section 552a, title 5, United States Code.

SEC. 2. ISSUANCE OF SUBPOENAS.

The Commission shall have the power to issue subpoenas, under the signature of the Chairman of the Commission or of another member of the Commission authorized by the Commission, requiring the attendance and testimony of witnesses before the Commission, or before a member of the Commission or a member of the staff of the Commission designated by the Commission for such purpose, and the production of information relating to a matter under investigation by the Commission. A subpoena may require the person to whom it is directed to produce such information at any time prior to the time at which such person is to testify, and may require the attendance of a witness and the production of information from any place within the jurisdicton of the United States at any designated place of hearing.

SEC. 3. ENFORCEMENT OF SUBPOENAS.

In case of contumacy or refusal to obey a subpoena issued to a person under section 2, a court of the United States within the jurisdiction of which the person is directed to appear or produce information, or within the jurisdiction of which the person is found, resides, or transacts business, shall have jurisdiction, upon application by the Attorney General on behalf of the Commission, to issue to such person an order requiring such person to appear before the Commission, or before a member of the Commission or a member of the staff of the Commission designated by the Commission for such purpose, there to give testimony or produce information relating to the matter under investigation, as required by the subpoena. A person who fails to obey such order of the court may be punished by the court as provided in section 401 of title 28, United States Code (relating to criminal contempt), or may be confined pursuant to section 1826 of title 18, United States Code (relating to civil contempt), but such confinement shall not exceed the life of the Commission, including extensions, and in no event shall such confinement exceed eighteen months.

SEC. 4. TESTIMONY OF PERSONS IN CUSTODY.

If the Commission determines that it requires the testimony of a person in custody, a court of the United States within the jurisdiction of which the person is to testify, or within the jurisdiction of which such person is held in custody, shall have jurisdiction, upon application by the Attorney General on behalf of the Commission, to issue a writ of habeas corpus ad testificandum requiring the custodian to produce such person before the Commission, or before a member of the Commission or a member of the staff of the Commission designated by the Commission for such purpose.

SEC. 5. COMPULSION OF TESTIMONY.

If a person who has been or may be called to testify or provide other information refuses, on the basis of his privilege against self-incrimination, to testify or provide such information, the Commission may, with the approval of the Attorney General, issue an order requiring the person to give testimony or provide other information which he refuses to give or provide on the basis of his privilege against self-incrimination in the same manner and subject to the same conditions as an agency of the United States is authorized to issue such an order pursuant to sections 6001, 6002, and 6004 of title 18, United States Code.

SEC. 6. TAKING OF TESTIMONY AND RECEIPT OF EVIDENCE.

The Commission, or a member of the Commission or member of the staff of the Commission designated by the Commission for such purpose, may conduct hearings, administer oaths and affirmations, examine witnesses, and receive documentary or other information in evidence.

SEC. 7. ACCESS TO OTHER AGENCY RECORDS.

(a) Disclosure otherwise prohibited by subsection (b), of section 552a of title 5, United States Code, of a record maintained by an agency, may, upon application to such agency by an attorney for the Commission who has been authorized by the Commission to make such an application, be made to the Commission and members of the staff of the Commission for use in the performance of the Commission's duties.

(b) An agency disclosing a record under subsection (a) shall not make the accounting required by subsection (c) of section 552a of title 5, United States Code, to be made available to the individual named in the record.

SEC. 8. LIMITATIONS ON DISCLOSURE.

A person to whom disclosure of information is made under section 7, shall use such information solely in the performance of his duties for the Commission and shall make no disclosure of such information except as provided for by this joint resolution, or as otherwise authorized by law.

SEC. 9. SERVICE OF PROCESS, WITNESS FEES.

(a) Process and papers issued by the Commission, or by a member of the Commission or a member of the staff of the Commission designated by the Commission for such purpose, may be served in person, by registered or certified mail, by telegraph, or by leaving a copy thereof at the residence or principal office or place of business of the person required to be served. When service is by registered or certified mail or by telegraph, the return post office receipt or telegraph receipt therefor shall be proof of service. Otherwise, the verified return by the individual making service, setting forth the manner of such service, shall be proof of service.

(b) Process of a court to which application may be made under this joint resolution may be served in a judicial district wherein the person required to be served is found, resides, or transacts business.

(c) A witness summoned before the Commission, or before a member of the Commission or a member of the staff of the Commission, shall be paid the same fees and mileage as are paid witnesses in the courts of the United States, and a witness whose deposition is taken and the person taking the same shall severally be entitled to the same fees as are paid for like services in the courts of the United States.

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
OFFICE OF LEGISLATIVE AFFAIRS,
Washington, D.C., November 18, 1983.

The VICE PRESIDENT,
U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. VICE PRESIDENT: Enclosed for your consideration and appropriate reference is a legislative proposal to authorize the President's Commission on Organized Crime to compel the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of information. This proposal is submitted on behalf of the Commission.

On July 28, 1983, the President approved Executive Order No. 12435 creating the Commission on Organized Crime. Chaired by one of the most distinquished members of the Federal Judiciary, the Honorable Irving R. Kaufman, the President's Commission on Organized Crime is comprised of twenty members including Senator Strom Thrumond, Representative Peter W. Rodino, Jr., and Justice Potter Stewart. The mandate of this panel is set out in Executive Order No. 12435 which specifies that:

The Commission shall make a full and complete national and region-by-region analysis of organized crime; define the nature of traditional organized crime as well as emerging organized crime groups, the sources and amounts of organized crime's income, and the uses of which organized crime puts its income; develop in-depth information on the participants in organized crime networks; and evaluate Federal laws pertinent to the effort to combat organized crime. The Commission shall advise the President and the Attorney General with respect to its findings and actions which can be undertaken to improve law enforcement efforts directed against organized crime, and make recommendations concerning appropriate administrative and legislative improvements and improvements in the administration of justice.

To perform these important functions effectively, the Commission must be able to gather all relevant information expeditiously and efficiently from all available sources. The provisions of the enclosed draft joint resolution are designed to assist the Commission's information-gathering process by: empowering the Commission to issue subpoenas to compel the testimony of witnesses and the production of information (Sec. 2); to seek court orders—punishable by contempt—enforcing its subpoenas (Sec. 3); permitting the Commission to apply for writs of habeas corpus ad testificandum to secure the testimony of persons in custody (Sec. 4); empowering the Commission—with the approval of the Attorney General—to order the giving of testimony or production of other information that a witness refuses to give or produce on the basis of his privilege against self-incrimination (Sec. 5); authorizing the Commission to administer oaths, examine witnesses, and receive evidence (Sec. 6); and permitting disclosure to the Commission of records maintained by other government agencies (Sec. 7). In addition, the joint resolution provides for the protection of information disclosed to the Commission (Sec. 8) and contains provisions for the service of process and payment of witness fees (Sec. 9).

SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS

The first section of the proposed joint resolution is intended to define the term "Commission" and to clarify that Federal laws relating to perjury, false statements, obstruction of justice, and interference with witnesses apply to Commission proceedings. This section also defines certain key terms by reference to the Privacy Act of 1974, 5 U.S.C. 552a.

Section 2 grants the Commission, acting through the Chairman or an authorized member, subpoena power in aid of the Commission's investigative mission. The Commission's subpoena power is intended to be as broad as the law permits. Specifically, it includes the power to require the attendance and testimony of witnesses, and the production of information both before and at the time at which the person subpoenaed is to testify. The only limitation intended to be placed on the Commission's subpoena power under this section is that the testimony or information sought relate to a matter under investigation by the Commission.

Section 3 specifies the manner in which the Commission's subpoenas are to be enforced. As is true of other government agencies, the Commission has not been given the power to enforce its own subpoenas; rather, like the others, the Commission must seek a court order compelling compliance with its subpoena if the person to whom it is addressed fails or refuses to comply. In such a case, Section 3 gives Federal courts jurisdiction, upon application by the Attorney General on behalf of the Commission, to issue an enforcement order, and provides that failure to obey the order of the court may be treated by the court as contempt thereof.

Section 4 provides a means whereby the Commission may obtain necessary testimony from a person in custody. Under this section, the Attorney General is authorized to apply, on behalf of the Commission, to an appropriate Federal court for a writ of habeas corpus ad testificandum requiring the person's custodian to produce the person before the Commission.

Section 5 grants the Commission the same authority as is conferred by 18 U.S.C. 6001, 6002, and 6004 on various administrative agencies to compel the giving of testimony or production of other information in the face of a refusal based on a person's privilege against self-incrimination. If, in the judgment of the Commission, it may be necessary in the public interest to obtain testimony or other information from an individual and the individual has refused or is likely to refuse to testify or provide the information on the basis of his privilege against self-incrimination, the Commission may, with the approval of the Attorney General, order the individual to give the testimony or provide the information sought. In such a case, however, the testimony or information provided may not be used against the individual in a criminal case other than a prosecution for perjury, giving a false statement, or otherwise failing to comply with the order.

Section 6 simply authorizes the Commission, acting through a member or a staff member designated for such purpose, to conduct hearings, administer oaths and affirmations, examine witnesses, and receive documentary and other information in evidence.

Section 7 provides for disclosure to the Commission of records of Federal agencies that would otherwise be prohibited by the Privacy Act of 1974, 5 U.S.C. 552a(b). Under Section 7, such a record may, upon application by an attorney for the Commission, be made available to the Commission and its personnel for use in the performance of their duties without notice to or consent by the individual to whom the record pertains, and the agency making the disclosure is relieved of the obligation, imposed by 5 U.S.C. 552a(c), of making an accounting to the individual named in the record. By virtue of the cross-reference in section 1(e) of the joint resolution, the terms "agency," "individual," "maintain," "record," and "accounting" have the meanings set forth in 5 U.S.C. 552a.

Section 8 is intended to underscore the limited purposes for which information autorized by this joint resolution to be made available to the Commission is to be used. It provides that a person to whom disclosure is made of agency records under section 7 shall use such information solely in the performance of his duties for the Commission and shall make no disclosure of such information except as provided for by the joint resolution, or as otherwise authorized by law.

Section 9 contains provisions relating to service of process and payments to witness. Subsection (a) specifies the various means by which the Commission may serve process and other papers. Subsection (b) sets forth the permissible places of service of process of a court to which application is made under the joint resolution. Subsection (c) provides that witnesses summoned before the Commission shall be paid the same fees and mileage as are paid witnesses in the courts of the United States, and that witnesses whose depositions are taken and the persons taking the depositions shall be paid the same fees as are paid for the same services in the courts of the United States.

In announcing the creation of the Commission on July 28, the President noted the importance of the investigations by the Kefauver Committee in the early fifties, the labor racketeering hearings of the McClellan Commission in the mid-fifties, and the testimony of Federal informant Joseph Valachi before a Senate Committee in the 1960's. The President went on to say that this Commission is "vitally important—one of the centerpieces in our strategy for a frontal assault on the mob in America." He concluded by stating his belief that the Commission "can mobilize the American people against organized crime by triggering the kind of public support that is vital for its final isolation and elimination."

Again, the investigative powers proposed in the enclosed draft joint resolution are essential if the Commission on Organized Crime is to fulfill its mandate. These powers are consistent with those approved by the Congress for previous commissions including the Warren Commission, the Commission on the Causes and Prevention of Violence, and the Commission which investigated the 1979 nuclear incident at Three Mile Island. We will deeply appreciate the prompt attention of the Congress to this proposal.

The Office of Management and Budget has advised this Department that there is no objection from the standpoint of the Administration's program to the presentation of this legislative proposal and that its enactment would be in accord with the program of the President.

Sincerely,

ROBERT A. MCCONNELL,
Assistant Attorney General.

Enclosure.

A JOINT RESOLUTION: AUTHORIZING THE PRESIDENT'S COMMISSION ON ORGANIZED CRIME TO COMPEL THE ATTENDANCE AND TESTIMONY OF WITNESSES AND THE PRODUCTION OF INFORMATION

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That for purposes of this joint resolution—

(a) The term "Commission" means the Commission established by the President by Executive Order 12435, dated July 28, 1983, as it now exists and as it may be extended pursuant to amendments to that order.

(b) An oath taken before the Commission, or before a member of the Commission or a member of the staff of the Commission designated by the Commission for such purpose, shall be deemed to be an oath taken before a competent officer or person within the meaning of section 1621 of title 18, United States Code (relating to the offense of perjury).

(c) A proceeding before or ancillary to the Commission shall be deemed to be a matter within the jurisdiction of, or before, a department or agency of the United States within the meaning of section 1001, of title 18, United States Code (relating to the offense of making a false statement) and section 1505 of title 18, United States Code (relating to the offense of obstruction of proceedings).

(d) A proceeding before or ancillary to the Commission shall be deemed to be an official proceeding within the meaning of section 1512 of title 18, United States Code (relating to tampering with a witness, victim, or an informant) and section 1513 of title 18, United States Code (relating to retaliating against a witness, victim, or an informant).

(e) For the purposes of section 7, the terms "agency", "individual", "maintain", "record" and "accounting" have the meanings set forth in section 552a, title 5, United States Code.

SEC. 2. ISSUANCE OF SUBPOENAS.

The Commission shall have the power to issue subpoenas, under the signature of the Chairman of the Commission or of another member of the Commission authorized by the Commission, requiring the attendance and testimony of witnesses before the Commission, or before a member of the Commission or a member of the staff of the Commission designated by the Commission for such purpose, and the production of information relating to a matter under investigation by the Commission. A subpoena may require the person to whom it is directed to produce such information at any time prior to the time at which such person is to testify, and may require the attendance of a witness and the production of information from any place within the jurisdiction of the United States at any designated place of hearing.

SEC. 3. ENFORCEMENT OF SUBPOENAS.

In case of contumacy or refusal to obey a subpoena issued to a person under section 2, a court of the United States within the jurisdiction of which the person is directed to appear or produce information, or within the jurisdiction of which the person is found, resides, or transacts business, shall have jurisdiction, upon application by the Attorney General on behalf of the Commission, to issue to such person an order requiring such person to appear before the Commission, or before a member of the Commission or a member of the staff of the Commission designated by the Commission for such purpose, there to give testimony or produce information relating to the matter under investigation, as required by the subpoena. A person who fails to obey such order of the court may be punished by the court as provided in section 401 of title 28 United States Code (relating to criminal contempt), or may be confined pursuant to section 1826 of title 18, United States Code (relating to civil contempt), but such confinement shall not exceed the life of the Commission, including extensions, and in no event shall such confinement exceed eighteen months.

SEC. 4. TESTIMONY OF PERSONS IN CUSTODY.

If the Commission determines that it requires the testimony of a person in custody, a court of the United States within the jurisdiction of which the person is to testify, or within the jurisdiction of which such person is held in custody, shall have jurisdiction, upon application by the Attorney General on behalf of the Commission, to issue a writ of habeas corpus ad testificandum requiring the custodian to produce such person before the Commission, or before a member of the Commission or a member of the staff of the Commission designated by the Commission for such purpose.

SEC. 5. COMPULSION OF TESTIMONY.

If a person who has been or may be called to testify or provide other information refuses, on the basis of his privilege against self-incrimination, to testify or provide such information, the Commission may, with the approval of the Attorney General, issue an order requiring the person to give testimony or provide other information which he refuses to give or provide on the basis of his privilege against self-incrimination in the same manner and subject to the same conditions as an agency of the United States is authorized to issue such an order pursuant to sections 6001, 6002, and 6004 or title 18, United States Code.

SEC. 6. TAKING OF TESTIMONY AND RECEIPT OF EVIDENCE.

The Commission, or a member of the Commission or member of the staff of the Commission designated by the Commission for such purpose, may conduct hearings, administer oaths and affirmations, examine witnesses, and receive documentary or other information in evidence.

SEC. 7. ACCESS TO OTHER AGENCY RECORDS.

(a) Disclosure otherwise prohibited by subsection (b), of section 552a of title 5, United States Code, or a record maintained by an agency, may, upon application to such agency by an attorney for the Commission who has been authorized by the Commission to make such an application, be made to the Commission and members of the staff of the Commission for use in the performance of the Commission's duties.

(b) An agency disclosing a record under subsection (a) shall not make the accounting required by subsection (c) of section 552a of title 5, United States Code, to be made available to the individual named in the record.

SEC. 8. LIMITATIONS ON DISCLOSURE.

A person to whom disclosure of information is made under section 7, shall use such information solely in the performance of his duties for the Commission and shall make no disclosure of such information except as provided for by this joint resolution, or as otherwise authorized by law.

SEC. 9. SERVICE OF PROCESS, WITNESS FEES.

(a) Process and papers issued by the Commission, or by a member of the Commission or a member of the staff of the Commission designated by the Commission for such purpose, may be served in person, by registered or certified mail, by telegraph, or by leaving a copy thereof at the residence or principal office or place of business of the person required to be served. When service is by registered or certified mail or by telegraph, the return post office receipt or telegraph receipt therefor shall be proof of service. Otherwise, the verified return by the individual making service, setting forth the manner of such service, shall be proof of service.

(b) Process of a court to which application may be made under this joint resolution may be served in a judicial district wherein the person required to be served is found, resides, or transacts business.

(c) A witness summoned before the Commission, or before a member of the Commission or a member of the staff of the Commission, shall be paid the same fees and mileage as are paid witnesses in the courts of the United States, and a witness whose deposition is taken and the person taking the same shall severally be entitled to the same fees as are paid for like services in the courts of the United States.

By Mr. BENTSEN:

S.J. Res. 234. Joint resolution to designate the week of February 11, 1984 through February 18, 1984, as "League of United Latin American Citizens Week"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

LEAGUE OF UNITED LATIN AMERICAN CITIZENS WEEK

● Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, as the League of United Latin American Citizens (LULAC) celebrates its 55th anniversary, I am pleased to introduce a joint resolution proclaiming February 11 to 18, 1984, as National LULAC Week.

LULAC, the oldest and largest Hispanic organization in the United States, has long been in the forefront of efforts to win equal rights and equal opportunity for some 15 million Americans of Hispanic descent. Hispanic Americans are the fastest growing ethnic group in this Nation and have played a vital role in the development of this country.

Despite the obvious and important role Hispanic Americans have played in building America, many have been slow to appreciate the problems and injustices suffered for so long by this community. For more than half a century, LULAC has been a leader in the effort to eradicate segregated schools, eliminate restrictions against Hispanics owning property and has worked to combat other forms of discrimination. For generations, LULAC has championed the fundamental guarantees of our Constitution and sought equality of opportunity for all Americans.

But as LULAC has fought against social injustice, it has also been committed to developing programs in response to the unique problems faced by Hispanic Americans in the schools and in the workplace.

In 1957, LULAC developed a preschool program to teach Spanish-speaking children English prior to their entry into the public schools. The project came to be known as the "Little schools of the 400" and became so successful that the Texas Board of Education provided funding to implement this concept statewide.

In 1965, President Lyndon B. Johnson, impressed by the little schools concept, expanded on this model and proposed Operation Head Start, which has served tens of thousands of children since its inception.

LULAC's commitment to educational achievement has evolved in accordance with the changing requirements of the Hispanic community. In 1973, for example, the LULAC educational service centers were established and now provide academic and career counseling to 16,000 college students annually. LULAC also administers the Nation's largest Hispanic scholarship program, which began in 1975 and raises $250,000 annually to benefit 500 students.

In an effort to improve employment opportunities for disadvantaged Hispanics, LULAC jointly organized the SER-jobs for progress program with another prominent Hispanic organization, the American GI Forum. SER has been in operation for 9 years and provides job training at 150 job centers in more than 100 cities in the country, serving some 50,000 trainees annually.

The achievements of this vital organization is a tribute to the ingenuity and sense of purpose so commendable of our American tradition. LULAC has served as an inspiration to the Hispanic community. The struggle for social justice, human dignity, better opportunity in education, and greater access to employment will remain cardinal points of LULAC concern.

I am pleased to join in commending the leaders and members of LULAC on their 55th anniversary and ask your support in approving this joint resolution honoring dedicated men and women who have sought and worked untiringly to make the American dream an integral part of the lives of all Hispanic Americans.

As this new decade brings new challenges, I know we can rely on LULAC to be a guiding force and play a key role in helping shape responses to the issues of the eighties.●

By Mr. PELL:

S.J. Res. 235. A joint resolution to authorize the Law Enforcement Officers Memorial Fund, Inc., to establish a National Law Enforcement Heroes Memorial; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

HONORING OUR NATION'S LAW ENFORCEMENT HEROS WHO HAVE DIED IN THE LINE OF DUTY

● Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I am pleased today to introduce legislation commemorating the brave men and women who have given their lives in the war against crime. The joint resolution I am introducing today along with Congressman MARIO BIAGGI of New York will establish a National Police Memorial within the District of Columbia. With good reason we have honored those who lost their lives in foreign wars, and a similar national monument is needed to honor law enforcement officers who have been killed in the line of duty.

The Federal Bureau of Investigation reports that during the past decade, 1,600 law enforcement officers were killed in the line of duty. In the last 2 years alone, 309 died while performing their official duties—meaning there is nearly one police officer killed every 2 days in the United States.

Under the legislation I am introducing with Congressman BIAGGI, no Federal funds would be required to construct the police memorial. Our proposal creates a nonprofit "Law Enforcement Officers Memorial Fund" which will establish the memorial through private contributions. This organization will also be responsible for selecting a suitable site on grounds owned by the Federal Government within the District of Columbia. The site selection will be made with the approval of the National Capital Planning Commission and the Commission of Fine Arts. The actual design of the Memorial, which will be known as the "National Law Enforcement Heroes Memorial," will be subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, the Commission of Fine Arts, and the National Capital Planning Commission. The only expenses borne by the Federal Government in connection with the memorial will be in relation to the process of site selection and approval of the design and plans.

I am especially proud that my own State of Rhode Island has been a national leader in advancing the idea of a police memorial. Last year, the Rhode Island General Assembly became the first State legislative body to pass a resolution calling upon the Congress to establish a National Police Memorial. The idea for this resolution originated with Raymond Pezzulo, a retired Providence policeman who has been a longtime national leader in the Fraternal Order of Police, Wayne Sacco, the president of the Rhode Island FOP, and Detective Tony Phillips, treasurer of the Rhode Island FOP. I would like to take this opportunity to commend the Rhode Island Fraternal Order of Police for their leadership in advancing this important proposal.

Clearly no memorial can fully acknowledge the supreme sacrifice made by those men and women in the law enforcement community who have lost their lives in the line of duty. What we are seeking to do with this resolution is express our gratitude for the vital services provided by our law enforcement community, and to focus national attention on the need to better protect those who continue to protect us. I sincerely hope that this legislation will bring greater national recognition to the men and women who are our front line of defense in the war against crime, especially at a time when we are asking the police to do more and more in the war against crime with diminished budgets and smaller manpower levels. In spite of these considerable obstacles, the national crime rate has dropped for 2 years in a row and there is no question that the law enforcement community deserves the credit for this improvement in our security.

Mr. President, I hope that every Member of the Congress will join with Congressman BIAGGI and me in supporting this legislation to commemorate our Nation's law enforcement heroes who have given their lives in the line of duty.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the resolution be printed in the RECORD at this point:

There being no objection, the Joint Resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. J. RES. 235

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Law Enforcement Officers Memorial Fund, Inc., a nonprofit corporation organized and existing under the laws of the District of Columbia, is authorized to establish a memorial on public grounds in the District of Columbia or its environs to honor and recognize law enforcement officers in the United States who died in the line of duty. Such memorial shall be known as the National Law Enforcement Heroes Memorial.

SEC. 2. (a) The Secretary of the Interior, in consultation with the Law Enforcement Officers Memorial fund, Inc., is authorized and directed to select with the approval of the Commission of Fine Arts and the National Capital Planning Commission a suitable site on grounds owned by the Federal Government in the District of Columbia or its environs.

(b) The Law Enforcement Officers Memorial Fund, Inc., shall be responsible for the development of a design and plans for such memorial which shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, the Commission of Fine Arts, and the National Capital Planning Commission fails to approve or make specific objection to such design and plans within ninety days of submission, his or its approval shall be deemed to be given.

(c) Neither the United States nor the District of Columbia shall bear any expense in the establishment of the memorial other than expenses incurred in the process of site selection and approval of design and plans.

SEC. 3. The authority conferred pursuant to this resolution shall lapse unless—

(1) prior to groundbreaking for actual construction of the memorial, funds are certified available in an amount sufficient, in the judgment of the Secretary of the Interior, to insure completion of the memorial in accordance with the approved design and plans, and

(2) the construction of such memorial is commenced within five years from the date of adoption of this resolution.

SEC. 4. The maintenance and care of the memorial established under this resolution shall be the responsibility of the Secretary of the Interior.●

By Mr. MATSUNAGA (for himself, Mr. PELL and Mr. MATHIAS):

S.J. Res. 236. A joint resolution relating to cooperative East-West ventures in space as an alternative to a space arms race; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

EAST-WEST COOPERATION IN SPACE AS AN ALTERNATIVE TO A SPACE ARMS RACE

Mr. MATSUNAGA. Mr. President, I am today introducing, with the distinguished Senators from Rhode Island and Maryland, Mr. PELL and Mr. MATHIAS, a joint resolution designed to encourage cooperative East-West ventures in space as an alternative to a space arms race. The resolution calls upon the President of the United States to renew the 5-year space cooperation agreement with the Soviet Union that was initiated by President Nixon in 1972, renewed by President Carter in 1977, then allowed to lapse in 1982 after it had resulted in a decade of benefits to American space science. The resolution also urges the President to renew East-West planning for joint activities in such fields as space medicine and biology, space rescue, planetary science, manned and unmanned space exploration. Such renewed activity is good science and good politics.

From a scientific perspective, our legislation proposes no new departures. It seeks merely to resume promising activities of proven mutual benefit that enjoy the virtually unanimous support of space scientists in the United States, the Soviet Union, Europe, Japan, India, throughout the world, all of whom have suffered from the breakdown in communication between the two world leaders in space science research. In this case, they are innocent victims of circumstances having little or nothing to do with space issues per se, including the issue of technology transfer. The space agreement was 1 of 11 U.S.-U.S.S.R. cooperation agreements initiated in the early seventies. It so happened that 3 of those 11—space, energy, science, and technology—came up for renewal in May 1982, 5 months after the declaration of martial law in Poland. They thus offered convenient means for demonstrating American displeasure with Soviet behavior at a coincidental point in time. As the Under Secretary of State for Security Assistance, Science and Technology told the House Foreign Affairs Committee last summer, "the primary criterion in the selection of those agreements which have been terminated was the date of their expiration, which in all cases was mid-1982." In that respect, the space cooperation agreement was terminated by pure chance.

Had the United States-Soviet medicine and public health cooperation agreement come up for renewal in May 1982, instead of the space agreement, the world medical community might be lamenting its losses today, rather than the space science community, and important advances in cardiovascular medicine and cancer research would not have been recorded. As with medical research, the challenges and potential benefits of space science research transcend nationalistic differences. Its artificial compartmentalization is in the interest of no one.

Prior to introducing similar legislation last session, I contacted many of the Nation's leading space scientists and others prominent in space activities and asked them: Would American science benefit from resumption of cooperative activities with Soviets? I ask unanimous consent that the full text of their unanimously affirmative replies be included in the RECORD, following my statement, as well as the texts of letters just received from Dr. Tobias Owen and Christopher Kraft, the text of the 1977 United States-Soviet space cooperation agreement that this legislation seeks to renew, and the section on space science of a State Department progress report on the 11 U.S.-U.S.S.R. cooperation agreements, submitted to the Congress last summer, which describes a solid, expanding, fruitful program of space science cooperation right up to the administration's decision to let it all lapse.

Among the uninformed, there exists a self-contradictory presumption that the Soviets, whose Sputnik excited a crisis of confidence in American science and technology, practice some kind of stone age space science and that they would be the only beneficiaries of United States-Soviet space cooperation. The record shows otherwise. Especially in space medicine and biology the United States has learned a great deal from cooperation with the Soviets and could learn a lot more. During the 1970's, when our own space exploration program took a back seat to space shuttle development, American scientists piggybacked into a Soviet biosatellite program which proved so successful that our Government allowed American participation to continue even after the space agreement was terminated. The last experiment in that series occurred only a few weeks ago, when, for the third time, the Soviets accepted American experiments on one of their biological spacecraft. Originally, scientists from both countries anticipated that the gesture would be repaid by the Americans including a like number of Soviet experiments on the shuttle once it became operational; but we changed our minds. Similarly, American scientists have benefited enormously from data on the Soviet Union's 14 successful Venus missions. At the time the cooperation agreement was terminated, American space scientists were on the verge of signing substantial agreements "to cooperate in further exploration of Venus," according to the letter I received from Dr. Eugene Levy, a member of our negotiating team. Indeed, the State Department reported that "for the 5 months of 1982 in which U.S.-U.S.S.R. exchange activities took place under space agreement auspices, the overall value of the scientific and technical information clearly favored the United States."

In a most illuminating letter, Dr. Tobias Owen of the State University of New York at Stony Brook lists four United States-Soviet space cooperation categories of increasing complexity, based on his 15 years of experience in dealing with Soviet space scientists:

First, joint discussion of results from space missions.

Second, joint planning of separately conducted missions in order to increase the total science return.

Third, sharing of experiments, for example, we fly one of their instruments on one of our spacecraft, and vice versa.

Fourth, joint missions—in which planning, construction, operations, and data analysis are done jointly.

Dr. Owen's proposal contains the seeds of a space cooperation policy, that, if developed properly, could present us with an exciting alternative to an arms race in space. It might be initiated by relatively small-scale, confidence-building activities—sharing of results from separate missions, consultation in setting objectives for separate but potentially complementary missions—and would build gradually toward joint activity of steadily expanding scope. Progress along that high road could be tied to progress in such space arms control issues as inspection and verification. I have suggested elsewhere that the process might be linked to a moratorium on weapons testing in space: So long as cooperation proceeded in a manner satisfactory to both parties, the moratorium would hold; the longer the process continued, the greater the stake of each participant, and the less likelihood of regression.

In summary, renewal of the space cooperation agreement with the Soviet Union would provide scientists and foreign policymakers with new options for pursuing their important interests. Exploration of the solar system could proceed in a manner that without the slightest doubt promises the greatest scientific return for all parties. At the same time, foreign policymakers would be presented with new working alternatives to confrontation in space, new working contexts, that could open up a whole new array of opportunities. Even in its initial stages, renewal of the cooperation agreement would permit the repetitive but so far unproductive calls on both sides for reduction in tension to be translated into concrete deeds without posing any danger to national security. Finally, renewed cooperation in space could save bilions of dollars as space science and exploration lead us into a new age of awesome potential. As Dr. Owen writes, a Mars sample return mission is "a natural for cooperation" that could set the stage for an international manned mission to Mars in the 21st century. Is not the prospect at least worth exploring?

Perhaps more than any other avenue, United States-Soviet space cooperation offers an opportunity to practice the policy of "hard-headed détente" advocated by President Richard Nixon and others, involving sharply defined activities and limited expectations, in the context of an expanding, hopeful vision of the future. Our children and grandchildren would never forgive us for failing even to give it a decent chance.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the joint resolution and accompanying material be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 236

Whereas the United States and the Soviet Union are on a course leading toward an arms race in space which is in the interest of no one;

Whereas the prospect of an arms race in space between the United States and the Soviet Union has aroused worldwide concern expressed publicly by the governments of many countries, including most of the allies of the United States, such as Australia, Canada, France, the Federal Republic of Germany, India, Japan, and the United Kingdom of Great Britain;

Whereas an arms race in space would open the door to a range of new weapons systems that would seriously threaten global stability, undermine the prospects for successful arms control agreements, and create pressures for new defense expenditures unprecedented in scope even for these times;

Whereas the 1972–75 Apollo-Soyuz project involving the United States and the Soviet Union and culminating with a joint docking in space was a significant success, thus proving the practicability of a joint space effort;

Whereas shortly after the completion of the Apollo-Soyuz project, and intended as a follow-up to it, the United States and the Soviet Union signed a formal agreement to examine the feasibility of a Shuttle-Salyut Program and an International Space Platform Program, but that initiative was allowed to lapse;

Whereas the United States signed a five-year space cooperation agreement with the Soviet Union in 1972, renewed it in 1977, then chose not to renew it in 1982, despite numerous scientific benefits accruing to the United States as a result of joint activities initiated under that agreement;

Whereas the opportunities offered by space for prodigious achievements in virtually every field of human endeavor, leading ultimately to the colonization of space in the cause of advancing human civilization, would probably be lost irretrievably were space to be made into yet another East-West battleground; and

Whereas allowing space to become an arena of conflict without first exerting every effort to make it into an arena of cooperation would amount to an abdication of governmental responsibility that would never be forgotten: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, By the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled that the President should—

(1) Renew the 1972-1977 agreement between the United States and the Soviet Union on space cooperation for peaceful purposes;

(2) Initiate talks with the Government of the Soviet Union, and with other governments interested in space activities, to explore the opportunities for cooperative East-West ventures in space as an alternative to an arms race in space, including cooperative ventures in such areas as space medicine and space biology, space rescue, planetary science, manned and unmanned space exploration; and

(3) Submit to the Congress at the earliest possible date, but not later than October 1, 1984, a report detailing the steps taken in carrying out paragraphs (1) and (2).

1977 UNITED STATES-SOVIET SPACE COOPERATION AGREEMENTS

AGREEMENT BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA AND THE UNION OF SOVIET SOCIALIST REPUBLICS CONCERNING COOPERATION IN THE EXPLORATION AND USE OF OUTER SPACE FOR PEACEFUL PURPOSES

The United States of America and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics;

Considering the role which the U.S.A. and the U.S.S.R. play in the exploration and use of outer space for peaceful purposes;

Striving for a further expansion of cooperation between the U.S.A. and the U.S.S.R. in the exploration and use of outer space for peaceful purposes;

Noting the positive cooperation which the parties have already experienced in this area;

Desiring to make the results of scientific research gained from the exploration and use of outer space for peaceful purposes available for the benefit of the peoples of the two countries and of all peoples of the world;

Taking into consideration the provisions of the Treaty on Principles Governing the Activities of States in the Exploration and Use of Outer Space, including the Moon and Other Celestial Bodies, as well as the Agreement on the Rescue of Astronauts, the Return of Astronauts, and the Return of Objects Launched into Outer Space;

Encouraged by the progress made in the course of mutually agreed activities pursued under the Agreement Between the United States of America and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics Concerning Cooperation in the Exploration and Use of Outer Space for Peaceful Purposes, signed May 24, 1972;

In accordance with the General Agreement between the United States of America and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics on Contacts, Exchanges and Cooperation in Scientific, Technical, Educational, Cultural, and Other Fields, signed June 19, 1973, and in order to develop further the principles of mutually beneficial cooperation between the two countries;

Have agreed as follows:

ARTICLE 1

The Parties will continue to develop cooperation in such fields of space science and applications as space meteorology; study of the natural environment; exploration of near earth space, the moon and the planets; space biology and medicine; satellite search and rescue systems; and, in particular, will cooperate to take all appropriate measures to encourage and achieve the fulfillment of the Summary of Results of Discussion on Space Cooperation Between the U.S. National Aeronautics and Space Administration and the Academy of Sciences of the U.S.S.R. dated January 21, 1971, periodically renewed.

ARTICLE 2

The Parties will carry out such cooperation through their appropriate national agencies by means of mutual exchanges of scientific information and delegations, and meetings of scientists and specialists of both countries, and also in such other ways as may be mutually agreed. Joint Working Groups may be created for the development and implementation of appropriate programs of cooperation.

ARTICLE 3

The Parties will take all necessary measures for the further development of cooperation in the area of manned space flight for scientific and practical objectives, including the use in joint flights of compatible docking and rendezvous systems derived from those developed during the experimental flight of Apollo and Soyuz spacecraft in July 1975. Joint work in this diretion will be carried out in accordance with the Agreement Between the U.S. National Aeronautics and Space Administration and the Academy of Sciences of the U.S.S.R. on Cooperation in the Area of Manned Space Flight dated May 11, 1977.

ARTICLE 4

The Parties will encourage international efforts to resolve problems of international law in the exploration and use of outer space for peaceful purposes with the aim of strengthening the legal order in space and further developing international space law and will cooperate in this field.

ARTICLE 5

The Parties may by mutual agreement determine other areas of cooperation in the exploration and use of outer space for peaceful purposes.

ARTICLE 6

This Agreement shall enter into force May 24, 1977 and shall remain in force for five years. It may be modified or extended by mutual agreement of the Parties.

Done at Geneva this 18th day of May 1977 in duplicate in the English and Russian languages, both equally authentic.

REPORT TO CONGRESS: SCIENTIFIC EXCHANGE ACTIVITIES WITH THE SOVIET UNION, FISCAL YEAR 1981 AND FISCAL YEAR 1982, DEPARTMENT OF STATE AUTHORIZATION ACT, SECTION 126. (A) AND (B)

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

Overview

This summary section will provide a brief overview of the history and current status of the U.S.-Soviet cooperative science and technology exchange agreements, followed by a statement on "the risk of the transfer to the Soviet Union of militarily significant technology through research, exchanges, and other activities conducted pursuant to those agreements," as requested in Section 126. (a)(1).

The balance of the report will contain the individual agency submissions, which will address the information requested in Section 126. (a)(2).

The list of Soviet nationals participating during the upcoming academic year in the U.S. and the Soviet Union under the graduate student/young faculty exchange or senior scholar exchange, their topics of study and where they are to study shall be provided not later than July 1 as specified in Section 126. (c).

Background

Since 1958, agreements between the United States and the Soviet Union have provided for science and technology exchanges with the Soviet Union, as well as those in the fields of education, culture and information. Science and technology exchange activities were conducted under specialized cooperative agreements which were signed by the U.S. and U.S.S.R. during summits in Moscow (1972 and 1974) and Washington (1973). This framework led to a significant increase in science and technology activities, which remained at a high level throughout much of the 1970's.

FISCAL YEARS 1981 AND 1982: US-USSR COOPERATION IN SPACE RESEARCH

Under the 1972 intergovernmental US-U.S.S.R. Agreement on Space Cooperation (renewed in 1977), NASA carried out specific joint activities and projects with Soviet counterparts during 1981 and 1982 within the framework of four Joint Working Groups (JWGs): Space Biology and Medicine, Near-Earth Space, the Moon and Planets, Study of the Natural Environment, and Space Meteorology. A fifth area of cooperation envisioned in the 1977 Space Agreement renewal—satellite search and rescue systems—continued to be developed during this period but moved beyond the bilateral framework under a 1980 multilateral agreement involving participation by Canada and France, the U.S. and the U.S.S.R.

During 1981, bilateral exchanges under the Space Agreement continued to be curtailed significantly as part of the US response to the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan, and were reduced even further by the US during 1982 in response to Soviet actions in Poland. Among the sanctions announced by the Administration in December, 1981, was the decision that the US-USSR Space Agreement would not be renewed when it came up for renewal. The agreement thus expired on May 24, 1982.

1981 activities

The majority of joint US-USSR space activities during 1981 took place in the areas of space biology and medicine and planetary research. Highlights of projects and activities which occurred in 1981 are given below:

Space Biology and Medicine.—During 1981, NASA continued to participate in preparations for a Soviet biosatellite mission scheduled for launch in 1982 (the launch has since slipped to the fall of 1983). This "Cosmos" biosatellite mission will fly primates for the first time in the Soviet program, and the U.S. will provide technical support for planned cardiovascular and biorhythm measurements on two small rhesus monkeys. In addition, U.S. scientists are participating in investigations using rats to study calcium metabolism and embryology. In return for its assistance, the U.S. will receive the unique biomedical data obtained during the mission for subsequent analysis and interpretation.

In May, agreement was reached on a new cooperative project to measure human vertebral bone mineral changes resulting from long-duration manned spaceflight. Through a series of computer-assisted tomograph (CAT) scans taken of cosmonaut vertebra, the effects of extended periods of weightlessness on overall bone development processes may be observed and analyzed. Under this cooperative project, Soviet scientists are responsible for taking the prescribed pre-flight and post-flight CAT scans of cosmonauts using US-provided magnetic tapes, and then shipping these tapes with the raw data to the US for subsequent analysis and interpretation. The final result of the US study is then to be shared with the Soviets. This type of study, using the most modern medical techniques, should result in a greater understanding of the physiological changes occurring both during space missions and following return to the normal gravity environment on Earth.

In November, 1981, the twelfth meeting of the Space Biology and Medicine JWG was held in Washington. A special feature of the meeting was a 2½-day Cardiovascular Symposium, which brought together US and Soviet specialists to exchange information and data from ground-based simulations of weightlessness and actual space missions. US scientists learned firsthand the biomedical results from the Soviet 185-day Salyut manned mission, as well as the results of a later 75-day Salyut mission. The agreed work in bone mineral measurements using CAT scanning techniques was broadened in scope to include studies of bone mineral mass and muscle density. In addition, US participation in the USSR "Cosmos" biosatellite mission was further defined. Finally, the participants agreed to publish the final results of their Joint Bedrest Study (completed in 1979) independently during 1982.

Near Earth Space, the Moon and Planets.—During 1981, a number of scientist-to-scientist exchanges took place in the areas of planetary geology, planetary atmospheres and space plasma physics. The Soviets also contributed a large body of written material on the results of their past Venera missions to Venus for incorporation in future NASA publications on Venus.

In August, the Soviet Academy of Sciences complied with a NASA request to reduce the potential for radio-frequency interference (RFI) during the Voyager 2 spacecraft's nine-day encounter period with the planet Saturn. Similar Soviet cooperation had been extended to NASA in connection with previous US planetary encounters in 1978 (Pioneer-Venus), 1979 (Pioneer 11-Saturn), and 1980 (Voyager 1-Saturn).

A highly-successful meeting of the U.S.-USSR JWG on Near-Earth Space, the Moon and Planets was held in San Francisco in October, 1981. During this meeting, scientific results were presented from the 1978 U.S. and Soviet missions to Venus (Pioneer Venus and Venera 11 and 12, respectively). Reports were given on the state of a current research in the following topic areas: the solar wind interaction with non-magnetized or weakly magnetized solar system bodies; geological interpretation of Mars data; lunar sample analyses; and Antarctic meteorite and cosmic dust studies. The participants also exchanged detailed information on plans for future planetary missions, and reached agreement on a joint program of collaboration in the analysis and interpretation of X-ray and gamma-ray remote sensing data for planetary exploration using ground-based and balloon flight studies.

During the October planetary discussion, the two sides agreed to consider as a primary objective for their next JWG meeting the establishment of several kinds of coordinated efforts which could enlarge the scope of current bilateral activities. That meeting was to have taken place in the Soviet Union in May, 1982, but was not held due to the non-renewal of the U.S.-U.S.S.R. Space Agreement.

Space Meteorology.—In the rocket meteorology area, cooperation has focused on the exchange and analysis of data from the Eastern and Western Hemispheric meridional network. During 1981, these joint efforts continued but at a reduced level due to the closing of several U.S. rocket ranges in 1979 and 1980, and changes in NASA's budget priorities. In the satellite meteorology area, laboratory and field data were exchanged during 1981 to establish common data processing procedures for atmospheric temperature sounding with the objective of making international sources of meterological data more compatible.

Short-term and long-term exchanges during 1981

A statistical summary of the total man-days spent in short-term and long-term exchanges during 1981 under U.S.-U.S.S.R. Space Agreement is given below:

Type	U.S. mandays spent in U.S.S.R.	U.S.S.R. mandays spent in U.S.
Short term (less than 60 days)	88	[1] 406
Long term (over 60 days)	0	0

[1] Due largely to two Joint Working Group (JWG) meetings held in the U.S. during the year. Other exchanges were approximately in balance.

Value of information exchanged during 1981

The overall value of the scientific and technical information exchanged during 1981 would appear to be approximately balanced. It should be noted, however, that certain data (particularly biomedical data related to long-duration manned spaceflight) is available only from the U.S.S.R.

1982 activities

Following the decision on non-renewal of the Space Agreement, NASA received interagency authorization to complete its participation in the Soviet "Cosmos" biosatellite mission (discussed in an earlier section) on the basis of agency-to-agency agreements with Institute of Biomedical Problems in Moscow dating from 1978-81. These agreements continue in force independent of the Space Agreement. Continuation of other agency-level activities was and is subject to case-by-case interagency review, as would be any proposals for NASA involvement in future Soviet biosatellite missions.

During 1982, several U.S. specialists in planetary geological and atmospheric research visited space research institutes in the Soviet Union as guests of the U.S.S.R. Academy of Sciences. The specialists were NASA contractors and grantees from universities and private industry. These scientist-to-scientist discussions were particularly fruitful since they occurred during and after the successful landings of the U.S.S.R.'s Venera 13 and 14 spacecraft on the Vensuian surface in March, 1982.

Other bilateral activities envisoned by or dependent upon the existence of the U.S.-U.S.S.R. Space Agreement essentially ceased with its lapse in May, 1982. No meetings of the JWG's established under the Agreement took place during 1982. No new joint space activities or projects were initiated during 1982.

Short-term and long-term exchanges during 1982

A statistical summary of the total man-days spent in short-term and long-term exchanges in 1982 under the U.S.-U.S.S.R. Space Agreement prior to its expiration on May 24 is given below:

Type	U.S. man-days spent in U.S.S.R.	U.S.S.R. man-days spent in U.S.
Short term (less than 60 days)	55	0
Long term (over 60 days)	0	0

Value of information exchanged during 1982

For the five months of 1982 in which U.S.-U.S.S.R. exchange activities took place under Space Agreement auspices, the overall value of the scientific and technical information clearly favored the U.S. For example, visits to the Soviet Union clearly benefited the U.S. scientific community involved with planetary exploration, expecially since these visits coincided with receipt of data and results during and after the March Soviet Venus lander missions. No comparable US information flow to the Soviets was possible during 1982, since the U.S. had no Venus mission of its own to Venus during this period. In fact, at present there are no plans to launch another U.S. spacecraft to Earth's sister planet before 1988.

In the biomedical area, the U.S. continued to receive the raw data from Soviet CAT scans of cosmonaut crews involved in long-duration manned spaceflight for subsequent processing and reduction. Such data are unique in light of the current short-duration focus of the U.S. manned spaceflight programs using the Space Shuttle. Since human physiological changes become more pronounced with the increase in staytime in the weightless environment of space, U.S. biomedical information provided to the Soviets during 1982 was of relatively limited research value.

Level of U.S. and U.S.S.R. funding during 1981 and 1982

Since the entry into force of the U.S.-U.S.S.R. Space Agreement, NASA has conducted its cooperative activities and projects with Soviet counterparts on the basis of mutual interest and reciprocity. During 1981 and 1982, as in previous years, funding for approved joint projects has been provided within the budgetary constraints of existing programs. No specific R&D line items for U.S.-U.S.S.R. actitivies is included in NASA budgets.

Senator SPARK M. MATSUNAGA,
Hart Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MATSUNAGA: I was delighted to learn that you are co-sponsoring a bill to promote peaceful cooperation in space with USSR.

As a scientist devoted to studies of the solar system, I have had numerous contacts with Soviet counterparts over the years. I made my first visit to USSR in 1967, to give a series of lectures at various institutions. This was part of an exchange program between the Soviet and U.S. Academies of Science, under the general cultural exchange agreement that existed between the two countries at that time.

Since then, I have made many other visits, and have hosted visits from Soviet scientists here. These encounters have always involved exchanges—the Soviets would share and discuss their new results and we would present ours. The openness with which they were willing to discuss their results was particularly helpful during our preparations for the successful landing on Mars by the Viking Missions in 1976.

These days, visits in both directions are much harder to arrange. To cite just one example, the Soviets can no longer fly on their own airline to our country. Despite these obstacles, we still make efforts to meet, since it remains mutually enlightening to do so. At the present time, the Soviets have two Venus orbiters in place that are making maps of the planet's surface. The resulting information is of great interest to our scientists planning a similar mission.

This leads me to some specific proposals for future cooperation in space with the USSR. I see these opportunities falling into four categories. In order of increasing complexity, these are as follows:

1. Joint discussion of results from space missions.

2. Joint planning of separately conducted missions in order to increase the total science return.

3. Sharing of experiments, e.g., we fly one of their instruments on one of our spacecraft, and vice versa.

4. Joint missions—in which planning, construction, operations, and data analysis are done jointly.

In looking over the mission set recommended in Part I of the SSEC Report (see enclosure), I see the following opportunities for cooperation:

(A) Small Bodies—Asteroids and Comments.—Sharing of instruments and joint mission planning would be very effective. To build up a comprehensive picture of the nature of these small bodies, we will need to visit a lot of them. If would be marvelous if we could plan jointly with the Soviets that we would visit one set of these objects (which might just be one object) and they would go to another, using a common payload consisting of instruments from both countries.

(B) Inner Planets.—The missions currently under consideration by both countries are redundant already, but this overlap is bound to be useful. It would be even more useful if these missions could be planned in detail by representatives of both groups, and provisions were made for subsequent data exchange and analysis.

(C) Outer Planets.—At the present time, the Soviets have no Outer Planet Program. If some cooperation could be arranged in the other areas, it might be possible to develop something here too. For example, they do have infrared spectrometers that could be considered as candidate instruments on some of these missions.

Part II of the SSEC report will consider missions of larger scope, and it is here that cooperation with the USSR becomes particularly attractive. The two missions with highest priority at the present time are Mars Sample Return and Comet Sample Return. Of these two, the Mars Sample Return Mission is a natural for cooperation. The reasons are that it is expensive, the Soviets are clearly interested in Mars, and it is a mission with a great potential for popular interest and enthusiasm.

There are several different ways of mounting the mission, but one that has a special appeal is to do it in two steps: first to gather samples and second to bring them back. The two goals are to sample as wide a variety of terrains on Mars as possible and to bring back as much material as possible. Working closely with the USSR offers a chance to accomplish both of these goals at a far lower cost than to do it alone.

We know the Soviets have a capability for deploying automated sample collectors, since that is how they brought materials back from the moon. Mars is much more difficult, but there have been suggestions from several quarters that they are even interested in manned Mars missions. (E.g. OTA Report of December 1983—see enclosure.) If so, sample return should be an appealing precursor.

One way to do this would be for both the U.S. and USSR to send rovers to different landing spots on Mars. The two vehicles could then cross the respective terrains separating the two landing sites, gathering samples as they moved. They would then rendezvous at the mid-point between them, which could then be the landing point of the sample return rocket. Using two rovers each, one would get to two sample return rockets. This way each country gets more samples from more places than they could expect for the same investment made by themselves. It would be an adventure that the rest of the world would find very intriguing (the rovers could be equipped with TV to broadcast what they "see").

The level of cooperation required for such an endeavor would be nearly as great as for the Apollo-Soyuz mission. I share your sense that through such cooperation we have a much better chance of reducing the currently intolerably dangerous tensions between our two countries. I wish you every success in your efforts with the appropriate legislation.

With best wishes,

Cordially,

Tobias Owen.

DEAR SENATOR MATSUNAGA: I would like to make a few comments relative to your proposal to carry out future space activities with the U.S.S.R. At the time of the Apollo Soyuz Test Project, I was the director of the Johnson Space Center, the NASA organization responsible for carrying out this mission. I am familiar with the reasons given by you and some others relative to the political significance such a new cooperative U.S.-U.S.S.R. venture might have, that is, that cooperation of this nature might lead to a better understanding between the two countries, bringing about a better environment for disarmament discussions and hopefully forestall the use of space for any other purpose than the peaceful scientific and social endeavors which could benefit all peoples here on earth. There are, of course, many military applications of space technology that are already in use such as satellite communication and surveillance. Also, one would be naive not to recognize the future potential for space weapons of a defensive and offensive nature. Nevertheless, I believe we should make every effort to convince the U.S.S.R. and the rest of the world to limit the military uses of space.

I believe the ASTP project conducted in 1975 was of benefit to the United States and the U.S.S.R. because it gave us an opportunity to see the methods and techniques that the two countries utilized to carry out complex manned spaceflight missions. Any operations such as these, have a certain aura of mysticism that develops around them which can be dispelled by planning and conducting an operation together. The safety of the two flight crews demanded that both sides be very forthright in their dealings with each other and I am satisfied that the results were successful because of the attitude of the two organizations involved.

The mission objective required that the two countries develop and demonstrate a universal docking mechanism which could be used in the event of the need for rescue by either country and for docking missions of any kind in the future. This objective required a great deal of coordination and exchange of information to assure that a proper design was achieved. It is my opinion that the two countries contributed equally well to this goal and that the result was mutually beneficial.

On the other hand, there has been a great deal of speculation and sometimes uninformed accusation that the U.S. gave away some of its technological know-how while receiving little in exchange from the U.S.S.R. It is very doubtful, at least to my knowledge, that the U.S.S.R. received any technology from us that was not readily available in some unclassified documentation. We did find (at least through the people we dealt with) that the engineers from the U.S.S.R. had very little understanding of how to manage a large scale project when numerous groups of people were required to accomplish the task and day-to-day coordination and communication is required. That is, their knowledge of free world management techniques was naive to say the least. Therefore, one could conclude that the knowledge they gained might be some form of technology transfer. However, it was the opinion of most of us at the Johnson Space Center that although they may have understood how we manage they would find it very difficult to apply in their country because of the extreme differences in industrial and government structure. There are a number of anecdotes that we experienced that would tend to corroborate this feeling.

The fact that you as a member of the Senate and a number of other political leaders feel that the present conditions in foreign policy could benefit from another cooperative venture between the U.S. and the U.S.S.R. is encouraging to me. My experience is primarily technical and in intra-government affairs, but I too believe that such a proposal would be helpful. Therefore, I support your efforts, and I am hopeful that you will succeed in convincing the present administration that they should approach the U.S.S.R. with regards to future cooperative space activities. Also, I would suggest that the matter be broached in the same manner as before. That is, that NASA and the U.S.S.R. Academy of Sciences be requested to work out some scientific proposals which could then be ratified by the two governments.

Thank you for the opportunity to provide an opinion on this important proposal.

Very truly yours,

CHRISTOPHER C. KRAFT, Jr.

DEAR SENATOR MATSUNAGA: We joined forces with the Russians in the Second World War to eliminate the Axis menace to civilized life on earth. We achieved that aim without resolving our ideological differences or even discussing them. The menace confronting us was enough to make us cooperate.

Now we and the Soviet peoples are confronted with a menace to our survival more grave than Hitler's Axis. The menace is ourselves; our worser selves, frozen in suspicion, mistrust, and ideological antagonisms. Space offers us a fleeting chance to get away from the earthbound framework of confrontation and mistrust and join forces again. The Soviet Union is a great nation, however profoundly we disagree with its ideology and its leadership. We Americans, confident in our strength and our free way of life, can hold out our hand to the Soviets for cooperation in space, as a start toward saving our children from the deadly peril created by our mutual old fears, reflected in the arms control deadlock.

Your initiative in the matter of East-West cooperation is thoughtful, cautious, and promising. I support your Resolution and hope that the Senate will endorse it.

Sincerely,

HERMAN WOUK.

DEAR SENATOR MATSUNAGA: As a scientist who has participated in the Apollo-Soyuz mission and has been involved directly in scientific exchanges with the USSR relating to the exploration of the planet Venus I wish to express my enthusiastic support for the bill you are introducing on cooperation in space. Science flourishes best when it is conducted in an atmosphere of free and open exchange of data, analysis and criticism. In the case of the planetary exploration program our experience in the past is that planetary science as a whole benefitted greatly from the period of open exchange and cooperation with our colleagues in the USSR. Data obtained by their Venera probes were made available at a very early stage to us. We were able to compare their results with ours, and analyze areas of agreement and disagreement thereby resolving many questions that otherwise would have been left in dispute or even unanswered. Design of future experiments was greatly facilitated. For example, radar altimetry data obtained by our Pioneer Venus Orbiter was used to determine the proper landing sites for the probes Venera 13 and 14 and the future probes Veneras 15 and 16. The data they obtained were thereby rendered much more meaningful to the great benefit of us as well as them. Failure to cooperate in this way means a great loss for science.

Furthermore, and this judgment extends to cooperation with other nations as well as the USSR, some planetary projects such as sample return missions to asteroids or Comet Sample Return, are extremely expensive and probably beyond the means of any one nation, even the United States, under the economic constraints imposed today. By pooling resources the world can undertake such missions rich in scientific potential that otherwise would have to be postponed long into the next century.

For all these good reasons, I welcome the step you are taking and urge the Congress and the President to expedite enactment of the legislation you propose.

Yours sincerely,

DEAR SENATOR MATSUNAGA: It is a pleasure to learn of your initiative in urging the establishment of a fresh program of collaboration between the United States and the Soviet Union in the peaceful uses of outer space. Such a program will, I agree, counteract the current tendency to militarize outer space and may thereby contribute significantly to international arms control.

Even within the prevailing chill in our diplomatic relations with the Soviet Union, a significant level of scientific collaboration continues. But as an experienced practitioner in space research I consider that your purposes can be effectively served only if the collaboration is of a joint operational nature on a roughly equal footing. I use the term operational to include the design and construction of flight equipment; launching and in-flight operations; and the acquisition and analysis of data. Thus I mean to distinguish operations from the much more modest level of collaboration that is represented by the post-facto exchange of data from essentially independent undertakings.

Further, any agreed joint mission or missions must have substantive objective of undisputed scientific or technological importance and not be principally in the nature of a demonstration, as was the case with the Apollo-Soyuz mission in 1975. It is, of course, obvious that missions involving humans within the spacecraft attract greater public interest than do those consisting of remotely controlled equipment, but the latter have, in my opinion, a much deeper and more durable significance and offer the opportunity for continuing collaboration, at reasonable cost, for many years. A specific example is a joint U.S.-U.S.S.R. mission to the planet Saturn comprising an orbiter and an entry probe. Both the U.S. and the U.S.S.R. have much to offer in the field of planetary exploration but the U.S. is unable to proceed with such a mission at present because of lack of funding.

DEAR SENATOR MATSUNAGA: For some time I have been concerned about the relationship between the United States and other nations in areas involving the civil space program. The significance of this program as a part of foreign policy of our Nation as an instrument of national policy has not been adequately recognized in recent years. I believe that we must concern ourselves in providing some pacific and mutually satisfactory means of exchange with both the Soviet Union and the Western nations. We have truncated our bilateral relations with the Soviet Union in this area and left our relations with the European community and the Japanese either in limbo or in jeopardy.

Some of my views expressed in a science policy speech which I recently made in Washington (at the George Washington University, Graduate Program in Science, Technology, and Public Policy) entitled "Setting Scientific Priorities: It Can Be Done". A copy of this is enclosed for your reference and use.

I have had the privilege of hearing your proposal with regard to restarting some sound and ongoing relations with the USSR in this area. If this action is carried forward in a positive manner with regular and ongoing progress, it may indeed provide a real key to defusing the dangerous circumstances that exist. Making any progress will depend on some mutual goodwill and an ongoing activity that is considered mutually beneficial. If the technical and scientific objectives are sound, then this could serve as a forum to ease tensions and would distinguish both parties. We must of course be careful to recognize the immediate and long-term U.S. strategic interests; however, we must not convert the space area into an arena for weapons of mass destruction if that can be avoided.

I congratulate you for seeking some means of normalizing U.S.-Soviet relations in some limited areas as a start.

Very truly yours.

DEAR SENATOR MATSUNAGA: The last 20 years have seen the opening of a new chapter in human history, the successful exploration by manned and (principally) unmanned space vehicles of 40 new worlds, including all the planets known to the ancients. If we are not so foolish as to destroy ourselves, future generations will recognize our time as an epochal turning point for our species and for life on Earth.

These expeditions have been carried out by the United States and the Soviet Union. Scientific data have been freely exchanged after the missions were completed. In some cases, such as the Apollo-Soyuz docking, joint missions were carried out cooperatively.

Space technology now permits extraordinary new missions, including roving vehicles on the surface of Mars, landings on asteriods that pass close to Earth, and entry vehicles into the organic clouds of Titan. Both for economic reasons, and because these are properly explorations performed for the entire human species, there is much to be said for making such expeditions international—involving not just the United States and the Soviet Union, but also the European Space Agency, Japan, and other emerging spacefaring nations.

The militarization of space, the extension of terrestrial rivalries into the vast expanse of space, is antithetical to peaceful exploration of space. In addition, it threatens economically vital satellite assets and politically stabilizing reconnaissance satellites. Nuclear weapons are already banned from the space environment by treaty. All conventional weapons, on both manned and unmanned space vehicles, should likewise be prohibited, in the joint interest of the United States and the Soviet Union and in the interest of the human species.

With every good wish,

Cordially,

CARL SAGAN.

DEAR SENATOR MATSUNAGA: This letter is meant to strongly support your continuing efforts to establish cooperative scientific endeavors in space on an international basis. There are a number of missions that could be accomplished with international cooperation that one nation might not be able to afford. For instance, several NASA and NAS panels have suggested that an unmanned sample return mission to Mars would be the next logical step in the exploration of that planet. The Soviets already have demonstrated a capability to use rovers and unmanned sample return vehicles in exploring the lunar surface (Soviet Lunakhod and Luna missions). Perhaps a joint US-USSR mission to collect samples from the Martian surface might be a logical starting place for a significant international endeavor. Such a mission is presently far above the present budgetary constraints placed on NASA.

DEAR SENATOR: I should like to express my support of your initiative calling for the President to explore the possibilities of reviving space cooperation with the Soviet Union.

As the long-time Assistant Administrator of NASA for International Affairs with lead responsibility for the extensive programs of cooperation with other space powers which were conducted in the 1960's and 1970's, I know of the very substantial scientific, economic and political benefits which may be derived for this country through prudent, well-balanced joint efforts in space.

In the case of the Soviet Union, such programs must be carefully selected and structured and commitments to them must be developed through proper phasing so that continuity is linked to demonstrated performance. With such precautions, and given the full support of the heads of government, cooperative space projects can be successful and broadly rewarding.

I hope that the administration will find it possible to move forward on the basis of the resolution you propose.

DEAR SENATOR MATSUNAGA: My personal expertise in space science research involves studies of the plasmas in space: in the Earth's and other planet's magnetospheres and in the interplanetary medium. I am presently the Chairman of the Space Science Board's Committee on Solar and Space Physics; this Committee, through the Board, advises NASA on its research activities in solar and space plasma physics research (often called solar-terrestrial research).

From my personal research experiences, in collaborations with Japanese and European scientists, and from the work of my Committee, I personally believe that there is considerable national scientific benefit to be gained from properly formated international cooperative science activities. The Soviet Union has a strong space plasma physics science program, in both observation and in theory. Much of this work involves studies of the Earth's magnetosphere. I believe that scientific benefits in space plasma physics research could result to the U.S. through a carefully worked-out collaborative program with the Soviet Union. Thus, I endorse your present initiative to request the Administration to investigate ways in which cooperative space science ventures between the two nations might be pursued.

DEAR SENATOR MATSUNAGA: I am writing to encourage and to lend my support to your efforts to restore U.S. initiative in seeking greater international cooperation in peaceful civilian space activities, including space science and applications. For some years I have been involved in efforts to advance cooperative space science programs between the United States and other nations—especially with the Western European nations and with the Soviet Union—and I have seen the benefits that could accrue to our country through such cooperation.

It is apparent that investigation of the solar system—man's newly extended environment—is an activity of great interest to many countries. The reasons for this interest are manifold. Among these reasons is the desire to expand our scientific understanding of the sun and planets, and thereby to expand our grasp of the terrestrial phenomena which govern Earth; important new insights and understanding about Earth have come from our studies of other planets. Moreover, scientific investigation of the solar system provides the opportunity to find answers to many of the important questions about the origin and evolution of our world which have occupied people throughout history. Looking ahead, it appears that the space environment will offer increasingly more in the way of economic and other benefits; scientific investigation of the solar system today offers our best approach to uncovering and assessing potential benefits for tomorrow.

The United States is not alone in its ability to carry out solar system investigations. Other nations have developed similar interests as well as similar and complementary technical capabilities. Our ability to exploit these capabilities and interests for our own benefit and for the broader benefit of mankind would be enhanced greatly by coordination of our activities and by the pooling of selected resources in solar system science. In my view, space activities are likely to remain a mix. Some elements, which serve purely nationalistic objectives, are unlikely to be conducive to international collaboration in the foreseeable future. Other elements lend themselves very well to an international approach.

During the past decade, attempts were made to initiate substantive collaboration with the Soviet Union in scientific exploration of the planets. These efforts were taken under the aegis of the joint U.S.-Soviet agreements signed by President Nixon in 1972 and later renewed in 1977. Because of a number of not surprising difficulties, progress was particularly slow. However, having served as a member of the U.S. National Aeronautics and Space Administration delegation to the last of these talks, it was my distinct impression that important progress was being made and that we were on the verge of being able to strike modest, but still substantial, agreements to cooperate in further exploration of the planet Venus. In the middle of this important progress last year the Administration let these bilateral agreements lapse, thus terminating the discussions.

At the present time discussions are being carried out under the auspices of the U.S. National Academy of Sciences (along with NASA) and the European Science Foundation (along with the European Space Agency) to lay plans for a program of joint planetary exploration. If properly implemented, this could be an important adjunct to the independent planetary programs of the two sides. I happened to be chairman of the U.S. delegation in these discussions and thus have a general perspective on the problems involved. A clearly stated commitment, on the part of the United States, to international cooperation would not solve all of the problems; but it would contribute in a major way by providing a foundation for agreements and for long-range plans.

I would be happy to discuss these matters further with you. If I can be of any help in your efforts, please do not hesitate to call upon me.

With best wishes,
Sincerely,

DEAR SENATOR MATSUNAGA: I am writing in support of the renewal of cooperation between the United States and the Soviet Union in the exploration of the solar system. The Space Science Board and its Committee on Planetary and Lunar Exploration has consistently urged that an active, open working relationship be established which would allow the full range of cooperative activities, including scientific discussions and identification of scientific goals of mutual interest, concurrent commitment to and coordination of planetary missions addressing these goals, and the timely exchange of information throughout the missions.

Substantial progress had been made toward establishing such a working relationship, only to have been interrupted by events of the last few years and the subsequent lapse of the cooperative agreement between the governments of the United States and the Soviet Union. Since the objectives and desirability of such a working relationship remain, it is important that the cooperative agreement be renewed.

DEAR SENATOR MATSUNAGA: As a planetary scientist committed to the peaceful exploration of the solar system, I am pleased to support the bill you are introducing encouraging international cooperation in space. For a number of years I have had the opportunity to see the advantages of such cooperation: as NASA Acting Deputy Associate Administrator for Space Science, as a member of the U.S. Delegation to the joint U.S./USSR discussions on planetary exploration (before their termination last year), and currently as Chairman of the Solar System Exploration Committee of the NASA Advisory Council.

In the past, three areas of cooperation in space science with the USSR have been particularly fruitful. The first and most prominent has been in manned space flight: not only the Apollo-Soyuz mission, but equally important the continuing exchange of data with the Soviets on the human response to long-duration space flight. Because of the dominance during recent years of the USSR in long-duration flight, this exchange has been of particular benefit to U.S. science, providing us data that would otherwise be impossible to obtain. Second is the related close cooperation between U.S. and Soviet scientists in other areas of life science research in space, which has included the flight of U.S. experiments in Soviet satellites. The third area is in planetary exploration, where U.S. and Soviet scientists have worked together closely in the analysis of data on the Moon and Venus. These cooperative planetary efforts have included exchange of lunar samples (providing us access to three sites not visited by Apollo) and use of U.S. radar data to locate Venus landing sites for the Soviet Venera landers. Although these cooperative programs have not always been easy to achieve, I believe all who have been involved believe the efforts to have been worthwhile, and to have provided significant returns to both U.S. and Soviet science.

At present there is a strong interest in the U.S. planetary science community in increased international cooperation. Given the costs of planetary missions, it is clear that scientists of all nations should work together to avoid unnecessary duplication of effort and to share their results. Our ties with other space-faring nations have recently increased, particularly with Europe and Japan. I hope that the international climate will permit a similar increase in consultation and cooperation with the USSR and other Socialist countries, and I believe such joint efforts would be of clear benefit to U.S. science.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have read with interest of your desire to enact legislation which would encourage the United States to enter into negotiations with the Soviet Union with an aim of reaching an understanding about the potential military use of outer space.

Obviously our two great powers already have the capacity to launch offensive and defensive weapons from low-earth orbit and will one day not far distant have the ability to launch nuclear weapons, too. These are logical steps in the exploration and utilization of space, and their potential for destruction is overwhelming.

Inevitably, each power must explore and refine this potential, and this can be done intellectually and in laboratories without even venturing into space. Testing in space would merely be the next step. The awesomeness of the problem confronts us right now.

Just as we have successfully outlawed the use of poison gas through one world war and several nearworld wars, I believe that through joint discussion we can do the same for space-launched nuclear weaponry. Indeed, if the United States and the Soviet Union were to devise a compact whereby together they explored and developed these capacities and used them for peaceful objectives, dangers would be avoided and the world would become a safer place.

I urge you to pursue your objectives. I urge you to keep our alternatives before the public. And I long for the day when this tremendous resource is used peacefully for all mankind.

DEAR SENATOR MATSUNAGA: I am happy to have the opportunity to support your bill regarding international co-operation in the exploration and exploitation of Space. Having had the great privilege of flying in this country's only joint space mission (Apollo-Soyuz) in 1975, I feel somewhat qualified to comment on the merits of such joint ventures.

The original intent of that flight was to further efforts at détente between the USSR and the USA by a demonstration of constructive co-operation between our countries in an arena recognized by the citizens of both countries as peaceful, prestigious, and beneficial. Those objectives were accomplished very successfully in 1975 and I believe are worth continuing to pursue in 1983 and beyond. It requires little astuteness in the science of human behavior to recognize that people who are communicating freely with each other and working diligently towards common objectives rarely indulge in activities which would prove catastrophic to the accomplishment of those objectives.

Two common criticisms of the Apollo-Soyuz Test Project are that we still have a high degree of tension between the USA and the USSR in spite of it and that we gave away valuable space technology in the process. There is no argument with the contention that current relationships leave much to be desired, but I propose they would be even more difficult without the friendly interfaces and good will built in accomplishing Apollo-Soyuz. It may be worth noting that the five cosmonauts chosen to be recognized at Chairman Brezhniv's funeral were personal friends of ours and I would therefore assume we still have some potential of favorable inputs at the higher levels of the Soviet government.

The proposition that we gave away technology does not recognize the openness with which NASA conducts its business. Everything done has been in the public domain and is available internationally to any interested party. Conversely, the USSR program had been conducted under a heavy veil of secrecy and for the first time were open to public scrutiny. In my opinion, the major thing the Soviets could have learned, to their everlasting benefit, is how to conduct major technical programs efficiently through use of free lateral and vertical communications among all participants. This would also have been to our major benefit because it is called "democracy". Unfortunately, they have not opted to purloin these lessons yet, but we should not give up hope.

Regarding future activities, both the USA and the USSR are recognizing the merits of international space ventures by including participants from their respective spheres of influence in their national space program. The next step to truly international space ventures should not be that difficult. A couple of obvious possibilities are:

1. Coupling our demonstrated leadership in reuseable, economic launch and re-entry vehicles with the USSR's long duration, large space station objectives.

2. Initiating a dialogue on pooling international resources for interplanetary exploration and exploitation. What better way to unify the globe than to get everyone working towards a constructive, common goal?

Thank you for the opportunity to comment on your bill and best wishes for your success in accomplishing its objectives.

DONALD K. SLAYTON,
President.

By Mr. HATCH (for himself, Mr. COCHRAN, Mr. HELMS, Mr. PRYOR, Mr. MITCHELL, Mr. KASTEN, Mr. INOUYE, Mr. GOLDWATER, Mr. SYMMS, Mr. HEINZ, Mr. MATSUNAGA, Mr. DOMENICI, Mr. BUMPERS, and Mr. GRASSLEY):

S.J. Res. 237. A joint resolution to designate the week of November 25, 1984, through December 1, 1984, as "National Home Care Week"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NATIONAL HOME CARE WEEK

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, my purpose in speaking today is to bring before my colleagues a resolution to designate November 25, 1984, through December 1, 1984, as "National Home Health Week."

In the last 3 years I have sponsored three major home health initiatives to improve and expand the availability of home care services to our elderly and disabled. Widely supported on both sides of the aisle, two were reported by the Committee on Labor and Human Resources, and one has been signed into law.

By the turn of this century, it is estimated that the number of citizens 65 years and over will increase by 35 percent. In light of this geometric increase in the number of senior citizens, many needing more extensive health care and attention, it is imperative that we provide alternatives to those elderly and disabled citizens who will need some form of long-term health care. I believe that home health care is the best of these alternatives. Home health care organizations have shown that they can provide quality, cost-effective health care using new, innovative techniques to increase their efficiency.

I am encouraged by these efforts and I salute the millions of home health aides, therapists, nurses, dieticians, physicians and above all the families, who provide these services to millions of elderly and disabled Americans. It is their selfless hard work that invests in citizens their rights to their dignity and independence.

I encourage my colleagues to consider cosponsoring this effort and respectfully request the assistance of the leadership in working for its swift adoption.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of this resolution be inserted in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 237

Whereas organized home health care services to the elderly and disabled have existed in this country since the last quarter of the eighteenth century;

Whereas home care is recognized as an effective and economical alternative to unnecessary institutionalization;

Whereas caring for the ill and disabled in their homes places emphasis on the dignity and independence of the individual receiving these services;

Whereas since the enactment of the medicare program, including skilled nursing services, physical therapy, speech therapy, social services, occupational therapy, and home health aide services, the number of home health agencies providing these services has increased from less than five hundred to more than four thousand; and

Whereas many private and charitable organizations provide these and similar services to millions of patients each year preventing, postponing, and limiting the need for institutionalization: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the week of November 25, 1984, through December 1, 1984, is designated as "National Home Care Week", and the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe the week with appropriate programs, ceremonies, and activities.

By Mr. HATCH (for himself, Mr. DENTON, Mrs. HAWKINS, Mr. NICKLES, Mr. HUMPHREY, Mr. RANDOLPH, Mr. LAXALT, Mr. MCCLURE, Mr. MURKOWSKI, Mr. ABDNOR, Mr. DOMENICI, Mr. WEICKER, Mr. PRYOR, Mr. STENNIS, Mr. BENTSEN, Mr. GARN, Mr. WILSON, Mr. BUMPERS, Mr. SARBANES, Mr. LUGAR, Mr. NUNN, Mr. HELMS, Mr. CHAFEE, Mr. THURMOND, Mr. PELL, Mr. MATSUNAGA, Mr. ZORINSKY, Mr. BAUCUS, Mr. CRANSTON, Mr. MATTINGLY, and Mr. DODD:

S.J. Res. 238. A joint resolution to designate the week beginning November 19, 1984, as "National Adoption Week"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NATIONAL ADOPTION WEEK

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, it is again my privilege to sponsor the Senate resolution proclaiming Thanksgiving week as National Adoption Week. During the past few years, a growing number of Americans have felt a need to reestablish our traditional values, especially family values. The official designation of Thanksgiving week to National Family Week is an example of this encouraging trend. Adoption is an important part of the life and love of many American families. In many ways, our country's unequaled record in adopting, loving, and caring for those who would otherwise be bereft of God's greatest gift is the most important testament in the annals of America's "First." America is first in many things, but most important of all, we are first in love.

As Senators, we unanimously approved this resolution in 1983, but the House failed to act in time. We in the Senate recognized then, as we do now, the needs of many children in this country who need what they desperately long for, a permanent home with a family. We should not let another year go by without affirming this commitment. In America today, there are estimated to be 100,000 adoptable children who are legally free for adoption. These children, however, remain in foster care and institutions due to various public and private barriers. There also remains a lack of awareness by prospective parents who don't know that these children are available.

The majority of these children have special needs. They may have physical, emotional, or mental handicaps, or they may be children who have already reached school age. They may be children from various ethnic backgrounds. They may be children with brothers and sisters. What they all share in common is a basic right and a fundamental need for a permanent, secure, and loving home.

This is why this resolution is so important. It is not just another commemorative resolution. It gives clear meaning to the congressional intent in support of encouraging and supporting fair adoption practices.

As part of National Family Week, adoption has been honored over the past 9 years. The North American Council on Adoptable Children (NACAC) has been actively involved in providing information available on activities highlighting this week's activities. Further, the National Committee for Adoption has also sponsored activities during this week along with the Department of Health and Human Services, under the direction of Assistant Secretary Dorcas Hardy. I am certain these important activities will occur this year under their auspices if we can formally create National Adoption Week.

Let us join in these efforts. Let us focus attention on adoption and commend those public and private institutions working to find permanent homes for all adoptable children. Let us join in a celebration for families who have united through adoption. I urge you to join other Senators and me by cosponsoring and enacting this resolution. I ask unanimous consent that the complete text of the resolution be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 238

Whereas the week of November 19 has been privately commemorated as National Adoption Week for the past nine years;

Whereas we in Congress recognize the essential value of belonging to a secure, loving, permanent family as every child's basic right;

Whereas approximately one hundred thousand children who have special needs—school age, in sibling groups, members of minorities or children with physical, mental and emotional handicaps—are now in foster care or institutions financed at public expense and are legally free for adoption;

Whereas the adoption by capable parents of these institutionalized or foster care children into permanent, adoptive homes would insure the opportunity for their continued happiness and long-range well-being;

Whereas public and private barriers inhibiting the placement of these special needs children must be reviewed and removed where possible to assure these children's adoption;

Whereas the public and prospective parents must be informed of the availablility of adoptable children;

Whereas a variety of media, agencies, adoptive parent and advocacy groups, civic and church groups, businesses and industries will feature publicity and information to heighten community awareness of the crucial needs of waiting children; and

Whereas the recognition of Thanksgiving week as National Adoption Week is in the best interest of adoptable children and the public in general; Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the week of November 19 through November 25, 1984, hereby is designated "National AJoption Week", and the President of the United States is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe such week with appropriate ceremonies and activities.

SENATE RESOLUTION 343—AUTHORIZING EXPENDITURES BY THE COMMITTEE ON RULES AND ADMINISTRATION

Mr. MATHIAS submitted the following resolution which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

S. RES. 343

Resolved, That, in carrying out its powers, duties, and functions under the Standing Rules of the Senate, in accordance with its jurisdiction under rule XXV of such rules, including holding hearings, reporting such hearings, and making investigations as authorized by paragraphs 1 and 8 of rule XXVI of the Standing Rules of the Senate, the Committee on Rules and Administration is authorized from March 1, 1984, through February 28, 1985, in its discretion (1) to make expenditures from the contingent fund of the Senate, (2) to employ personnel, and (3) with the prior consent of the Government department or agency concerned and the Committee on Rules and Administration, to use on a reimbursable basis the services of personnel of any such department or agency.

SEC. 2. The expenses of the committee under this resolution shall not exceed $1,340,195, of which amount first not to exceed $5,000 may be expended for the procurement of the services of individual consultants, or organizations thereof (as authorized by section 202(i) of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946, as amended), and second, not to exceed $2,500 may be expended for the training of the professional staff of such Committee (under procedures specified by section 202(j) of such Act).

SEC. 3. The committee shall report its findings, together with such recommendations for legislation as it deems advisable, to the Senate at the earliest practicable date, but not later than February 28, 1985.

SEC. 4. Expenses of the Committee under this resolution shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee, except that vouchers shall not be required for the disbursement of salaries of employees paid at an annual rate.

SENATE RESOLUTION 348—RESOLUTION RELATING TO THE CRISIS IN LEBANON

Mr. MURKOWSKI submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

S. RES. 348

Whereas all nations have an interest in preventing the disruption of Middle East oil production and exports;

Whereas the conflict in Lebanon has heightened tensions throughout the Middle East, has inhibited the comprehensive peace process, and could expand into a regional military conflict which would threaten the flow of oil out of the Middle East;

Whereas the United States has deployed a portion of the Sixth Fleet off the shores of Lebanon in an effort to maintain stability in that country;

Whereas the United States deploys the Seventh Fleet in the Indian Ocean with the responsibility for assuring the security of the Straits of Hormuz and the oil fields of the region;

Whereas many other nations are more heavily dependent upon the uninterrupted flow of oil than the United States, which currently relies on Middle East oil for only 3 percent of its imports;

Whereas Japan, South Korea, Spain, and West Germany receive 64 percent, 78 percent, 60 percent, and 37 percent of their oil imports, respectively, from the Middle East, and these, as well as other countries, have not contributed to the Multinational Force or otherwise played a substantial role in the stabilization of Lebanon;

Whereas the various members of the Multinational Peacekeeping Force have been, and will continue to be, targets of violence from those elements involved in, and contributing to, the internal conflict in Lebanon;

Whereas section 5 (c) of the Multinational Force in Lebanon Resolution, (Public Law 98-119), approved October 12, 1983, stipulates that "the United States should discuss with the other members of the Security Council of the United Nations the establishment of a United Nations peacekeeping force to assume the responsibilities of the Multination Force in Lebanon"; and

Whereas a more broadly-based peacekeeping force in Lebanon would be a better demonstration of the vital interest of the international community in a stable Middle East; Now, therefore, be it

Resolved. That it is the sense of the Senate that the President should—

(1) vigorously and thoroughly explore—

(A) in coordination with the other member countries of the Multinational Force in Lebanon, the formation of a more broadly-based force in Lebanon the membership of which would reflect those oil-consuming countries substantially dependent upon Middle East oil imports;

(B) in discussions with the Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the possibililty of an orderly transferral of the peacekeeping responsibilities in Lebanon to either a United Nations peacekeeping force or to forces from neutral countries; and

(C) the concept of replacing the onshore presence of United States Marines in Lebanon with United States military advisors in the event that a continued United States military presence as part of a more broadly-based force in Lebanon remains necessary; and

(2) prepare and transmit to the Congress a report setting forth the measures he has taken to carry out paragraph (1) no later than six months after the date of adoption of this resolution.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Senate shall transmit a copy of this resolution to the President.

Mr. MURKOWSKI. Mr. President, all of us are concerned about the deteriorating situation in Lebanon. I want to address a potential outcome of the crisis which has received insufficient attention. I also will introduce a resolution calling on the President to explore three specific policy options.

If the battle for Lebanon begins to spread beyond that tiny country's borders, the flow of Middle East oil exports could be cut off. A Middle East war, spawned in Lebanon, could have a disastrous effect on the economies of the many nations so dependent on Middle East oil for their economic well-being. Indeed, virtually all modern economies are based upon a lifeline of oil. Disruption of Middle East oil supplies would, therefore, cripple world economic stability.

Hence, the security of oil supplies is inherently tied to the maintenance of stability in Lebanon. All oil dependent nations have an obligation and duty to help prevent the disruption of Middle East oil production and exportation. Therefore, I strongly believe that all oil-consuming countries must share the burden of protecting the security of Lebanon and the Middle East oilfields. The U.S. 6th Fleet off Lebanon and the 7th Fleet in the Indian Ocean have been carrying this burden far too long.

The level of U.S. dependence on Middle East oil is now only 3 percent on the other hand, in 1982 Middle East oil made up 70 percent of Japan's oil imports and 82 percent of Italy's. France got 65 percent of its 1982 oil imports from the region, West Germany 36 percent and England 30 percent. It is time that these countries, as well as all other oil consuming nations, realize that their military security and economic well-being hinges on stability in the Middle East.

Mr. President, I feel it is now time to start exploring several options which could be acted upon after the dust clears in Beirut. First, a formula under which the makeup of the multinational peacekeeping force directly reflects the beneficiaries of the resource we are trying to protect. Second, we should immediately discuss with the Soviets, at the highest possible level, their policy toward deployment of a U.N. force in Beirut. It has come to my attention that the administration has not thoroughly investigated this policy alternative and that the Soviets may now be willing to agree to such a deployment. Third, we must consider the idea of replacing our troops with military advisers in the event that some continued U.S. military presence becomes necessary.

I want to emphasize in closing that I am not advocating the abandonment of U.S. responsibilities in the Middle East. We are a great power, and with great power status comes great responsibilities. The United States has more than met those responsibilities. It is time other nations in the international community do the same.

Mr. President, I send to the desk a resolution which calls on the President to fully explore the three policy options I have just discussed.

I also ask unanimous consent that this chart, showing the extent of reliance of various countries on Middle East oil, be included in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SENATE RESOLUTION 349—MEMBERSHIP OF THE FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD OF GOVERNORS

Mr. PRYOR (for himself and Mr. PRESSLER) submitted the following resolution relating to the membership of the Federal Reserve Board of Governors; which was referred to the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs.

S. RES. 349

Whereas small business, by Small Business Administration standards of measurement, accounts for 98 percent of all U.S. businesses, and

Whereas 60 percent of all new jobs are created by firms with 500 or fewer employees, and

Whereas small business bankruptcies in 1982 totalled nearly 66,000, due in large part to high interest rates, and many other firms closed down without filing for bankruptcy, and

Whereas our agricultural industry, including three million farmers, is heavily dependent upon credit, and

Whereas neither of these sectors has direct representation on the Federal Reserve Board, which establishes our national monetary policy, and

Whereas the growth of our national economy depends on the health of the small business and agricultural sectors: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that the President should nominate to the next vacancy on the Federal Reserve Board of Governors a person of demonstrable experience in small business or agriculture.

● Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, today I am introducing a sense of the Senate resolution calling upon the President to fill the next vacancy on the Federal Reserve Board with a representative of small business or agriculture.

I am proud that Senator PRESSLER joins me in sponsoring this legislation.

This is not a new concept. Other Senators in the past have proposed a similar approach.

I believe that this is a good time to raise this issue once again, however, since the President is expected to name a replacement before long for the seat now held by Nancy Teeters.

Mr. President, I am sure our colleagues are well aware of the importance of agriculture and small business to our economy. A few figures give an idea of the role they play in our national economic growth. Ninety-eight percent of U.S. firms can be classified as small business. Sixty percent of all new jobs are created by firms with 500 or fewer employees, and it has been estimated that 80 percent of all new jobs are created by small business, especially in high technology growth industries.

The direct and indirect contribution of agriculture is greater than 20 percent of the annual production in the United States. Four million workers are employed in farming, and 20 million more jobs are dependent on the agricultural sector. Agriculture provides one-fifth of all U.S. exports.

Despite the importance of these sectors of the economy, however, it has been more than 20 years since a representative of agriculture has been appointed to the Board, and in that time only one member of the Board has had a small business background.

Both small business and agriculture are extremely credit sensitive, and I believe that the Board would benefit from the viewpoint found on main street, in addition to the expertise of the members now serving on the Board of Governors.

I invite other Members of the Senate to join Senator PRESSLER and me as cosponsors of this resolution, and I hope that the Senate will consider this legislation just as soon as possible in order to let the President know how we feel about this imminent nomination.●

HATFIELD AMENDMENT NO. 2706

(Ordered to lie on the table.)

Mr. HATFIELD submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the amendment (No. 2702) proposed by Mr. LEVIN to the bill (S. 1765) to establish constitutional procedures for the imposition of the sentence of death, and for other purposes; as follows:

After the period, insert the following: "Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, no sentence of death shall be carried out unless the U.S. Marshal charged with the execution of any sentence of death has taken such action as may be necessary to cause such execution to be carried out in public, including the making available such communication facilities, including radio and television, opportunities as may be necessary to permit the widest possible exposure of such execution to the public, and unless such execution is at a time most likely to provide such exposure."

SOLID WASTE DISPOSAL ACT AMENDMENTS

KASTEN AMENDMENT NO. 2707

(Ordered to lie on the table.)

Mr. KASTEN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 757) to amend the Solid Waste Disposal Act to authorize funds for fiscal years 1983, 1984, 1985, 1986, and 1987, and for other purposes; as follows:

Redesignate sections 22 through 29 as sections 23 through 30, and insert after section 21 the following new section:

USE OF RECOVERED MATERIALS BY FEDERAL AGENCIES

SEC. 22. (a) Section 6002 of the Solid Waste Disposal Act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsections:

"(h) DEFINITION.—As used in this section, in the case of paper products, the term 'recovered materials' includes—

"(1) post consumer materials such as—

"(A) paper, paperboard, and fibrous wastes from retail stores, office buildings, homes, and similar establishments, after they have passed through their end-usage as a consumer item, including (but not limited to) used corrugated boxes, newspapers, magazines, mixed wastepaper, tabulating cards, and used cordage; and

"(B) all paper, paperboard, and fibrous wastes which enter and are collected from municipal solid waste; and

"(2) manufacturing wastes, forest residues, and other wastes such as—

"(A) dry paper and paperboard waste generated after completion of the papermaking process (that is, those manufacturing operations up to and including the cutting and trimming of the paper machine reel into smaller rolls or rough sheets) including—

"(i) envelope cuttings, bindery trimmings, and other paper and paperboard waste, resulting from printing, cutting, forming, and other converting operations;

"(ii) bag, box, and carton manufacturing wastes; and

"(iii) butt rolls, mill wrappers, and rejected unused stock;

"(B) finished paper and paperboard from obsolete inventories of paper and paperboard manufacturers, merchants, wholesalers, dealers, printers, converters, or others;

"(C) fibrous byproducts of harvesting, manufacturing, extractive, or wood-cutting processes, flax, straw, linters, bagasse, slash, and other forest residues;

"(D) wastes generated by the conversion of goods made from fibrous material (that is, waste rope from cordage manufacture, textile mill waste, and cuttings); and

"(E) fibers recovered from waste water which otherwise would enter the waste stream.

"(i) PROCUREMENT PROGRAM.—(1) Within one year after the date of publication of applicable guidelines under subsection (e), each procuring agency shall develop an affirmative procurement program which will assure that items composed of recovered materials will be purchased to the maximum extent practicable, consistent with applicable provisions of Federal procurement law.

"(2) Each affirmative procurement program required under this subsection shall, at a minimum, contain—

"(A) a recovered materials preference program;

"(B) an agency promotion program to promote the preference program adopted under subparagraph (A);

"(C) a program for requiring (i) estimates of the total percentage of recovered material utilized in the performance of a contract, (ii) certification of minimum recovered material content actually utilized, where appropriate, and (iii) reasonable verification procedures for estimates and certifications; and

"(D) annual review and monitoring of the effectiveness of an agency's affirmative procurement program.

In the case of paper, the recovered materials preference program required under subparagraph (A) shall provide for the maximum use of the post consumer recovered materials referred to in subsection (h)(1).

"(3) In developing the preference program, the following options shall be considered for adoption:

"(A) CASE-BY-CASE POLICY DEVELOPMENT.—Subject to the limitations of subparagraphs (A) through (C) of subsection (c)(1), a policy may be established for awarding contracts to the vendor offering an item composed of the highest percentage of recovered materials practicable (and in the case of paper, the highest percentage of the post consumer recovered materials referred to in subsection (h)(1)). Subject to such limitations, agencies may make an award to a vendor offering items with less than the maximum recovered materials content.

"(B) MINIMUM CONTENT STANDARDS.—Minimum recovered materials content specifications may be set in such a way as to assure that the recovered materials content (and in the case of paper, the content of post consumer materials referred to in subsection (h)(1)) required is the maximum available without jeopardizing the intended end use of the item, or violating the limitations of subparagraphs (A) through (C) of subsection (c)(1).

Procuring agencies shall adopt one of the options set forth in subparagraphs (A) and (B), or a substantially equivalent alternative, for inclusion in the affirmative procurement program.".

(b) Section 6002(c)(1) of such Act is amended by inserting after "highest percentage of recovered materials practicable" the following: "(and in the case of paper, the highest percentage of the post consumer recovered materials referred to in subsection (h)(1) practicable)".

(c) Section 6002(d)(1) of such Act is amended by striking out "five years after the date of enactment of this Act" and inserting in lieu thereof "18 months after the date of the enactment of the Solid Waste Disposal Act Amendments of 1984".

(d) Section 6002(e) of such Act is amended—

(1) in paragraph (1), by inserting after "section" the following: ", and in the case of paper, provide for maximizing the use of post consumer recovered materials referred to in subsection (h)(1)"; and

(2) in the matter following paragraph (2), by striking out "for at least three product categories" and all that follows through "1982", and inserting in lieu thereof "for paper within 180 days after the date of the enactment of the Solid Waste Disposal Act Amendments of 1984, and for three additional product categories (including tires) by October 1, 1985".

(e) Section 6002(g) of such Act is amended—

(1) by striking out "the policy expressed in" and inserting in lieu thereof "the requirements of"; and

(2) by inserting before the period at the end thereof the following: ", and to report to the Congress every two years, beginning in 1984, on actions taken by Federal agencies and the progress made in the implementation of this section, including agency compliance with subsection (d)".

● Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, today I am introducing an amendment to the Solid Waste Disposal Act to encourage the use of recycled paper.

The Federal Government is one of the largest consumers of paper in the Nation, yet it does not have a policy that encourages the use of recycled materials.

The amendment I am introducing today establishes a purchasing policy to encourage the Federal Government to use recycled paper. Today, bids for Federal purchases must meet strict performance standards. Of those bids which meet specifications, the contract is awarded to the lowest bidder. The amendment I am introducing does not change this criteria. It does add a simple step, providing that recycled paper which meets this criteria be given preference.

Not only would this amendment conserve our natural resources, it also would help reduce our Nation's landfill problem. Approximately 65 percent of the volume of municipal solid waste is paper. By encouraging recycling, a significant portion of the volume of municipal solid waste can be reduced. Furthermore, the amendment encourages resource recovery for the highest and best use.

The paper industry already has made great strides in recycling. Many paper companies already recycle waste materials as part of their normal operation. The quality of papers which may be produced from recycled materials has also improved dramatically in recent years. Papers that were produced from recycled materials are now available which perform as well as many of those produced from virgin stock.

A number of States have adopted programs which encourage the use of recycled paper. At the conclusion of my remarks I will submit for the RECORD a statement describing one State's experience with its recycling program. In addition, I have a number of samples of recycled paper that I invite my colleagues to inspect, to see the quality and diversity which is available.

All too often the Federal Government is willing to tell others what to do, and exempt itself from that action. This amendment is a small step to commit the Government to improving resource conservation and recovery.

I request the text of the letter describing Maryland's recycling program be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MARYLAND BUYS RECYCLED PAPER

The Maryland Department of General Services recently purchased 98,000 reams of recycled bond paper for state and local agency use. This represents the largest one time purchase of recycled bond paper since the passage of House Bill 153 in 1977, which established the state's recycled paper purchasing program.

The 98,000 reams purchased were competitive with virgin bond paper in both price and quality. The purchase will save an estimated 13 billion BTUs, or enough energy to heat about 114 homes for a year.

Since the passage of the law in 1977, state agencies, local governments, schools, colleges and private organizations have purchased over $12.7 billion worth of recycled paper products. The products purchased have included recycled bond paper, paper towels, toilet tissue, corrugated boxes, computer paper and other products. To date, the program has saved approximately 772 billion BTUs, or enough heating oil to heat about 6,772 homes for a year.

The Maryland Energy Office (MEO) continues to provide technical information on recycled paper, and has assisted many organizations in establishing programs to buy recycled paper. MEO can provide further information on Maryland's internationally recognized program and information on starting a similar program.●

CHANGES IN CIVIL SERVICE

BAKER (FOR STEVENS) AMENDMENT NO. 2708

Mr. BAKER (for Mr. STEVENS) proposed an amendment to the bill (H.R. 4336) an act to make certain miscellaneous changes in laws relating to the civil service, as follows:

On page 4, beginning with line 1, strike out all through page 5, line 23, and redesignate the succeeding sections accordingly.

On page 7, line 9, strike out "implementation" and insert in lieu thereof "operation".

On page 7, line 11, strike out "and currently in operation".

On page 7, line 14, strike out "4703(d)(1)(B)" and insert in lieu thereof "4703(d)(1)".

On page 6, line 16, beginning with "There" strike out all through "which" on line 17, and insert in lieu thereof "The revolving fund referred to in section 1304(e)(1) of this title".

U.S. ARMY CORPS OF ENGINEERS

BAKER (FOR STAFFORD) AMENDMENT NO. 2709

Mr. BAKER (for Mr. STAFFORD) proposed an amendment to the bill (S. 1330) a bill to authorize the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers to provide grants to the several States to encourage and foster the construction of necessary public capital investment projects, and for other purposes, as follows:

Viz: On page 20, line 20, delete "1983" and insert in lieu thereof "1984".

SECONDARY MORTGAGE MARKET ENHANCEMENT ACT OF 1983

BAKER (FOR GARN) AMENDMENT NO. 2710

Mr. BAKER (for Mr. GARN) proposed an amendment to the bill (S. 2040) an original bill to amend the Securities Act of 1933 and the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 with respect to the treatment of mortgage backed securities, to increase the authority of the Federal Home Loan Mortgage Corporation, and for other purposes, as follows:

Viz: Insert the following new sections after Section 101:

SEC. 101A. Section 3(a) of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 (15 U.S.C. 78c(a)) is amended by adding the following new paragraph at the end thereof:

"(41) The term 'mortgage related payment security' means a security that is rated in one of the four highest rating categories by at least one nationally recognized rating organization and either:

"(i) represents ownership of one or more promissory notes or certificates of interest or participations in such notes (including any rights designed to assure servicing of, or the receipt or timeliness of receipt by the holders of such notes, certificates, or participations of amounts payable under, such notes, certificates, or participations), which notes:

"(A) are directly secured by a first lien or a second lien on a single parcel of real estate, including stock allocated to a dwelling unit in a residential cooperative housing corporation, upon which is located a dwelling or other residential or commercial structure, or on a manufactured home, as defined in Section 603(6) of the National Manufactured Housing Construction and Safety Standards Act of 1974, which is used as a residence; and

"(B) were originated by a savings and loan association, savings bank, commercial bank, credit union, insurance company, or similar institution which is supervised and examined by a Federal or State authority, or by a mortgagee approved by the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development pursuant to Sections 203 and 211 of the National Housing Act; or

"(ii) is secured by one or more promissory notes or certificates of interest or participations in such notes (with or without recourse to the issuer thereof) and, by its terms, provides for payments of principal in relation to payments, or reasonable projections of payments, on notes meeting the requirements of subparagraphs (i)(A) and (B) or certificates of interest or participations in promissory notes meeting such requirements.".

SEC. 101B. Section 7 of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 (15 U.S.C. 78g) is amended by adding the following new subsection at the end thereof:

"(g) Subject to such rules and regulations as the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System may adopt in the public interest and for the protection of investors, no member of a national securities exchange or broker or dealer shall be deemed to have extended or maintained credit or arranged for the extension or maintenance of credit for the purpose of purchasing a security, within the meaning of this section, by reason of a bona fide agreement for delayed delivery of a mortgage payment related security against full payment of the purchase price thereof upon such delivery within 180 days after the purchase, or within such shorter period as the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System may prescribe by rule or regulation.".

SEC. 101C. Section 8(a) of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 (15 U.S.C. 78h(a)) is amended by adding the following new sentence at the end thereof: "Subject to such rules and regulations as the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System may adopt in the public interest and for the protection of investors, no person shall be deemed to have borrowed within the ordinary course of business, within the meaning of this subsection, by reason of a bona fide agreement for delayed delivery of a mortgage related payment security against full payment of the purchase price thereof upon such delivery within 180 days after the purchase, or within such shorter period as the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System may prescribe by rule or regulation.".

SEC. 101D. Section 11(d)(1) of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 (15 U.S.C. 78k(d)(1)) is amended by:

(a) inserting "(i)" between "of" and "any"; and

(b) inserting the following immediately after "thirty-five days after such purchase": "or (ii) any mortgage related payment security against full payment of the entire purchase price thereof upon such delivery within 180 days after such purchase, or within such shorter period as the Commission may prescribe by rule or regulation".

NOTICES OF HEARINGS

SUBCOMMITTEE ON INFORMATION MANAGEMENT AND REGULATORY AFFAIRS

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, I would like to announce for the information of the Senate and the public the scheduling of a public hearing before the Subcommittee on Information Management and Regulatory Affairs on reauthorization of the Paperwork Reduction Act of 1980. The hearing will be held on Tuesday, March 6, beginning at 9:30 a.m., in room SD-342 of the Dirksen Senate Office Building.

The hearing will focus on what steps are needed to stengthen the act and improve its implementation. Those wishing to testify or who wish to submit written statements for the hearing record should write to the Subcommittee on Information Management and Regulatory Affairs, Committee on Governmental Affairs, room SD-326, Washington, D.C. 20510.

For further information regarding this hearing, you may wish to contact Mr. Reid Detchon, staff director, or Ms. Helen Hobart, chief clerk, at 202-224-0211.

SELECT COMMITTEE ON INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. President, I would like to announce for the information of the public that the Select Committee on Indian Affairs will be holding the following oversight hearings:

On February 21, 1984, beginning at 10 a.m., in Senate Russell 385, a hearing on the Bureau of Indian Affairs' (BIA) fiscal year 1985 budget justifications. Those wishing additional information should contact Paul Alexander of the committee at 224-2251.

On February 23, 1984, beginning at 9:30 a.m., in Senate Dirksen 538, hearings on Indian programs within the Department of Education and Department of Health and Human Services. Those wishing additional information should contact Mary Jane Wrenn and Patricia Zell at 224-2251.

On February 29, 1984, beginning at 9:30 a.m., in Senate Dirksen 562, a hearing on S. 2166, reauthorization of the Indian Health Care Improvement Act. Those wishing additional information should contact Patricia Zell-Cox at 224-2251.

AUTHORITY FOR COMMITTEES TO MEET

SUBCOMMITTEE ON PUBLIC LANDS AND RESERVED WATER

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Subcommittee on Public Lands and Reserved Water, of the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate on Thursday, February 9, at 2 p.m., to hold a hearing to consider S. 1611, the Arizona Strip District Wilderness Act of 1983; and S. 2155, a bill to designate certain national forest system lands in the State of Utah for inclusion in the national wilderness preservation system to release other forest lands for multiple-use management, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

COMMITTEE ON COMMERCE, SCIENCE, AND TRANSPORTATION

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Commerce, Science and Transportation be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate on Thursday, February 9, 1984, to hold hearings on S. 2160, National Fisheries Marketing Council Act of 1983.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

COMMITTEE ON ENERGY AND NATURAL RESOURCES

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate on Thursday, February 9, at 10 a.m., to hold a hearing to consider the President's proposed budget for fiscal year 1985 for the U.S. Synthetic Fuels Corporation, the Forest Service, and the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

COMMITTEE ON GOVERNMENTAL AFFAIRS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Governmental Affairs be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate on Thursday, February 9, to hold a business meeting to consider Senate Resolution 293, Civil Contempt Proceedings Against Anthony Accardo.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

FORMER AMBASSADOR HARRIMAN EXPRESSES CONCERNS OVER POLICY FAILURES

● Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, at this precarious stage in the relationship between the United States and the Soviet Union the leaders of both nations stand to benefit from the very special insight of W. Averell Harriman, former Ambassador to the Soviet Union, President Kennedy's Chief Negotiator of the 1963 Limited Test Ban Treaty, and one of the greatest public servants in the history of the Republic. In an article in the New York Times on January 1, Ambassador Harriman expresses his deep concern over the failure of President Reagan's Soviet policy and portrays the future in a stark light:

This is the grim result of Reagan Administration diplomacy: If present developments in nuclear arms and United States-Soviet relations are permitted to continue we could face not the risk but the reality of nuclear war.

The world is now approaching a point of nuclear no return. Ambassador Harriman points out that the Soviets bear their share of the blame for the stalemate but he also emphasizes that:

The behavior and the proposals of the Administration in both the strategic and European nuclear discussions have raised serious doubts in the minds of many about whether there was ever any intention to reach any reasonable agreement.

The administration's rote denunciation of the Soviet Union is no substitute for a coherent policy. When the United States and Soviet leaders prefer condemnation to negotiation, when compromise is forsaken for confrontation, then each regional conflict, whether in the Middle East or Latin America, becomes a test of national wills and a potential East-West showdown.

Ambassador Harriman is convinced that a sensible arms control agreement can be attained. As he points out:

The Limited Nuclear Test Ban of 1963, after all, came after the Cuban missile crisis and years of tension in Berlin. Both sides, however, must want an agreement. Each side must be willing to seize on what is positive in the other's proposal rather than be paralyzed by the least favorable elements presented by each.

Mr. President, Ambassador Harriman has been a unique voice of reason and a man of extraordinary vision in our foreign relations. His call for a renewed effort to reverse the downward spiral cannot and must not go unheeded. In his words, "We must seek to pass on to our children and grandchildren not fear but hope; not an arms race, but arms control; not the death of the Earth, but a better and safer world."

Mr. President, I ask that Ambassador Harriman's recent article be included in the RECORD at this point, and hope that my colleagues will reflect carefully on it.

The article follows:

[From the New York Times, Jan. 1, 1984]

IF THE REAGAN PATTERN CONTINUES, AMERICA MAY FACE NUCLEAR WAR

(By W. Averell Harriman)

For three years, I have refrained from directly criticizing the President of the United States. I have been reticent because I believe that America must stand united before the world, particularly in the face of our foremost adversary, the Soviet Union. I also believe a President should be given fair time to pursue his goals and test his policies. In this sense, politics should stop at the water's edge. But this cannot mean that all criticism should be muted indefinitely, no matter how wrong a President may be or how critical the world situation may become.

President Reagan has had his fair chance, and he can no longer expect Americans to support policies that make our relationship with the Soviet Union more dangerous than at any time in the past generation.

This is the grim result of Reagan Administration diplomacy: If present developments in nuclear arms and United States-Soviet relations are permitted to continue, we could face not the risk but the reality of nuclear war.

To be silent in this situation is not patriotic but irresponsible. In the last month, nuclear arms negotiations have collapsed. Communication of all kinds between the United States and the Soviet Union has broken down; instead, we have propaganda barrages and the spectacle of the leaders of the two mightiest nations on earth trading insults, as if they had no more serious obligations than their own personal pride and political survival.

THE MOST DANGEROUS RELATIONSHIP WITH MOSCOW IN A GENERATION

Flush with the polls and the overwhelming victory of 6,000 Americans over 600 Cubans on Grenada, the Administration now shows every sign of drawing the wrong lesson from that experience and risking defeats of a proportion it seemingly cannot even imagine.

Day by day in the Middle East, the Administration sinks further into a quagmire, committing American lives and American honor with no clear policy, no certain plan and, indeed, no obvious concern for the day when American soldiers and Soviet soldiers come face-to-face, no longer safely separated by the buffers of distance and surrogate military forces.

Moreover, Lebanon is only the most immediate trouble spot. Around the world, possible points of conflict and escalation become more volatile than ever as each superpower, in today's deteriorating situation, may be tempted to confront rather than to compromise, to treat every test as a measure of national will. The destruction of the South Korean airliner by the Soviet Union last summer provided chilling proof of the increasing potential for miscalculation and misunderstanding. Events can too readily overwhelm common sense and human safeguards.

These trends by themselves would be cause enough for worry, but they take place against the backdrop of a nuclear arms race rapidly escaping out of control—and dangerously passing the point of no return.

Within a few years, both the United States and the Soviet Union will have in place intercontinental missiles interpreted each by the other as instruments of a massive first strike. Within a span of months, both nations will put shorter-range nuclear missiles nearer each other's territory, missiles capable of striking critical command and control centers with flight times so short that caution may be the first casualty of some future crisis.

As if this were not sufficient, thousands of nuclear-armed cruise missiles will soon be stationed on American submarines, to be followed by thousands more carried on Soviet ships, or hidden, in uncountable numbers, in the vast expanse of the Soviet Union. These cruise missiles will pose extremely difficult challenges to arms control verification and they will vastly complicate our ability ever to achieve the nuclear reductions both American and Soviet leaders say they seek.

Perhaps the most tragic trend—because it is so avoidable—is that the arms race is about to be launched into space. Anti-satellite weapons will constitute a continuing threat to early warning, reconnaissance and communications satellites—all critical to our security and vital to preventing nuclear war by accident or miscalculation.

The Administration's "Star Wars" defense scheme will mean more than the destruction of three solemn arms control treaties—the Limited Test Ban, the Outer Space Treaty and the Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty—that have served our security so well. It will mean that both sides will accumulate thousands more offensive weapons to overcome whatever defenses they each might devise. It promises security that is beyond our capability to provide and thus plays cruelly on the fear and the hope of every citizen. It promises a technological shield when the solution is in ourselves—in serious negotiation and mutual restraint.

It is always easy for Americans to blame the Soviet Union, and no American—no matter how much he or she desires a safer world—should lose sight of the fact that the Soviet Union does indeed bear a heavy responsibility for where we are today. But blaming the Soviet Union, which has been the single-minded indulgence of this Administration since the first day it took office, is not a strategy or a policy. It will not reshape the Russian nation; it will not bring down the Iron Curtain; and, above all, it will not reduce the nuclear threat that hangs over every American.

Anyone can assail the Soviet Union for the failure of Soviet-American relations. But we must demand more of our President, who, after all, is elected not to preside over failure but to find an acceptable solution even in the face of formidable problems. The unfortunate truth, however, is that we are now witness to more than a Presidential failure to act or an Administration's lack of policy. President Reagan and his Administration bear their own heavy measure of responsibility for the situation we face today.

No President in the nuclear age, strenghtened abroad as was Mr. Reagan by the consensus at home for a strong national defense, secure politically on the right and the left for the endeavor of arms control, has had such an opportunity to reverse the nuclear arms race. Yet this opportunity has been squandered. And all Americans hoped that when he took office his past opposition to arms control would end. Yet the record of three years has betrayed these hopes.

Despite his campaign pledge to the nation that "as President, I will immediately open negotiations on a SALT III treaty," Mr. Reagan waited more than 17 months before even beginning to talk with the Soviet Union about such an agreement. Since then, the pace of negotiation has been, to put it politely, tepid; the discussions have been punctuated by long recesses, and there have been no significant results. All that has been done is to rename SALT, to call it Start; the talks have now stalled indefinitely.

The negotiations on intermediate-range nuclear forces in Europe have collapsed completely. In the most promising initiative during those talks, the so-called "walk in the woods" proposal, our negotiator, a veteran hardliner in dealing with the Soviet Union, was repudiated by the Administration for trying too hard to reach a workable compromise that actually would have been greatly to our advantage.

Indeed, the behavior and the proposals of the Administration in both the strategic and European nuclear discussions have raised serious doubts in the minds of many about whether there ever was any intention to reach any reasonable agreement. Negotiations have been treated as a forum for propaganda, an occasion for invective, a mask to cover new deployments and an arena to gain advantage—rather than as a path to human survival on this planet. This is a most shortsighted policy, for its outcome will simply be more missiles in Soviet hands—scarcely a sensible program for America's security.

A SQUANDERED CHANCE TO REVERSE THE NUCLEAR RACE

The SALT II treaty, negotiated by three Presidents—two of them Republicans—was rejected by this Administration, with the President's own counselor saying, "We feel there is no legal or moral commitment to abide by SALT I and SALT II," international law to the contrary. Apart from the effect on the negotiating climate with the Soviet Union, this rejection means that almost 300 Soviet missiles and bombers that would have been destroyed under the terms of SALT II still are targeted on our cities and towns. What should have remained at worst an irresponsible election slogan was elevated to the level of a national policy, ushering in a new era of strategic instability.

Other actions amplify my deep concern about the course that the Administration has taken.

Despite the mounting threat of nuclear terrorism and the spread of nuclear weapons to more nations, the Administration has rejected the imperative of nuclear nonproliferation, and in fact has undercut important initiatives of previous Republican and Democratic Presidents. The goal of a comprehensive nuclear test ban—a prerequisite to effective nonproliferation and an objective of every other President since Dwight D. Eisenhower—has been summarily discarded. The President will not even discuss the control of space weapons with the Soviet Union.

The issue of verification—so central to arms control—has been blurred by the Administration. Serious problems with Soviet compliance have been submerged in irresponsive charges, innuendo and leaks. The objective, instead, should be to clarify questionable Soviet behavior and insist on compliance—not to exploit these concerns in order to further poison our relations, repudiate existing agreements, or, worse still, terminate arms control altogether.

DAY BY DAY, SINKING FURTHER INTO A MIDEAST QUAGMIRE

Additionally, even the instruments with which our Government carries on the business of arms control have been degraded. Long-time opponents of arms restraint have been put in charge of policy making. American delegations have arrived at the Geneva negotiations empty-handed, then waited weeks to receive formal negotiating instructions. Fifteen months after taking office, the Administration could not agree on an opening position to take in strategic arms talks. Three years after taking office, the Administration still does not have a policy on verification. This lack of professionalism presents a stark contrast with the precision and purpose of our adversaries—and, insignificant though it may appear to some, it speaks volumes about attitude and commitment. That is what disturbs me most of all.

It will not be easy to undo these three years of nuclear irresponsibility, or to free both nations from excessive pride, or to control new weapons while we set about the task of controlling all weapons. But we are obliged to try with every ounce of strength we can muster, lest our generation of Americans be the first to imperil the legacy of life it has been given.

I am convinced that Soviet leaders desire serious negotiations. Such negotiations will not be easy; they will involve, as they always have, a hardheaded struggle to improve the national security of both countries. Nor need they signal our approval of other Soviet actions, such as the invasion of Afghanistan or the repression in Poland. Their object, despite the irreconcilable ideologies of our two nations, is the common goal that nuclear weapons have made a necessity; the prevention of nuclear war.

I am also convinced that constructive agreements to reduce nuclear arms, to make their use less likely, are possible—even at this late date. The Limited Nuclear Test Ban of 1963, after all, came after the Cuban missile crisis and years of tension in Berlin. Both sides, however, must want an agreement. Each side must be willing to seize on what is positive in the other's proposal rather than be paralyzed by the least favorable elements presented by each. Both sides must be willing to work for an agreement that will serve our mutual advantage. This essential change in attitude alone could be the catalyst for progress.

To put it plainly, President Reagan must be ready and willing to negotiate; he must want progress even more than he wants to berate the Soviet Union.

I am convinced that we must engage ourselves now in this fundamental choice about our future—and that is why I write as the New Year begins. We must demand a new effort to prevent war, not to prepare for it. A leadership for peace can be the finest expression of America's dream. We dare not fail. We are only human beings, subject to all the mortal perils of life, all the temptations to power; but, at the same time, in our very humanity, we must seek to pass on to our children and grandchildren not fear, but hope; not an arms race, but arms control; not the death of the earth, but a better and safer world.

(W. Averell Harriman, former Ambassador to the Soviet Union and to Britain, has been an adviser to five Presidents and was chief negotiator of the 1963 Limited Test Ban Treaty.)●

TRIBUTE TO WILLIAM D. BARTH

● Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, a distinguished business leader, small business spokesman, and citizen of my State recently passed away.

William D. Barth was born in Washburn, Ill., earned a master of science in accounting at the University of Illinois, and spent his entire professional career within the State with the accounting firm of Arthur Andersen & Co. At the time of his death he resided in St. Charles, Ill., a quiet town on the Fox River.

After receiving his degree in 1948, Mr. Barth joined Arthur Andersen's Chicago office as one of the original members of its small business division. There he remained for 35 years, becoming managing director of the firm's national small business practice from 1973 to 1982, and director of legislative liaison for small business thereafter.

He guided this small business practice to a unique position among Big-Eight accounting firms, with personnel trained especially for, and assigned only to, small business engagements within their communities.

Later, in frequent visits to Washington, D.C., he brought this wealth of experience to bear in testimony before and recommendations to the tax writing and small business committees of the Senate and House, including the Senate Small Business Committee on which I have been privileged to serve.

In these capacities, he won recognition across the country for his innovative proposals for small business capital formation.

A WIDE RANGE OF EFFORTS IN BEHALF OF SMALL BUSINESS

In 1978, he introduced the small business participating debenture concept in testimony to the Senate Small Business Committee at a hearing at the American Stock Exchange. The idea became a bill as a result of the efforts of the Senator from Connecticut (Mr. WEICKER). As current chairman of our committee, Senator WEICKER was instrumental in gaining the first legislative hearing for the current version of the measure (S. 842) 3 months ago, and Bill Barth conducted the panel of private sector witnesses supporting the measure.

Bill Barth was also a leading participant in the White House Conference on Small Business in 1980, an influential member of the Small Business Committee of the American Institute of Certified Public Accountants since its founding in 1981, an appointed member of the National Advisory Council of the Small Business Administration and was coauthor of the small loan pension class exemption proposal submitted to the Department of Labor in 1983.

In his many appearances before congressional and administrative bodies in Washington, D.C., Bill Barth often represented the National Small Business Association—which he served without pay as an associate trustee—and the Small Business Legislative Council, a consortium which has now grown to 80 national trade associations with common small business interests.

This experience gave the small business community a strong and wise voice in the formulation of major tax, capital formation, and other small business legislation of the past 5 years. That good counsel will be sorely missed.

AN ENDURING COMMITMENT TO COMMUNITY, FAMILY, AND FRIENDS

No representative of the small business community was more deeply respected. In fact, the day before his death, his coworkers at the firm had nominated him for the Small Business Administration Accountant Advocate of the Year Award for 1984.

Within his town, he had been president of St. Charles Unit School Board No. 303, served on the board of the tri-city youth program, the Chicago Economic Development Corporation, the Norris Cultural Arts Commission, and the President's Council of Illinois Wesleyan University. He was an active member of the Baker Memorial United Methodist Church of St. Charles, where he participated in the church musical ensemble, playing the trumpet in the sanctuary a month before he died.

A devoted family member, he was known for his constant willingness to take time from grappling with national policy problems to help with his wife's small enterprise. Bill Barth was survived by his wife, a daughter, Karen Wolland, a son, Douglas, and three grandchildren who were bereaved of his presence only 20 months before his scheduled retirement. To them, I extend my deepest sympathy on the passing of this model citizen, who was revered not only by his family but by his neighbors, his business associates, and the small business community throughout the Nation.●

THE WHITE PASS AND YUKON RAILWAY: AN ESSENTIAL TRANSPORTATION SYSTEM FOR ALASKANS

● Mr. MURKOWSKI. Mr. President, the White Pass and Yukon Railway was built between 1898 and 1900 to meet the transportation requirements of the Klondike gold rush in the Yukon Territory. The railway system originates at Skagway in Alaska, proceeds through Alaska and British Columbia, and extends to Whitehorse, the Territorial Capital of Yukon.

Throughout this century, the White Pass and Yukon has been the principal transportation system connecting the Yukon to tidewater. The development of Yukon has depended upon reliable rail service from Skagway, and more than 55,000 passengers annually have historically traveled the scenic train route as a major Southeastern tourist attraction.

Although the railway is Canadian-owned, the great majority of its employees are Alaskans, who make their homes in Skagway. The operating personnel are predominately Alaskan, and the railway's shops are located in Skagway. A large proportion of Skagway's citizens are third or fourth-generation railroad employees. The community depends upon the continued viability of the White Pass and Yukon Railway, just as the railway company depends upon the people of the community to meet its manpower requirements.

Mr. President, when worldwide demand for ore concentrate declined sharply in the recent recession, the Cyprus Anvil Mining Corp. temporarily closed its open pit lead, zinc and silver mine at Faro, Yukon Territory. Because the mine—Canada's largest and one of the world's largest—was the dominant shipper on the White Pass and Yukon, the railroad was forced to suspend service with the closing of the mine in June 1982. The great majority of Skagway's work force has been unemployed since then.

As noted by my colleague, Senator TED STEVENS, the Canadian Transport Commission (CTC) on December 15, 1983, issued an exhaustive draft report on the transportation requirements of Yukon. In that report, CTC concluded that the railway remains the best transportation system to insure the future development of the territory. Unfortunately, the CAMC has announced its preference for trucking, as an alternative to rail transportation, when the mine reopens, probably this fall.

Mr. President, if CAMC converts to trucking, the railroad will probably be abandoned in Canada under controlling Canadian transport law. The CTC report notes that rail rates must be compensatory under Canadian precedents—and without CAMC traffic, rail rates for other traffic would be prohibitive. If the railroad is abandoned, it is doubtful that Skagway will survive on tourism alone, particularly with the loss of the principal attraction, White Pass and Yukon's passenger service into Yukon and British Columbia.

Mr. President, there are two roads capable of accommodating truck traffic from the mine at Faro to tidewater ports. One terminates at Skagway, the other at Haines. It is simply not practical for Alaska to permit the ore concentrate to be hauled to tidewater over either of these roads.

The CTC draft report makes clear that either road will require upgrading and massively increased maintenance if heavy trucks operate around the clock, 7 days per week, on a year-round basis. U.S. Federal and Alaska State taxpayers would be required to upgrade and maintain the highways selected for transport, but there would be no significant job opportunities to replace those rail jobs lost in Skagway. The CTC report notes that the great majority of jobs would go to Canadians under CAMC's trucking option.

If trucking operations are commenced, U.S. Federal taxpayers apparently will be required to absorb the cost of maintaining customs facilities around the clock, every day throughout the year. Both United States and Alaska State taxpayers will be required to bear the social costs of long-term unemployment in Skagway. These are unacceptable burdens—and there is no reason to expect Alaskans to bear them to accommodate CAMC's trucking option.

As things now stand, CAMC cannot initiate trucking operations for hauling ore concentrate without substantial changes in Alaska laws and highway maintenance procedures. It is naive for CAMC to expect Alaska to absorb these enormous costs in order to accommodate one private-sector shipper whose conduct will insure the demise of a historic Alaska community.

Mr. President, I would urge CAMC to review carefully the recommendations of the CTC, and to negotiate with the railway company in good faith. The White Pass and Yukon management is reported by CTC to be willing to accept break-even rates to restore rail service between Skagway and Whitehorse. This is a $4 million annual concession by the railroad, assuming that such rates can be agreed upon by rail management and CAMC.

There simply is no transportation alternative for CAMC. Either CAMC will rely upon the historic rail service to provide its transportation needs, as it has done in past years, or there will be no transportation of CAMC ore concentrate from Faro to Alaska tidewater ports. The trucking option, for Alaskans, is intolerable.●

THE 120TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE ORDER KNIGHTS OF PYTHIAS

● Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, Gov. Bob Graham of Florida has proclaimed February 19, 1984, as the Order Knights of Pythias Day in Florida, commemorating the 120th anniversary of this organization's existence. I shall submit the proclamation for the RECORD.

Today, I would also like to honor the Order Knights of Pythias' 120th anniversary by describing this fraternal order and its many charitable contributions. First, however, I think a little history is needed.

The name of this society is taken from the story of Damon and Pythias who lived in Syracuse during the fourth century, B.C. Pythias was condemned to death by Dionysius, tyrant of Syracuse, but was allowed to go home to see his wife and children because Damon offered himself as security. When Pythias did not return, Damon held true to his promise and was led to the place of execution. Suddenly, Pythias rushed forward, embracing his friend. Dionysius was so moved by this display that he released both men and asked if he could participate in their friendship. This story not only gives the Order Knights of Pythias its name but vividly illustrates the goals and ideals to which they are committed.

Founded by Justus Rathbone on February 19, 1864, right here in Washington, D.C., the Order Knights of Pythias was established to help heal the hatreds caused by the Civil War. Basing its ritual on the story of Damon and Pythias, the society embraces the cardinal principles of friendship, charity, and benevolence. In fact, the Pythian motto is "Be Generous, Brave and True." The Order Knights of Pythias was incorporated by Congress on August 5, 1870, the first fraternal order to be federally chartered.

The order is international, with a membership of almost 120,000 in the United States, Canada, and Israel. There are over 2,000 subordinate lodges under jurisdiction of 55 grand lodges at the State level, all of which are supervised by a supreme lodge. The Dramatic Order Knights of Khorassan is associated with the Order Knights of Pythias as well as the women's auxiliary, the Supreme Temple Order Pythian Sisters. Membership is also available for the children of Pythians through the Sunshine Girls, the Junior Order Knights of Pythias, and the Junior Order Princes of Syracuse. Some of the most famous Pythians include Presidents William McKinley, Warren G. Harding, and Franklin D. Roosevelt.

The Order Knights of Pythias is distinguished by its commitment to altruistic principles. There are so many good works done by the members of this society that I could not possibly name them all. I will, however, highlight some of the most notable of their philanthropic activities.

The order supports the Cystic Fibrosis Foundation, provides financial assistance to worthy Pythians in distress, and gives aid to victims of disasters. This group operates homes for aged and infirm members and their families and sends under-privileged children to camp in the summer. The promotion of highway safety, the organization of blood banks and the offering of scholarships for winners of public speaking contests are also among the organization's many activities, not to mention hospitalization and care of the needy. The Dramatic Order Knights of Khorassan are involved in humanitarian ventures and the Supreme Temple Order Pythian Sisters donate to projects for heart, cancer, and kidney patients. These charitable contributions of time and money certainly attest to the order's belief that selfless devotion to others is the responsibility of all mankind.

The order's example of charity and benevolence is one we all need to follow. Just as friendship saved the lives of Damon and Pythias so many years ago, our friendship and generosity to others can and must make a difference. Helping others is the highest ideal to which we can aspire and I want to commend the Order Knights of Pythias for 120 years of service to this Nation and to the world.

The proclamation follows:

PROCLAMATION

Whereas, the Order Knights of Pythias was founded in the City of Washington, D.C., on February 19, 1864, by Justus H. Rathbone; and

Whereas, its purpose during the Civil War was to heal and allay the hatreds caused by the conflict raging; and

Whereas, on August 5, 1870, the Order was incorporated by an Act of Congress and was the first fraternal order to be so chartered; and

Whereas, the cardinal principles of the Order Knights of Pythias are friendship, charity and benevolence, and members of the Order are duty bound to disseminate these concepts, which appeal to men of all walks of life; and

Whereas, the Order is international, with membership in the United States, Canada and Israel; and

Whereas, the altruistic endeavors of the Order Knights of Pythias are manifold, and members take pride in their accomplishments—sponsoring homes for the aged, sending underprivileged children to vacation camps, supporting facilities for higher education, and making contributions to hospitals and foundations;

Now, therefore, I, Bob Graham, by virtue of the authority vested in me as Governor of the State of Florida, do hereby proclaim February 19, 1984, as "Knights of Pythias Day" in Florida.●

ACCOMPLISHMENTS OF DR. ALBERT A. BUCAR

● Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, on June 20, 1984, Dr. Albert A. Bucar of my State will be installed as president of the American Optometric Association. Dr. Bucar is a long-time resident of Illinois, and we all join his family, friends, and associates in honoring him for this distinctive accomplishment. The entire State of Illinois has reason to be proud. Dr. Bucar's achievements reflect a professional dedication to optometry and a personal commitment to charity and humanity.

Albert A. Bucar received B.S. and O.D. degrees from the Illinois College of Optometry. Since college his involvement in the field of optometry has consistently increased. His past membership in the American Optometric Association is characterized by utter devotion to this organization. Dr. Bucar has served as a member and secretary-treasurer of the AOA Board of Trustees, vice president of the AOA, chairman of the AOA Public Health and Optometric Care Committee, chariman of the AOA project team on data collection and, finally, a fellow of the American Academy of Optometry. He has held numerous memberships and trusteeships in organizations ranging from the U.S. Public Health Service to the National Institute of Health.

Albert A. Bucar is an asset of unlimited proportions to his State and community. As president of the Illinois Optometric Association, his valued leadership has insured the highest professional standards in his field. Dr. Bucar's work at the local level demonstrates a dedication to the highest of community standards. He is a noted member of assorted boards and committees in Lake County. He is president of the St. Peter's Grade School Board of Education, a member of the Antioch Community High School Board of Education, president of the Antioch Lions Club, and chairman of the local Cub Scout Pack 900.

It is an honor and a privilege to mark the occasion of Dr. Albert A. Bucar's selection as president of the American Optometric Association with a tribute to his countless personal achievements which benefit immensely both community and Nation. The optometric profession is certainly a finer one because of this dedicated individual.●

THE MILL HOUSE

● Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I rise to pay tribute to the Mill House, the oldest residence built by a Jewish family in the New World, and one of the oldest continuously occupied dwellings in the United States.

The Mill House is located on the Hudson River, just north of Newburgh, N.Y. It was built in 1714 by Louis Moses Gomez who migrated from England to New York around 1700. The House was erected to serve a dual purpose—home to Gomez and his sons, and as a post to trade furs and other goods with European settlers and Indians.

During the mid-1700's, the Mill House was occupied by the Revolutionary War patriot, Wolfert Acker. It was a meeting place for patriots during our war of independence. After the war, Acker took advantage of the House's strategic location to operate a packet line to New York City. He also added a second story to the original structure of the House, and so it stands today.

During the 1800's, the Mill House continued to prosper. Noted writer and gentleman farmer William Henry Armstrong lived there for 50 years. Craftsman Dard Hunter was among the Mill House's prominent 20th-century occupants. Shortly before World War I, Hunter converted the old grist mill into a lucrative paper mill.

The Mill House was inscribed in the National Registry of Historic Places in 1973. In 1979, the Gomez Foundation for Mill House was established. The foundation's purpose is to raise funds to purchase the property, preserve it intact, and to create a museum of the heritage of Jewish settlement in America. Once these goals are achieved, the Mill House will serve as a place of study and research, a library, a conference center, and a display site for photographs, documents, household articles, and related artifacts belonging to past occupants. Such a facility will be of great educational and historical value to all of us who share an acute interest in the religious, ethnic, and racial heritages of this great Nation.

Mr. President, 1984 represents the 270th year of the Mill House's existence. It is a most appropriate place to memorialize the origins of Jewish settlement in this country. I ask you and my distinguished colleagues to join me in paying tribute to the founder and early occupants of Mill House, and those dedicated to the cause of preserving this vital part of America's rich history.●

NATIONAL SECURITY IS AFFECTED BY THE EXPORT ADMINISTRATION ACT

● Mr. GARN. Mr. President, the Senate will soon take up S. 979, a bill to revise and renew the Export Administration Act of 1979. As my colleagues prepare for that consideration, I would draw their attention to an excellent analysis of the issues surrounding this consideration, contained in a recent backgrounder written by Bruce Weinrod and Juliana Pilon of the Heritage Foundation. This is a very thoughtful piece that points out clearly that the question involved in this debate is one of national security, necessitating a very careful approach by the Congress. I ask that the text of the study be printed in the RECORD.

STAUNCHING THE TECHNOLOGY FLOW TO MOSCOW

(By Bruce Weinrod and Juliana Pilon)

INTRODUCTION

In recent years, Soviet bloc countries have been obtaining significant quantities of Western technology that strengthen Soviet military capabilities. An effective Export Administration Act (EAA) is an essential element of the remedy to this problem. At the heart of the current congressional debate over amendments to the Act are two issues: (1) whether the U.S. government will have the authority to act promptly and effectively to prevent the transfer of militarily relevant technology to the Soviet bloc; and (2) whether the President will be able to impose economic sanctions in support of the conduct of foreign policy.[1]

Ideally, the free flow of goods and technology should not be restricted by the state. However, a hostile Soviet Union and its allies pose a threat to the free world. The recent downing of a Korean Airlines passenger jet highlights both the nature of the Soviet challenge as well as the need for a President to have nuanced tools at his command for responding to such incidents. Therefore, the United States must consider the national security and foreign policy impact of its international economic transactions. The Soviet Union consistently has sought to obtain militarily relevant Western technology by every means possible. Its success has contributed to shifting the military balance away from the West. As a result of mistaken licensing, weak enforcement, and illegal Soviet bloc activities, the West has suffered a virtual hemorrhage of technology in the past decade.[2]

To prevent this from continuing, national security export controls should be strengthened: (1) an Office of Strategic Trade should be established; (2) enforcement of the export control laws should be turned over to the Customs Service, which has the needed expertise; (3) licensing laws must be toughened; (4) technology diversion from other Western nations must be reduced via tighter oversight of the transfer of advanced U.S. technology to Western nations; (5) U.S. authority to act against companies outside the U.S. that violate export restrictions must be maintained; (6) foreign availability of items under consideration for transfer must be judged by strict standards; (7) the President's ability to restrict imports as well as exports must be established and maintained in order to place more pressure on potential foreign violators of U.S. export controls.

Further, presidential authority to implement foreign policy export controls must be maintained. Such controls should not be imposed frivolously, but, properly implemented, they would be effective instruments of U.S. foreign policy.

BACKGROUND

Prior to World War II, U.S. export controls were instituted on an ad hoc basis against specified nations. As the Soviet threat emerged after World War II, the U.S. took multilateral and unilateral steps to control exports for security reasons: multilaterally, the U.S. in 1949 joined with Western European nations to coordinate export controls through the Coordination Committee (COCOM);[3] unilaterally, the Export Control Act of 1949 gave the President substantial powers to restrict or prohibit trade with Communist bloc nations.

During the 1970s, influenced by détente, the statutes and their administration were relaxed to encourage greater trade with the Soviet bloc. Current export policy, with respect to foreign policy and security aspects, is governed by the Export Administration Act (EAA) of 1979,[4] which provides the following:

The President is delegated authority to control U.S. exports.

Two types of controls—national security and foreign policy—are established.[5]

Under national security controls, the President is authorized to restrict the export of "dual-use" goods and technology, i.e. non-military items which would make a significant contribution to the military potential of any country whose strengthening would prove detrimental to the security of the U.S.

Under foreign policy controls, the President can restrict exports where necessary to further significantly the foreign policy of the U.S. or to fulfill its declared international obligations.

Under both types of controls, extraterritorial jurisdiction can be asserted: that is, exports by foreign subsidiaries of U.S. companies of items not made in the U.S. can be restricted, as can the reexport of items to Western nations by non-U.S. companies under contract or license to U.S. companies.

Under both types of control, the question of whether the goods or technology involved is available from other countries is a relevant factor, but can be overridden by other considerations.

Fulfillment of preexisting export contracts can be blocked.

NATIONAL SECURITY CONTROLS

National security controls are the most important element of the EAA.[6] Soviet efforts, via legal and illegal means, to obtain Western technology and the beneficial use that the Soviet bloc has made of this technology are well-documented. Over the past decade, the Soviets have applied Western technology to make advances in signal processing, command and control systems, semiconductor manufacturing, guidance technology and many other areas. While no controls can be totally leakproof, much more can be done to prevent Soviet bloc acquisition of key products and technology. Ideally, a separate agency should be created with responsibility for national security controls.[7] Second best would be the rationalizing and strengthening of existing licensing and enforcement mechanisms, along with the creation of the post of Under Secretary of Commerce for Export Policy and an Office of International Strategic Trade Administration.[8] A third alternative would be to establish a White House office for export control matters to coordinate all U.S. agency policies.[9]

National security controls are now managed by the Department of Commerce. Yet there is an inherent institutional conflict between the priority duty of Commerce to promote U.S. exports and its role as licenser and enforcer of export restraints. The Department's generally poor record on national security controls is a result of this flaw.

A new independent agency, with the sole priority responsibility of dealing with export control issues, would result in deserved attention to the security aspects of export policy. It would assure a high-level advocate within the Executive Branch to present a security perspective on export issues and to provide independent information and analyses to Congress.[10]

STRENGTHENING ENFORCEMENT MEASURES

Creating the new agency will take time. Meanwhile, existing institutions must be strengthened. The Office of Export Administration, charged with enforcement responsibility, has not performed effectively. While Commerce has made extraordinary progress in the past two years in remedying past weaknesses, the institutional arguments for shifting criminal enforcement responsibility out of Commerce to the U.S. Treasury Department's Customs are strong. The inherent tension between Commerce's role as a promoter of exports and its role as enforcer of export controls means an almost inevitable tendency to ease up on activities which upset the business community; and Customs has the enforcement experience to do an effective job.

In addition to giving priority criminal enforcement authority to Customs, the possession of restricted goods with intent to export them should be criminalized; sentences and fines for illegal diversion should be increased; court authorized surveillance should be expressly permitted when there is probable cause that a violation of technology laws is being committed; the controlled commodities list should be revised; negotiations should be opened with U.S. allies for the prosecution or extradition of those believed to have violated American export laws; and it should be a federal offense to steal, receive, buy or bribe to obtain technology with the intent to export it unlawfully.[11] At the same time, civil penalities should be maintained. In addition, the President should have the authority to restrict the transfer of items to U.S. diplomatic offices and other entities which are under the controls of countries to which export controls have been applied.

Another area of concern is technological research. Scholarly conferences and exchanges are tempting targets for the Soviets. The CIA has concluded that over one-third of Soviet scientific proposals made under joint exchange program auspices would have had negative security implications had they been approved. While scholarly contacts should be respected, controls, where necessary, should be applied, including: (1) classifying information; (2) restricting communication of technical data to foreign nationals; (3) requiring prepublication review by the Defense Department for key government financed research; (4) establishing voluntary agreements to limit flows of technical data; and (5) limiting access to the U.S. for certain foreign nationals. More attention also should be given to industrial research and all Western nations should expel immediately diplomats who engage in industrial spying. Finally, the Administration and Congress must consider how to assure that technology transfers via the sale of a U.S. company to a foreign corporation do not damage U.S. security.

Improved licensing process

In the mid-1970s, Congress authorized development of a list of Militarily Critical Technologies (MCTL) to identify items to be restricted for national security reasons.[12] Unfortunately, the list is not now fully useful. Priority should be given to completing this task, as well as to the monitoring of newly developing technologies. Monitoring new technologies (perhaps by a high-level joint government-industry committee) would reveal emerging security problems at an early stage and thus give manufacturers warning of likely export controls.

Also warranting more attention are Soviet technology needs. At little cost, the U.S. can maintain an accurate, timely list of the technologies that the Soviets are likely to seek. The Soviets probably will deploy over 200 weapons systems in the next decade; by analyzing the technology needed for such systems as missile guidance, computer-aided aircraft designs, and submarine and airborne navigation, the U.S. can prevent or limit Soviet breakthroughs by blocking technology transfers in these areas.

Above and beyond procedure, strict U.S. licensing is crucial, both because U.S. technology is still the most advanced and because U.S. policy sets the standard for the West. Furthermore, technology obsolete by Western standards may be state of the art to the Soviet bloc and capable of helping its military capabilities significantly. A Department of Defense veto under national security control authority of sales of oil and gas exploration equipment would be consistent with a policy of strict standards.

One suggested licensing reform should be rejected: that an item unilaterally controlled by the U.S. (i.e. not on the COCOM list or subject to bilateral control agreement) should be totally decontrolled (for the particular country group and the particular item) after one year if, after an exception to the control is made, no other license applications are received or none are disapproved. The automatic lifting of controls without regard to military considerations would be harmful to U.S. security.

Other measures

Consideration must also be given to how the U.S. can deal with new small-sized technologies, such as microchips, as well as computer tapes, which are difficult to detect when smuggled out of the U.S. or are widely available to the public. For example, Radio Shack offers computing systems with semiconductor components that are more sophisticated than most of those used in U.S. defense systems. A policy that would automatically exempt all embedded microprocessors from controls would not be consistent with U.S. national security interests.

The business community can participate in the national security export control process. It can help determine the items to be restricted and can assist with enforcement, including counterespionage efforts. The object of controls is not to penalize the private sector but to enhance Western security. The private sector could join the government in establishing a center for technical expertise, which would be on the cutting edge of anticipating potential military applications of emerging technologies.

RELATIONSHIP OF U.S. AND OTHER WESTERN EXPORT POLICIES

In the early postwar years, the effective implementation of U.S. export restrictions was assured by U.S. economic and technological dominance. But how the export policies of other non-Communist nations also must be considered in crafting a national security export control policy. This raises some important questions. Should the U.S. control items available from other sources? Should the U.S. control items exported to friendly nations? Are unilateral controls on COCOM designated items necessary? Is the unilateral asseration of extraterritorial jurisdiction good policy?

Some supporters of looser national security controls make what is known as the "foreign availability" argument. If a particular product of technology is available from a foreign source, they argue, U.S. controls are useless and should not be authorized. Yet even if an item were available elsewhere, it would not necessarily make sense for the U.S. to export that item. The United States is the political and moral leader of the free world, and, choosing the circumstances wisely, occasionally must set an example in order to have effective leverage.

There are difficult questions of judgment and evaluation regarding "foreign availability." It requires subjective evaluations of such matters as comparability (is the non-U.S. item really the same, or is it only similar); quantity (can the non-U.S. producer supply quantities, or resupply, especially in a relatively short time, and is the quantity sufficient to be militarily significant); quality (is the item likely to last as long or be as efficient); price (Soviet bloc hard currency problems make this relevant); and maintenance.

In the determination of foreign availability, the burden of proof should be on those seeking an export license. The U.S. government should not have the task of proving that there is not foreign availability. The Department of Defense, moreover, should be involved in evaluating the foreign availability question. Some critics have suggested loosening the controls even further by requiring that national security controls be lifted if the President cannot persuade other nations, within six months, which item in question to stop exporting. This would undercut U.S. leverage completely, as the government in question would know that, if it held out six months, it would no longer be subject to U.S. pressure to restrict the item.

WEST-WEST CONTROLS

Many advocates of relaxed export controls suggest that restrictions on U.S. exports to non-Communist nations, or at least to fellow COCOM nations, be eliminated or substantially reduced. This should be a long-term policy goal; now it would create national security problems and would send mixed signals at a time when the U.S. is urging stricter controls by others.

The Soviets acquire much of their technology via illegal diversions from Western nations. Illegal critical technology exports totaled around $1.6 billion in 1980, primarily because non-Communist nations in general had not taken export restrictions for national security as seriously as they should. The U.S. initiated "detente" policy of the 1970s persuaded many Western nations that they need not take the Soviet threat seriously; and exports play a substantial role in the economies of many of these nations.

There are indications, however, that COCOM nations, at the urging of the U.S., are beginning to take more seriously their role as guardians of Western militarily related technology. For example, Japan recently expelled a Soviet diplomat (for the first time since World War II) on charges of technology espionage and is now taking steps to tighten its controls. On July 22, 1983, Britain announced tighter controls on militarily useful technology. By keeping West-West controls tight, the U.S. can be more effective in assuring that the COCOM nations take their obligations seriously. Further, some discretionary authority must remain with the President to block sensitive exports that the U.S. may not want to share even with its allies; and maintenance of West-West controls allows the U.S. to monitor the flow of paper that discovers illegal diversions of U.S. technology. U.S. policy must clarify the right of the Pentagon to review critical exports so that it can play a greater role in blocking potential diversion of items to the Soviet bloc. At the same time, the Pentagon must be sensitive to Allied needs for U.S. technology for military purposes while working with U.S. allies to safeguard its utilization.

Western neutral nations which are major recipients of U.S. technology (Switzerland, Austria, Sweden, and Finland) account for much of the technology illegally diverted to the Soviet bloc. The credible threat that certain goods or technologies might not be exported to these nations is necessary to assure that this pattern will be changed. In late 1982, high U.S. officials stated that the leakage of Western technology from Austria had to stop; they subsequently held up approval of U.S. construction of a much wanted semiconductor plant in Austria. As a result, the Austrian government agreed to tighten its controls; Switzerland recently levied very heavy fines on companies that illegally diverted items to the East.

COCOM[13]

Although its effectiveness has been limited, COCOM, or some equivalent body, remains essential to preventing the hemorrhage of vital technology. COCOM's past weaknesses can be attributed to: (1) U.S. failure, especially during the 1970s, to give COCOM suitable priority; (2) the example set by the U.S. itself during the 1970s, when its own national security export control mechanism deteriorated and when it applied for the single largest number of COCOM exceptions; and (3) the absence of formal leverage to assure full implementation by participating governments of decisions made at COCOM.

COCOM needs common standards for evaluating licenses, and consideration should be given to ways of modifying COCOM's rule of unanimity, so that one nation can no longer block the addition of an item to the COCOM proscribed list. At the same time, unanimity should be maintained for taking an item off the list. Multilateral policing and common sanctions against COCOM regulation violators should be considered, and the defense ministries of allied nations should be more involved in COCOM decisions. There should be no exceptions allowed for commercial reasons.

At a minimum, the COCOM structure must be strengthened. The full-time staff has consisted of only ten to fifteen persons, in a makeshift office. Ministerial-level COCOM meetings, which had not been held for two and a half decades until recently, should be held on a regular basis. Regular follow-ups to the current NATO study on technology should be instituted. An international industry-government panel, though unwieldy, might be useful to gain consensus on emerging technologies whose export should be restricted by COCOM.

It is argued by some advocates of looser national security controls that unilateral U.S. controls and procedures can be weakened because the same items will be on the COCOM lists and, thus, will be controlled by the U.S. in conformity with a COCOM mandate in any event. The trouble is that a single COCOM member can still block a consensus for restricting a particular item. Without the threat and leverage of possible unilateral U.S. sanctions, some other Western nations might ignore or, at least, not enforce the controls. While other nations are indeed gaining on the U.S. in technological areas, the U.S. still has the leadership in a variety of goods, production processes and technologies that are of great benefit to the private sectors of other countries. This could provide leverage to obtain a strong Western commitment to COCOM. Weakening U.S. standards first places the cart before the horse.

U.S. ASSERTION OF EXTRATERRITORIAL JURISDICTION

Current law gives the President authority to impose so-called extraterritorial controls when he feels that they are necessary. Such controls are of two types: restrictions on exports of non-U.S. made items by U.S. subsidiaries located abroad and controls on the reexport by non-U.S. companies located overseas of items originally exported from the U.S. Such controls should be used sparingly, but they are essential not only to effective export controls but to the effective enforcement of U.S. antiterrorism and antiboycott laws. Further, the absence of such controls would be an incentive for U.S. businesses to move overseas.

It is unfortunately true that assertion of extraterritorial jurisdiction occasionally may increase political tensions with U.S. allies. Certainly, allied reaction should be heavily weighed, but it cannot be a determining factor when important U.S. national security or foreign interests are at issue.[14] Those who argued that the pipeline sanctions would have a severe long-lasting impact upon U.S.-European relations were wrong. Recently, France's Defense Minister Charles Hernu stated that the disagreement "did not leave any scars" and "we do not even speak of it". And in their June 1983 communique, NATO foreign ministers agreed that "economic relations with [the Soviet bloc] must remain consistent with broad allied security concerns."

With respect to reexport controls, the EAA permits the President to require that a foreign company obtain a reexport license to export a specified U.S. origin item to another country. This means that the company has to receive approval from both its government and the U.S. This provision should remain in force until U.S. allies more consistently take into account U.S. security concerns. Extraterritoriality is a means to an end. If and when other nations have secure safeguards and tough standards regarding technology diversion, there will be no real need for such action.

A new extraterritorial issue has developed with the suggestion that authority to impose import controls be added to current presidential powers. This is a significant and potentially useful addition to U.S. national security export control laws and should be incorporated in the EAA. Specifically, the President should have option of prohibiting imports from an overseas subsidiary of a U.S. company that violates the law by reexporting U.S. items and from a non-U.S. company outside the U.S. that violates U.S. or COCOM restrictions. Appropriate monitoring and enforcement mechanisms will also be needed. Given that the U.S. is the world's largest market, such a potential sanction should prove very effective.

FOREIGN POLICY CONTROLS

Foreign policy export controls, while not as directly related to the militarty security of the U.S. as national security controls, are nonetheless an important tool for the President. Export controls (aside from setting a moral example), as Undersecretary of Commerce Lionel Olmer has suggested, can deter future actions; mobilize international support against certain behavior; impose economic cost on the targeted nation; and expresses disapproval of another nation's policies. Further, the President must have the ability to conduct policy through a variety of means.

The Soviet pipeline sanctions, for example (1) delayed the construction of the Siberian pipeline; (2) compelled the USSR to allocate scarce resources between priority domestic projects and the export pipeline; (3) gave the Europeans an opportunity to assess alternative energy supply options in view of the soft petroleum and gas market and possibly prevent further reliance on Soviet gas; (4) gained European cooperation for a more coordinated approach toward East-West trade. Europeans are now more cooperative on a coordinated economic policy toward the Soviet bloc because, not in spite of, the sanctions.

Under current law, the President must "consider" six criteria in deciding whether to authorize foreign policy controls. A suggestion has been made that the President must "determine" that all six tests have in fact been met. Such a requirement is inadvisable. The President would have no discretion concerning, or ability to weigh, competing factors. In any event, the distinction between foreign policy and national security is a fine one, and undue restrictions on foreign policy controls will merely encourage a President to use a national security justification.

Contract sanctity

Some critics argue that export controls should not be applied to contracts already in effect. The abrogation of existing contracts can be unfair, but is justifiable, if important national security or foreign policy interests of the U.S. are served. Not maintaining this authority would mean that the President would be powerless to act promptly and effectively should it be discovered that a particular item's export would be damaging to Western security or would be shipped to a country which has openly aided a heinous terrorist act. Thus, an exception to contract sanctity for significant problems such as terrorism is the minimum that should be provided.

Private sector concerns can be accommodated in two ways. First, it can be stipulated that short-term contracts, below a certain volume or dollar amount, could be carried out unless the President determines that extraordinary circumstances dictate otherwise. Second, businesses, which have made expenditures with respect to a contract that cannot be carried out or is abrogated should be allowed to recover their expenses by means of tax deductions; alternatively, insurance systems could be established for such contingencies. U.S. allies could take similar action. Certainly, companies should always be put on notice that contract suspension is a possibility in certain situations.

Advocates of total contract sanctity for foreign policy controls suggest that the President could use new authority expanding the scope of the International Economic Powers Act to achieve the desired result of voiding existing contracts. While this would be better than nothing, it would expand needlessly the meaning of "emergency" beyond what it properly should be, and could raise serious legal questions.

CONCLUSION

National security export controls are an important means of protecting U.S. interests. Some argue that crucial items will reach the Soviet bloc eventually anyway and that, therefore, tight controls are not warranted or useful. This ignores the principal benefit of controls, which is that they delay the absorption of new militarily relevant technology by the Soviet bloc. In the past, there was an eight- to ten-year technology acquisition gap from West to East, but that has already been reduced substantially, and in some instances the Soviet bloc is applying Western dual-use technology for militar purposes even before the West does.[15] Given the Soviet bloc conventional advantage in Europe and the increasing Western emphasis on new technologies to counterbalance the large Soviet quantitative advantage, controls are even more necessary than heretofore. Further, each Soviet bloc technological breakthrough results in huge added costs to NATO nations for countermeasures.

On the broadest plane, both national security and foreign policy controls must be seen within the context of the overall East-West struggle. The looser export controls of the detente era did not, as predicted by its formulators, result in more responsible Soviet behavior; instead, security related exports were use to build up the Soviet bloc's military capability, and other trade was used to escape the consequences of disastrous economic policies.

Given current Soviet conduct, it should be the policy of the U.S. (and a consensus of Western nations) to restrict dual-use goods or technology and to give the President the option to limit trade for foreign policy reasons, such as the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan or the imposition of martial law by the Polish government.

Economic matters are an increasingly important aspect of overall relations among nations. The export policies of the United States therefore cannot be considered solely in the context of ordinary business concerns, important though they may be.[16] The context must be broadened to include U.S. security and Soviet behavior. Under present conditions, the correct policy is to err, if at all, on the side of protecting Western security and granting the President foreign policy authority and flexibility.

[16] Private sector concerns should be accommodated to the extent consistent with security and foreign policy requirements. But it is also true that export controls affect a relatively small percentage of U.S. exports (foreign policy controls affected less than one percent of the $140 billion in U.S. manufactures exported in 1982), and are applied infrequently.●

U.S. POLICY IN LEBANON

● Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, Winston Churchill's description of Soviet Russia in the 1930's could be applied to U.S. policy in Lebanon today: It is "a riddle, wrapped in a mystery, inside an enigma." Even those of us on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee have more questions than we have answers about where we are headed and why.

The initial reaction to the President's February 7 announcement was almost uniformly one of relief at the planned withdrawal of U.S. Marines from their dangerously exposed positions near the Beirut airport. Now we are learning that that withdrawal will not begin for a while and may never be total. Now it is obvious that the administration plans to enlarge the role of naval air attacks and gunfire while removing the Marines.

These appear to be conflicting signals to our friends and adversaries, an altogether too frequent attribute of U.S. policy in the Middle East. As John M. Goshko and Fred Hiatt write in this morning's Washington Post:

However, there was still confusion about whether the switch in tactics ordered by Reagan Tuesday is a face-saving cover for an impending U.S. disengagement from Lebanon or a genuine effort to help the militarily embattled Gemayel government to survive the onslaught of Syrian-backed dissident militias.

Mr. President, I have learned in recent years to believe Ronald Reagan. He usually says just what he means. And in this case, I am driven to the conclusion that he is not changing U.S. policy in Lebanon.

Deputy White House press secretary Larry Speakes made this point yesterday. He said, "The mission remains. The goals remain. We are looking for more effective ways to do it." And speaking of the Marines, he said, "We don't consider this a withdrawal but more of a redeployment."

Secretary of State Shultz also stressed that the marines would remain in place until their redeployment could be done consistent with carrying out broader U.S. goals in Lebanon. He told a news conference in Barbados:

There is no physical reason why the marines could not move quickly. The President has asked the Secretary of Defense to provide a schedule for how the redeployment should be carried out so we can maintain the effectiveness of the various missions we're trying to fulfill.

White House handling of the President's announcement contributed to the confusion. By releasing the statement late in the day, without full briefings of the key congressional committees and without even a text for study, the administration guaranteed diverse interpretations of its actions and intentions. If the White House advanced its release because of premature leaks, as some press reports claim, that may also have made the situation worse, for it surprised our multinational force partners as well as the Congress.

Now that we have had some briefings and can study the President's announcement, it is clear to me that our tactics have changed, but not our basic policy. The administration still wants the Gemayel government to unify Lebanon and is willing to use U.S. naval firepower in support of that regime. It is prepared to keep marines in Lebanon for the foreseeable future, in one form or another, until its original objectives have been attained. It is unwilling to admit that its policy has failed, that the circumstances under which Congress authorized an 18-month troop commitment have changed utterly, or that the costs and risks of trying to maintain that policy have increased dramatically.

In fact, our marines are in greater peril because we have launched preemptive, not just retaliatory, strikes against anti-Gemayel forces while leaving our troops in known, fixed positions. They are "lame ducks" now, as well as "sitting ducks."

We still do not have a plan to bring about peace, only a hope that the beleaguered minority government of President Gemayel can somehow reunite the disintegrating army, form a coalition among factions which have been fighting each other for centuries, and force the Syrians to withdraw. We still do not have the military force to achieve these objectives, even assuming them to be attainable.

America's national interests require a change of course, beginning not ending with the prompt and orderly withdrawal of our marines. We must be realistic, not naive, about the situation in Lebanon. And we need a clarity of long-run purpose, not the confusion of ad hoc reactions, buttressed by a well-coordinated plan to protect our vital interests.

Mr. President, perhaps the most cogent analysis of our policy in Lebanon was given by former Secretary of Defense James Schlesinger in recent testimony before the Foreign Relations Committee. I ask that his statement, and the President's February 7 announcement, be printed in the RECORD.

The material follows:

STATEMENT OF JAMES R. SCHLESINGER BEFORE THE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS, JANUARY 11, 1984

Mr. Chairman, Members of the Committee, it is an honor and a special responsibility for me to appear today before this Committee to examine the perplexities of American Middle Eastern Policy. The focus must, of course, be on Lebanon and the onshore American Marine deployment. Yet, we must bear in mind, that nothing in the Middle East can be treated in isolation. The problem of Lebanon intersects with other significant Middle Eastern issues: the Arab-Israeli conflict, the inter-Arab relationships, the Shiite awakening, and even (through the Iranian involvement) the stability of the Persian Gulf.

It is essential therefore to consider these potentially wider ramifications of our Lebanese policy. If we fail to do so, we may ultimately impose upon ourselves political costs on which we have not reckoned.

In this connection, it seems appropriate to recall the earlier dispatch of Marines to Lebanon by President Eisenhower in 1958. At that time, in addition to the internal turmoil within Lebanon, there had been the prior overthrow of the Iraqi monarchy (and the murder of the King and Prime Minister), the fears regarding Soviet penetration, and the simultaneous insertion of British forces into Jordan to stabilize that country. Eisenhower dispatched a substantial force, capable of dealing not only with internal resistance but also with the uncertainties pertaining to the region as a whole. A full Marine division went in over the beaches. There was no resistence. Indeed, the Marines were met by vendors selling ice cream and souvenirs.

Recent policy has, in effect, stood Eisenhower on his head. Rather than a massive deployment to deal with token resistance, we have had a token deployment to deal with massive resistance.

This earlier experience with a deployment sufficiently large to deal not only with the immediate problem but also with unforeseen contingencies may serve as a cautionary tale, as we examine the perplexities of our current policies. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that these perplexities may best and most briefly be examined under four headings: (1) the transformation of the mission, (2) the present situation of the Marines, (3) requirements for consistent policy and (4) other considerations and potential costs.

1. The Transformation of the Mission. The second dispatch of the Marines in September, 1982, after the massacres in the two refugee camps, at first blush embodied a mission reasonably clear, though not necessarily sustainable. This experience indicates, I believe, the riskiness of force deployments either as a humanitarian reflex action or as a gesture of political support. Suffice it to say that this mission has over time become increasingly enigmatic.

I need not here review the careful and compelling analysis of the Long Commission regarding the change in the mission—for which the Marines were insufficiently prepared and for which their operating guidelines were insufficiently clear. American support for the Gemayel government, direct support for the Lebanese Army with training and supplies, naval gunfire directed against Druze positions, and reconnaisance overflights meant quite simply the transformation of the Marine role from that of a peacekeeping mission, however amorphous, to that of participant in a complex struggle. The rules of engagement for the Marines were not altered to reflect these changes, and, more importantly, policy makers do not appear to have appreciated the transformation of the mission. In brief, a deployment initially intended to provide assurance to Palestinian and others against the depradations of the Phalangist militia had become the principal support for the Gemayel government with its Phalangist associations. It should scarcely be a surprise that the climate turned from benign to hostile.

The withdrawal of the Israelis in the summer of 1983—which the United States had first encouraged and then discouraged—dramatically altered the position of the multi-national force. Though apparently not anticipated, the Israeli withdrawal did three things. First, it eliminated the shield that had protected the multinational forces including the Marines. Second, it obliterated entirely the hope on which the Marine mission had come to be based: that the Gemayel government could extend its authority over the entire country. Third, and perhaps most important, it created a powerful incentive to attack the Marines; for, with the withdrawal of the Israelis, the United States had become the principal prop of the Gemayel government.

The attitude towards Syria has itself undergone some surprising metamorphoses. In the spring, the Syrians were expected, rather naively, to withdraw their forces under the same conditions as the Israelis—at the behest of the Gemayel government. In the summer, policymakers had become disgruntled with Syrian obduracy, and the fleet was reinforced "as a marker to the Syrians". In the fall, Syria was denounced as an accomplice in terrorism and as a spearhead for Soviet ambitions. Now, in the winter, with the release of Lieutenant Goodman, the Syrians are being portrayed as seeking a resolution and desiring an end to the confrontation.

Throughout, however, the Syrians have been reasonably clear about their objectives: a prestige-enhancing political victory over the United States and the undermining of the Gemayel regime. From time to time, the Syrian press has trumpeted about "another Vietnam" and the inevitability of American withdrawal. The vulnerability of the Marine position has permitted Syria to play a cat-and-mouse game with the Marines--at the same time that it pursued its longer-term objectives.

2. The Present Situation of the Marines. Given the changes in the underlying political conditions and the transformation of the Marine mission, what should be said about the situation on the ground? Quite clearly, the present Marine deployment has become untenable in the longer run. Objectively considered, the Marine deployment is, quite simply, a lodgment under hostile conditions. The Marines are now hunkered down; they are hard pressed just to defend their present position. The few square miles that the Marines control around the Beirut airport implies that they provide very limited physical reinforcement for the Gemayel government—however welcome their presence may be in terms of American political support and at least the possibility of escalation.

The correlation of forces (as the Soviets would describe it) clearly does not favor the side that we support. A Marine deployment so small now provides primarily an incitement to the other side for further hostile actions—while remaining insufficient in size to intimidate the other side into a satisfactory political settlement.

Any deployment, in addition to satisfying a valid national interest, must meet the twin tests of clarity of mission and sufficiency. Unlike the Grenada invasion, the deployment in Lebanon probably failed both these technical tests. A deployment, perhaps adequate for a somewhat ill-defined peacekeeping mission, is quite clearly insufficient under conditions of hostility. The present deployment has resulted in greater pressure on ourselves than on the other side. Simply hanging in there will prove to be a costly and an unsatisfactory policy. The Marines will have to be reinforced to the point that they change the balance of power—or else withdrawn.

3. Requirements for Consistent Policy. A deployment of U.S. forces should always be treated as a serious matter. It is much more than a matter of symbolism. Under Lebanese conditions, a serious military force would be one that provides substantial support for the Gemayel government, intimidates the other side, and would alter significantly the present balance of forces in the region. To achieve such an outcome would require substantial reinforcement of the small Marine lodgment presently in Lebanon. There is considerable question whether there exists the political will for such reinforcement—and a larger question whether it would be in the longer run national interest. But the issues are stark. We are back to President Eisenhower—and the compelling need to avoid token deployments under hostile conditions.

Alternatively, we can set the goal of withdrawing our forces. Picking the least-bad circumstances is, no doubt, an ancillary condition. The Syrians may be prepared to provide some kind of fig-leaf to cover the nakedness of withdrawal—and perhaps another example of the famed "decent interval". But we should be under no illusions. The cost of staying would gradually rise—and almost certainly exceed the political costs of withdrawal, however substantial they may be. The United States is not well-equipped for this kind of war of attrition. Unquestionably the Syrians will, quite properly, treat our withdrawal as their political victory.

4. Other Considerations and Potential Costs. The costs of withdrawal are rasonably clear cut: weakening of the Gemayel government, political embarrassment of the United States, a general loss of American credibility in the region. These are substantial costs, although they are probably not overwhelming. But no one should believe that withdrawal can be costless. The basic issue is not whether costs will be incurred, but whether or not they can be avoided by any plausible policy choice. Hanging in there, waiting for something to turn up, may simply augment the net political loss.

I observed at the outset that Lebanon cannot be treated in isolation. A costly protracted war of attrition in Lebanon may well affect public support for American policy elsewhere. Erosion of support for the Administration, reflecting disaffection with a continuing stalemate in Lebanon, is likely to reduce the public's willingness to support Administration policy in Central America—for which both goals and strategy are more persuasive than they are in Lebanon. After all, any Administration must carefully consider how it wishes to invest its political capital.

In the Middle East itself, one must also carefully assess the political costs either of hanging in there or of escalation. A continuation of the existing cat-and-mouse game might well enhance Syrian prestige even more than would an American withdrawal—and increase prospective Syrian influence over the moderate Arab states. A continuation of the present stalemate, subsequent to the Israeli withdrawal, may increasingly make the United States a lightning rod for Arab nationalism, displacing the Israelis in this role. Finally, the continuing turbulence in Lebanon both contributes substantially to the Shiite awakening outside of Iran and helps to focus Shiite resentment against the United States.

The United States deployed its forces into Lebanon reflexively, almost heedlessly, and without careful consideration of the impact of this deployment, should it pass beyond the peacekeeping role, on the complexities of Lebanese politics, on Arab nationalism, or on the Shiite awakening. At the same time that we consider the clear costs of withdrawal, we should bear firmly in mind these other, less tangible but certainly substantial, costs of remaining engaged.

Let me close, Mr. Chairman, by observing that some have argued that we should never allow terrorists to determine our policies. Nonetheless, if we were to remain in Lebanon—if that is not in our interest—we should be allowing terrorists to determine American policy about as much as if we withdraw. Finally, I would observe, Mr. Chairman, that, if we conclude that Iranian-sponsored terrorism is intolerable to us, it would be far more effective for us to consider direct action—and, to borrow the phrase of a recent Secretary of State, go to the source.

STATEMENT BY THE PRESIDENT

The bloodshed we have witnessed in Lebanon over the last several days only demonstrates once again the length to which the forces of violence and intimidation are prepared to go to prevent a peaceful reconciliation process from taking place. If a moderate government is overthrown because it had the courage to turn in the direction of peace, what hope can there be that other moderates in the region will risk committing themselves to a similar course? Yielding to violence and terrorism today may seem to provide temporary relief, but such a course is sure to lead to a more dangerous and less manageable future crisis. Even before the latest outbreak of violence, we had been considering ways of reconcentrating our forces and the nature of our support in order to take the initiative away from the terrorists. Far from deterring us from this course, recent events only confirm the importance of the decisive new steps I want to outline for you now. Thus, after consultation with our MNF partners and President Gemayel and at his request, we are prepared to do the following:

First to enhance the safety of American and other MNF personnel in Lebanon, I have authorized U.S. Naval forces, under the existing mandate of the MNF, to provide naval gun fire and air support against any units firing into greater Beirut from parts of Lebanon controlled by Syria, as well as against any units directly attacking American or MNF personnel and facilities. Those who conduct these attacks will no longer have sanctuary from which to bombard Beirut at will. We will stand firm to deter those who seek to influence Lebanon's future by intimidation.

Second, when the government of Lebanon is able to reconstitute itself into a broadly-based representative government, we will vigorously accelerate the training, equipment and support of the Lebanese armed forces, on whom the primary responsibility rests for maintaining stability in Lebanon. We will speed up delivery of equipment; we will improve the flow of information to help counter hostile bombardment; and we will intensify training in counter terrorism to help the Lebanese front, the terrorist threat that poses such a danger to Lebanon, to Americans in Lebanon, and indeed to peace in the Middle East.

Third, in conjunction with these steps, I have asked Secretary of Defense Weinberger to present to me a plan for redeployment of the Marines from Beirut Airport to their ships offshore. This redeployment will begin shortly and will proceed in stages. U.S. military personnel will remain on the ground in Lebanon for training and equiping the Lebanese Army and protecting the remaining personnel. These are conditional functions that U.S. personnel perform in many friendly countries. Our Naval and Marine forces offshore will stand ready, as before, to provide support for the protection of American and other MNF personnel in Lebanon and thereby help ensure security in the Beirut area as I have described.

These measures, I believe, will strengthen our ability to do the job we set out to do—and to sustain our efforts over the long term. They are consistent with the compromise joint resolution worked out last October with the Congress with respect to our participation in the multi-national force.●

A TRIBUTE TO JFK

● Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, at the Memorial Concert at Kennedy Center honoring the memory of President Kennedy last November 22, one of the many highlights were the remarks by Tom Scanlon. For those who were unable to attend that wonderful concert and therefore missed Mr. Scanlon's speech, I ask that they be inserted in the RECORD today.

The remarks follow:

TRIBUTE TO JOHN F. KENNEDY

(By Thomas J. Scanlon)

Good evening

I have been asked to pay tribute to President John F. Kennedy tonight, and I feel honored. I held no position in his Administration. I did not know him personally. I am here only as one of the thousands whose lives were profoundly influenced by him.

When John Kennedy took the oath of office, I was a graduate student in Philosophy. Six months later, I entered the Peace Corps. Today, I am still involved with the problems I worked on then. The Peace Corps experience led me to a new life wofk.

I hope that I speak not only for myself here but for all of us whose lives and careers were inspired by John F. Kennedy.

In the past few weeks, television has enabled all of us to remember President Kennedy again in life—how alive he made us feel and how proud to be Americans. In fact, the greatest sacrifice for me in being in the Peace Corps was to be outside our country during much of that magical period.

Yet we volunteers were never really very far from events in the United States. I was stationed in Chile in a small village 6,000 miles south of here. One day I drove my jeep as far as I could toward the coast, walked a few miles to a local mission, and continued on horseback for three more hours to a remote Indian neighborhood. I was feeling very proud of myself. Certainly no other American had ever been there. Perhaps, they had never even heard of the United States. After a customary cup of tea with my Indian host, he said to me, "Did you know that yesterday was President Kennedy's birthday?"

There are many achievements that will secure John Kennedy's place in history. But the Peace Corps is the one that I choose as my text because it tells us so much about him.

The Peace Corps reflects John Kennedy's vision of America. He brought out a sense of idealism and participation that runs like a deep stream in all of us. Through the Peace Corps he challenged us to go to the remotest parts of the world, to live without privileges of any sort, to learn a new language and to put our skills and energies to work as a symbol of our country's concern for others.

Ten thousand of us responded to that challenge in the first three months. Today there are over 89,000 Americans who have returned to the United States after serving two years as Peace Corps volunteers in 88 countries.

The impact of these volunteers—and the 5,200 who are serving today—is incalculable.

Perhaps it was summed up best by a little girl in Africa who wrote adoringly to her volunteer teacher—in not so perfect English: "You are a blot on my life which I will never erase."

The Peace Corps exemplifies the quality President Kennedy admired most—courage, in this case the willingness to take a risk. There was considerable opposition to the Peace Corps when President Kennedy first announced it. Some called it a Children's Crusade and a publicity stunt.

The Kennedy Administration pressed forward. But one of Sargent Shriver's aides did ask him, fairly early, "Aren't we really going out on a limb with the Peace Corps? We still don't know whether the idea will work or whether the volunteers will be accepted." "Out on a limb, nothing!" Shriver replied, "We're out there walking on the leaves."

The Peace Corps symbolizes John Kennedy's commitment to world peace. The Peace Corps itself was a peace initiative. In teaching hundreds of languages to volunteers, the Peace Corps learned that in many languages the word for "stranger" is the same as the word for "enemy". The Peace Corps has shown that the more we know about each other, the less likely it is that we will consider one another as enemies. As John Kennedy said to the Irish Parliament in the summer of 1963:

"Across the gulfs and barriers which divide us, we must remember that there are no permanent enemies."

Today the question of peace involves no less than our survival as a planet. In the tragic operas or dramas which we witness here at the Kennedy Center, simple misunderstandings lead the action unavoidably toward its tragic end. This is the essence of tragic art. In the real world of international politics, one such misunderstanding could bring the ultimate tragedy which would end all music and all art.

John Kennedy was possessed by this realization. His eloquence and conviction were prophetic. Popular consciousness of the dangers of nuclear war is only now beginning to catch up with him.

Finally, the Peace Corps highlights John Kennedy's compassion for the billions around the world who live in an abject poverty and misery. People ask why John Kennedy is so beloved in the developing world? The answer to that question is clear. John Kennedy truly cared about that half of humanity which lacks the basic necessities He made promises to them and he delivered. He convinced the Congress to approve levels of development assistance and Food for Peace which have never been equaled since.

Then, of course, there was Peace Corps itself. The people in developing countries saw us as the direct expression of John Kennedy's interest in them. "Children of Kennedy" we were called in many parts of Latin America, "Wakima Kennedy" or "Followers of Kennedy" in Africa.

Twenty years ago this evening, there were 5,937 volunteers serving in forty-six countries. Each of them remembers vividly the outpouring of grief which his death occasioned. In Nepal, some villagers walked for five days to where the volunteers were to bring them the sad news. In Iran, a local coworker told a volunteer, "Our President is dead." In Bangkok, people dressed in mourning garb. Schools everywhere searched for flags to fly at half mast. A volunteer wrote from Brazil:

"If then this awful thing could reach out to the farthest corner of the world and have the effect of all people that I believe it did—then there is a real brotherhood among men—only one family of man."

History must judge John Kennedy not only by what he was able to accomplish in 1,000 days but also by what he inspired all of us to volunteer—in the broadest sense—to do for our country.

So might I suggest that there is amost fitting tribute which all of us can pay to John Kennedy here this evening. We can pay him this tribute in our own lives; in our concern for a just and compassionate society here at home; in our willingness to assist the masses of poor throughout the world; and, most important, in assuring our Nation's commitment to take the first steps toward peace. We can be prepared, in his memory and in his honor, to go out and "walk on the leaves."●

ARMS SALES TO GUATEMALA

● Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, on January 29, I learned that the U.S. Government had agreed to sell the Government of Guatemala approximately $2 million worth of helicopter spare parts for its aging fleet of six United States-made UH1-H Huey helicopters. I found this sale particularly troubling in light of Guatemala's abysmal human rights record. My greatest concern is that I believe that this action is likely to cause a further deterioration in the quality of life for Guatemala's citizens and to send the wrong message at the wrong time to Guatemala's military dictatorship.

In its recent report to the President, the National Bipartisan Commission on Central America stated that a renewal of military assistance to Guatemala should be directly linked with improvements in human rights conditions in that country. Several passages in that report are quite instructive as to the kind of Government that we are supporting in Guatemala:

The existing human rights situation there is unacceptable, and the security situation could become critical . . . Military aid and military sales should be authorized if Guatemala (makes) rapid progress towards democratic pluralism and respect for human rights.

The Guatemalan armed forces have been able so far to contain low-level insurgency without assistance from abroad. This relative success is due to a number of factors: long experience in counter-insurgency; the greater geographical difficulty in the guerrillas have in obtaining supplies from Nicaragua, as contrasted with the Salvadoran case; and the more favorable conditions for counter-insurgency operations prevailing in the less densely populated backlands of Guatemala. But financial restrictions on the Guatemalan government and shortages of military supplies and spare parts could soon begin to limit the effectiveness of the Guatemalan counter-insurgency effort.

An even more serious obstacle in terms of the ultimate containment of armed revolt in Guatemala is the brutal behavior of the security forces. In the cities they have murdered those even suspected of dissent. In the countryside, they have at times killed indiscriminately to repress any sign of support for the guerrillas. Such actions are morally unacceptable. They are also self-defeating—as long as they persist, the conditions in which insurgency can appear and reappear will continue.

As with much of the Commission's report, I find that I am in strong agreement with this assessment of the true nature of the Guatemalan regime. Numerous organizations, including the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights, Amnesty International, the U.S. Department of State, and Americas Watch have, to varying degrees, characterized Guatemala as "a nation of prisoners" where civil liberties which we take for granted are routinely violated. Human rights abuses have been endemic in Guatemala during the past three military governments. In a July 1982 report, Amnesty International itemized 69 massacres of civilians since Gen. Efrain Rios Montt had seized power in Guatemala. Amnesty International estimated that 2,186 civilians in rural areas died in these incidents.

Rios Montt was toppled in an August 1983 coup by Guatemala's present dictator, Gen. Oscar Mejia Victores. Since that time, the overall human rights picture in Guatemala has, if anything, deteriorated substantially. Human rights monitors have determined that political murders, disappearances, and torture are commonly employed devices in the Guatemalan Government's "Campaign Against Subversion." No one can accurately estimate how many people have died in this campaign, but estimates range into the thousands.

Since 1981, the Reagan administration has attempted on numerous occasions to coax the Guatemalan Government toward less repressive policies. These efforts, unfortunately, have not met with success. Throughout much of 1983, the administration sought to improve relations with Guatemala in the hope that we could attain some leverage with the Guatemalans and thereby encourage that Government to improve its human rights performance. Nevertheless, the Guatemalans showed a distinct unwillingness to cooperate with us. In October, two Guatemalan employees of the Agency for International Development disappeared and were later found to have been murdered. A third U.S. AID employee suffered a similar fate in November. As a consequence of the killings, the administration recalled our Ambassador to Guatemala in November and canceled the sale of military spare parts to that country. Moreover, Congress rejected $53.5 million which had been previously earmarked for Guatemala for various forms of economic assistance.

It is often argued that only through initiating contact and providing aid can we hope to affect the behavior of a government. It is thought that we can gain leverage over nations which receive our arms, for instance by conditioning sales on the elimination of death squads. But this is a difficult argument to make with respect to Guatemala. As I see it, we simply do not have either the political or the economic leverage to make the Guatemalans change their ways.

Increasing the U.S. military assistance by the sale of $2 million worth of helicopter parts is not the sort of thing which ordinarily interests most Americans. After all, this is a miniscule sale by our standards, and the equipment is nonlethal. But what is small by our standards can be enormous in Guatemala. Refitting disabled helicopters has the potential to make life particularly unpleasant for many Guatemalans who have, in some way, displeased the Guatemalan military regime.

Guatemalan leaders have on numerous occasions said that they were extremely interested in buying spare parts for their helicopters. Allan Nairn in an April 11, 1983 article in the New Republic has aptly described the Guatemalan military's interest in purchasing this equipment:

> The United States' refusal to sell spare parts had grounded much of the fleet, so Lieutenant Bonilla (a Guatemalan officer) was encouraged by reports that the Reagan Administration was considering a change in policy. "That would be wonderful," he said. "With six helicopters, for example, the airborne troops would land all at once before they could make a move. The nicest, the ideal, the dream, would be a surprise: suddenly, pow! Helicopters with troops!" As he spoke, he made machine gun noises and waved his Galil toward the refugee shacks.
> The day before this conversation, a peasant family in Bonilla's camp, interviewed in their shack outside the view of soldiers, described such an assault on their village. "Two times they came there in helicopters," said one of the men. "They would come in and land and the people would retire and they would always kill a few. They flew over, machine-gunning people from the helicopter." The family said that five were killed in the strafing.

Clearly, while the financial impact of such an arms sale is small, the human cost is very much higher.

On another level, this cash sale may well violate the law of the United States. Section 502B of the Foreign Assistance Act prohibits military assistance or commercial sales of military or police equipment to governments engaged in "a consistent pattern of gross violations of internationally recognized human rights." Guatemala's record in the area of human rights in the last few years would, in my mind, completely disqualify that country for any sort of consideration for any form of military assistance from this country.

This sale raises other important issues. The British Government has made it known that it does not view this sale favorably. In the past, Guatemala has threatened to invade the former British Colony of Belize and to reclaim it as part of a "Greater Guatemala." To this day, the British maintain a force of over 1,500 troops and a squadron of Jaguar fighters to preserve the soverignty of Belize against this possibility. The Thatcher government has indicated that these helicopters could potentially destabilize the current balance of forces along the Guatemala-Belize border.

The Reagan administration has been less vocal on a final yet important reason for this arms sale—that of its desire to bring Guatemala into a regional security arrangement with its neighbors, Honduras and El Salvador. Guatemala does not subscribe to many of the freedoms which we regard as vital both for ourselves and for our friends in Central America.

Individual rights are ignored, freedom of the press is nonexistent, political parties are largely controlled by the Government, religious freedom is constrained, and the judicial process is distorted by Government fiat. The struggle in Central America is essentially a struggle against such conditions. It is being fought not by leftist guerrillas or by Sandinistas, but by reform-minded Democrats who are our allies. If we condone or contribute to the kind of conditions which are a fact of life in Guatemala, we undercut our efforts to bring stability, prosperity, and justice to the region.

This arms sale is a small thing, but nevertheless we can be measured by such small things. This sale is neither wise policy nor is it moral. It brings us to the level of complicity with dictators who continually ignore the needs and rights of their people and who seek to maintain their position through fear and repression. Our Government should disassociate itself from this policy and halt this transaction. Such an act would truly convey the abhorrence that Guatemala's human rights policies engender in most Americans.

That is why I have been joined by Senators BOSCHWITZ, HATFIELD, and KASSEBAUM in initiating a letter to Langhorne Motley, the Assistant Secretary of State, urging a reconsideration of the sale. I therefore ask that a copy of our letter be printed in the RECORD.

The letter follows:

U.S. SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON FINANCE,
Washington, D.C., February 9, 1984.

Hon. LANGHORNE A. MOTLEY,
Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs, U.S. Department of State, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. MOTLEY: On January 29, the U.S. government announced that it had agreed to sell Guatemala $2 million worth of spare parts for that country's fleet of United States-made helicopters. The State Department has indicated that, because this helicopter parts sale was for cash, it does not constitute a violation of the Congressional ban on sales of military equipment to Guatemala.

In its recent report to the President, the National Bipartisan Commission on Central America stated that a renewal of military assistance to Guatemala should be directly lined with improvements in human rights conditions in that country: "The existing human rights situation there is unacceptable, and the security situation could become critical . . . Military aid and military sales should be authorized if Guatemala (makes) rapid progress towards democratic pluralism and respect for human rights." Recent developments reflect a deterioration, not an improvement, in the over-all human rights picture in Guatemala. Nevertheless, the Reagan Administration has, in effect, abrogated the Congressional ban.

There are a number of compelling arguments as to why this sale should not have been made. First, the Guatemalan army has used helicopters extensively to subdue opposition in rural communities throughout the country. Second, human rights abuses have been endemic in Guatemala during the past three military governments; these abuses have intensified substantially since the Mejia Victores coup of August 1983. Third, and perhaps most important, the law of the United States (Section 502B of the Foreign Assistance Act) prohibits military assistance or commercial sales of military or police equipment to governments engaged in "a consistent pattern of gross violations of internationally recognized human rights." According to numerous independent observes and organizations, Guatemala is characterized by a regular pattern of human rights violations.

We would therefore urge that you reconsider this decision to sell helicopter parts to the Guatemalan government. By cancelling the sale, the U.S. government could convey its continuing displeasure with the human rights policies of the Guatemalan government. Failure to halt this transaction, on the other hand, would only encourage the Guatemalan government to believe that it can persecute its citizens with impunity.

Sincerely,

DAVE DURENBERGER.
RUDY BOSCHWITZ.

DR. JOHN D. MILAM

● Mr. TOWER. Mr. President, I call to the attention of my colleagues a most distinguished Texan Dr. John D. Milam, who was recently elected president of the American Association of Blood Banks. He assumed the presidency of this 9,500-member medical association at its 36th annual meeting in New York City, on October 31, 1983.

Dr. Milam is chief of staff, associate director of pathology laboratories, director of the blood bank and transfusion service, director of the Schools of Blood Bank Technology and Medical Technology, and director of the blood banking fellowship program for St. Luke's Episcopal Hospital at the Texas Medical Center in Houston. He is also a past president of the South Central Association of Blood Banks and the Texas Society of Pathologists.

The American Association of Blood Banks is the largest organization in the world devoted exclusively to blood banking. More than 2,300 community or hospital blood banks and transfusion services are members of the AABB, and more than 7,000 individuals professionals, including physicians, researchers, medical technologist, administrators, and donor recruiters, also belong.

Dr. Milam has been active for many years in the AABB. Previously he served as a member of the AABB Board of Directors from 1977 to 1981, and has been a member of the organization's standards, external affairs, technical manual, education, and district liaison coordinating committees.

Dr. Milam received his M.D. degree from the School of Medicine at Louisiana State University. He trained in pathology at the LSU Medical Center in Shreveport, La.; the Charity Hospital of Louisiana in New Orleans, and the Memorial Hospital for Cancer and Allied Diseases in New York City.

On behalf of the millions of patients and blood donors in Texas and throughout the country that Dr. Milam has served so well, I want to congratulate him and wish him well in his service to the American Association of Blood Banks.●

SENATOR DANIEL K. INOUYE

● Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, recently I had occasion to read wonderful remarks about our extraordinary colleague, DAN INOUYE. They were written by a friend of his and mine. Dean Jerrold M. Michael of the University of Hawaii's School of Public Health.

Dean Michael's eloquent words capture some of the extraordinary sensitivity of DAN INOUYE and I submit for the RECORD for the enjoyment of our colleagues and those who may read the RECORD.

The remarks follows:

INTRODUCTION OF SENATOR DANIEL K. INOUYE ON THE OCCASION OF HIS RECEIVING AN HONORARY FELLOWSHIP FROM THE HEBREW UNIVERSITY OF JERUSALEM

(Dean Jerrold Michael)

It is of course a great honor to be chosen to introduce Senator INOUYE to this group, for the story of his life and that of his wife Maggie is the story of America. It is a story, as former President Lyndon Johnson said, and I quote, of "A man who has lived by the code of personal courage on the battlefield and in the political arena; a man who has faced the aggressor's bullets and the bigot's contemptuous stare, and has lived to gain the admiration and respect of his fellowman. Even more important, he has by his example and witness helped to make the hearts of his fellowmen more tolerant, more free of the awful burden of racism."

To many of my coreligionists in this audience, the saga of the European migration is well known as an important part of the American heritage. We have long been aware of the contributions to our society which came issued from Western Europe—the surge of industrious peasants out of Poland, Germany, and other European centers—men and women who fought eagerly for something in a new land and often found it, if not for themselves, for their children or their children's children. But, as Ambassador Mike Mansfield has said:

"Less known is the Oriental immigration inheritance of America. It is one which has not loomed large in the totality of American life and its blend into the whole has neither been rapid nor easy."

Ambassador Mansfield went on to say:

"The great bulk of the immigrants to America from Asia in fact did not choose to leave their homes; rather, they were compelled to leave by the inadequacies of crowded lands and a rigid social system to meet the growing human demands which were imposed on them in the 19th century. Often these early immigrants constituted individual sacrifices who went forth into an alien world in a desperate last-ditch effort to save the family clan structure."

And so it was that the great-grandfather of this American whom we honor tonight, one Wasaburo Inouye of the Yokoyama Village in Japan, was caused to make a momentous decision—for a fire had spread through that village and it was the code of that hill country of southern Japan that he who lived in the house where a fire began must pay for the restoration of any other house that burned and for all the lost possessions. He could, of course, flee with his family in the dead of night—and slip away—and forever after, the name of Inouye would be ceremoniously stricken from every registry book and dishonor would fall upon the family.

No—he decided that they must pay the other families the almost overwhelming sum of $400 and since there was no way to earn such money in the village, the eldest son, Senator INOUYE's grandfather Asakichi, then 28, must leave the village and earn that money—earn it by becoming a contract worker in the sugarcane fields of Hawaii at a wage of $10 a month. And so it was on September 28, 1899, along with his wife, Moyo, and only son, Hyotaro, that the first steps in the beginning of a uniquely American odyssey began.

And also there began for Hyotaro and his family on Kauai, years of backbreaking work on the plantations. By the time he was 14, Hyotaro was considered old enough to wield the machete and day by day throughout the harvest season, he worked by his father's side.

On September of 1913, Hyotaro left Kauai for the first time to prepare for his formal education which he was to take at Mills High School in Honolulu. When he graduated, he won a job as a file clerk with the Theo H. Davies Co., and in the River Street Church, he met a girl—a small, bright-eyed Japanese, whose name was Kame and who Hyotaro knew in his heart of hearts would become his wife or all the days of his future would be blighted. And that too came to pass.

Kame Imanaga's parents died early in her life and she found a home with Rev. Daniel Klinefelter and his wife. They had a great deal to do with her sensitivity to life and with the way that she was to bring up her family.

In September 1923, she was married to Hyotaro Inouye and 1 year later, in the early evening of September 7, 1924, a son, DANIEL K. INOUYE, was born.

My friends, Kame Inouye is with us today and, if may, I should just like to have her recognized at this time. Her beloved husband, Hyotaro, is no longer with us but his memory remains and in tribute to him, let me quote the words of Senator INOUYE as he described the moment in January 9, 1963, when he was sworn in as the first Japanese American to hold a seat as a U.S. Senator.

"Maggie and I had spent New York's Eve in Hawaii, then returned to Washington. The weather was unusually cold and we brought our own warmth with us. I was about to take my seat as the U.S. Senator and my father had come along to see me take the oath of office. This was a special gladness because my father had suffered a heart attack some years before and had not been able to be in Washington when I was sworn in as a Member of the House of Representatives. I knew he always felt that to be a great loss and in a certain sense, this day belonged to him. Because of my very junior status, there was no seat for him in the crowded family gallery to the left of the Presiding Officer. Instead, he sat at the other end of the Chamber. Waiting my turn to take the office, I had searched the galleries for him. Then my name was called and I was escorted forward to where Vice President Lyndon Johnson waited to administer the oath of office. As I raised my arm and swore to defend and protect the Constitution of the United States, I suddenly saw beyond the Vice President's shoulder and directly in front of me the spellbound face of my father. Our eyes met and held fast. I tried to imagine what he was thinking and I felt an everlasting gratitude to be alive, to be part of the turn of events that had brought Hyotaro Inouye to this time and this place."

As you all know, Senator INOUYE's middle name is KEN. KEN in Japanese, means to build and in his earlier years, Senator INOUYE thought that his father, in choosing that name, intended for him to be a builder or, as he understood it at the time, a carpenter. It was not until long afterward that he realized the true significance of his middle name, given with the devout hope that he, as the eldest son, would continue to build the INOUYE family.

Born in Honolulu, Senator DANIEL K. INOUYE grew up in the McCully-Moiliili area, graduated from McKinley High School, and the University of Hawaii, where he received his bachelor's degree in 1950 in the field of government and economics. He is also a graduate of George Washington University Law School where he received his juris doctor in 1952.

Enlisting in the U.S. Army in the renowned 442d Infantry Regimental Combat Team in March 1943, he received a battlefield commission on November 1944 and retired as a captain in May 1947 after having received his country's second highest military declaration, the Distinguished Service Cross, as well as the Bronze Star, Purple Heart with Cluster, five battle stars and four Distinguished Unit Citations. He clearly distinguished himself in the field of combat as he has since in the field of political and social action.

When he returned from the war, he met a beautiful University of Hawaii professor, Margaret Awamura (Maggie), whom he married June 12, 1949. So you can see, this is a special time—for tomorrow, the Inouye's celebrate their 34th wedding anniversary. Incidentally, the wedding was arranged in formal fashion by the Japanese version of the Yiddish "Shotkin" or matchmakers—Dr. and Mrs. Kohatsu.

As part of the great social revolution which is a key to Hawaii's present, Dan was elected to the House or Representatives of the Territory of Hawaii in 1954. He became majority leader of that body in that year and served through 1958. In 1958, he was elected to the Senate of the Territory of Hawaii. With statehood in 1959, he was elected to the U.S. House of Representatives and, as I told you earlier, in 1962, he became the first Japanese American to enter the U.S. Senate where he has served successively through four elections.

While he has distinguished himself in many areas in that august body, perhaps his most well-known area of leadership has been as a member of the Subcommittee on Foreign Operations. It is there that he has demonstrated his commitment in support of an appropriate and balanced foreign policy for the United States, which has always included the resolute support of that lone democracy in the Middle East—the State of Israel.

Of equal impact has been his unflagging support in the field of education and in particular, in the field of health science. As many of you know, DANIEL INOUYE had wanted to be a physician and, in fact, a surgeon. Having given his right arm in defense of his country, that was no longer to be possible, but it did not diminish his continuing interest in the improvement in health of the people of this country and in fact to the world.

And so it is quite appropriate that he is recognized this evening by an institution such as the Hebrew University of Jerusalem that devotes itself to the education of people of all backgrounds, all religions, all racial denominations—in the field of health science.

One final vignette about this man we honor tonight: A story about a place in Honolulu well known to all of us—Punchbowl Cemetery.

The GI's who had fallen in World War II were returned to the islands, to Punchbowl, and their graves were marked with temporary wooden crosses. Slowly, however, pressure had been building up, especially among the religious leaders of the Hawaiian community, for a system of permanent markers. People had an image of crosses at the military cemetery at Flanders Field, made famous by the poem about that World War I cemetery in France. Orators invariably referred to it as a resting place for the valiant of our Christian nation. The Territorial legislature was about to pass a resolution to indicate to Congress what kind of memorial markers would be appropriate. DAN, as commander of the Disabled American Veterans, had requested the opportunity to make a statement. He knew that many who had fought beside him and who would rest now forever at Punchbowl were not Christian—but rather were Buddhists or Jews or perhaps had no religious belief at all, and he reckoned that they were in no position to obtain the right to lie in death with the same spiritual convictions they had borne in life.

Who, then, would speak for them? In the case of the Nisei of Buddhist faith, certainly not their aged parents, so long taught to hold their peace and suffer their indignities in silence. In the case of the Jews—probably not—for their coreligionists for centuries had learned that to be quiet was to exist.

DAN asked the legislature what would happen to our vision of freedom of religion if, by government edict, we mark all as Christians. Where was the fairness, the simple respect owed to those who had given up their lives for this country?

And so today, instead of rows of standing crosses, there are the flat markers at each grave that are inscribed with the names, the dates of birth and death, and the religious symbol of each person. Punchbowl today, is a tranquil and lovely resting place for thousands of brave GI's, unmarred by subtle unintentional religious bigotry.

Almost 58 years ago to the day, when Senator INOUYE was but 1 year old, Hebrew University was founded high on Mount Scopus, overlooking the old city of Jerusalem. A university—in the words of Prof. Albert Einstein—and spoken by him on that day—"that will serve people of all religions and all races, a university never to be cramped with the spirit of narrow nationalism, a university always free from the evil of bias and with the hope that teachers and students will always preserve the consciousness that they serve their people best when they maintain their union with humanity and with the highest human and moral values."

It is quite appropriate that such a university should honor such a man, Senator DANIEL K. INOUYE.●

JOAN SCHEUER AND EDUCATION IN NEW YORK

● Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, the system of financing schools in New York State, as indeed in many others, is one which is exceedingly complex. It requires a precise and incisive mind to understand the intricacies and subtleties of the process. So, when one finds a cogent analysis of the financing system in New York, there is a feeling of relief and appreciation.

Such was the case when I read an article entitled, "The Equity of New York State's System of Financing Schools: An Update." This work was published in the Journal of Education Finance and was written by Joan Scheuer, who is a consultant for the Office of Budget Operations and Review of the New York City Board of Education.

Mr. President, I commend the article to my colleagues' attention and ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

THE EQUITY OF NEW YORK STATE'S SYSTEM OF FINANCING SCHOOLS: AN UPDATE

(By Joan Scheuer)

"Schizophrenic" was the word chosen to describe New York State's system of financing public schools in 1970.[1] From its inception in 1962, both equalizing and disequalizing features have countered each other within the plan. Over the years, the legislature has added save-harmless provisions, extra weightings, new aid programs and devices for cushioning economic and demographic change. By 1981, the system had become so complex that Judge Hopkins of the appellate court described it as "a patchwork mounted on patchwork, an Ossa of confusion piled on a Pelion of disorder." [2]

CALL FOR REFORM

Deficiencies in the New York plan were identified by a series of government task forces and commissions throughout the 1970s. The drive for reform culminated in 1974 with the case, Levittown v. Nyquist, in which the cities and schools boards of Buffalo, Rochester, Syracuse, and New York joined twenty-seven property poor districts in a challenge to the constitutionality of the state's system of financing schools. In June 1978, following a long trial, the lower court Judge L. Kingsley Smith declared New York's method of funding education unconstitutional. Judge Smith's opinion was upheld by the appellate division in October 1981, but reversed by the court of appeals in June 1982. The majority opinion for the court of appeals made clear that the reversal rested on constitutional grounds, rather than a denial that the system was inequitable.

It must be recognized that there are . . . significant inequalities in the availability of financial support for local school districts, ranging from minor discrepancies to major differences, resulting in significant unevenness in the educational opportunities offered.[3]

So saying, the court passed the problem back to the legislature. Some legislators have argued that recent changes in the law have effectively reduced inequities in the system, that the claims raised in the Levittown case have been substantially addressed since the trial began. "In principal," said one influential state senator, "the [l]egislature has met the dicta of the [c]ourts." [4] But, Governor Cuomo and the Board of Regents maintain that the system is in need of comprehensive reform and that inequities have increased, not diminished, in recent years.[5]

This paper will examine recent legislative initiatives to determine their effectiveness in reducing the kinds of inequities that were the focus of the Levittown complaint—chiefly wealth-related disparities in local spending, the interdependence of school spending and local fiscal capacity and inequities among types of districts. It will review the New York State system of financing schools to determine whether it has become more or less equitable since 1975, and will attempt to answer the following questions: How have disparities in local wealth and spending changed? To what extent has the interdependence of local spending and local wealth been intercepted? Has the state's ability to compensate for disparities in school spending improved? Has the state improved its method of meeting pupil needs? Have inequities among types of districts and regions have ameliorated?

THE NEED FOR CHANGE

Pressure on the legislature to change the school finance scheme mounted as the Levittown litigation proceeded. Following Judge Smith's decision in 1978, Governor Carey announced his support for reform. With the Regents, he appointed the Special Footnotes at end of article.

Task Force on Equity and Excellence in Education (the Rubin Task Force) to study the issues raised in the Levittown case and recommend remedies.[6]

The efficiency of the system as well as its equity was called into question. All but six districts were receiving aid on a save-harmless basis in 1976. The state share of total educational expenditure dropped from a peak of 48 percent in 1967-69 to 37.6 percent in 1977-78.[7] The number of districts receiving aid on a save-harmless basis rose as state support levels lagged. The Board of Regents called upon the legislature to increase funding levels, revise the attendance-based method of counting pupils and phase out the nonequalizing features of the aid formulas.[8]

LEGISLATIVE RESPONSE

The legislature responded to pressure for reform with a series of changes in the aid formulas and in the composition of the aid package. Chapter 53 of the Laws of 1978 replaced the foundation formula that had been in place since 1974 and restored the aid ratio format. A two-tiered percentage equalizing formula was introduced for basic operating aid. The state share of the ceilings was set at 49 percent of the tier I ceiling and 20 percent of the tier II ceiling, in a district of average wealth. Ceilings for both tiers were raised, with the tier I ceiling increasing each year from $1,450 in 1978-79 to $1,685 in 1982-83 and the tier II ceiling increasing from $1,500 to $2,155 in 1982-83. The minimum $360 flat grant provision was retained, but there has been no increase in the $360 per pupil grant since 1974.

Change in the wealth measure

Responding to pressure to introduce an alternative to property value as the sole indicator of local fiscal capacity, the legislature redefined the measure of local wealth for the second tier of operating aid in 1981. It substituted personal income per total wealth pupil unit (TWPU) for full value per total wealth pupil unit (TWPU) in the tier II formula for operating aid. The change was not welcomed by most of the large city school districts, which appear wealthier when local wealth is defined in terms of income per pupil, than they appear when wealth is defined as relative property value per pupil. The change reduced aid for city districts. In 1980-81, the big five city school districts received 32.4 percent of all tier II aid distributed by the state; in 1981-82 they received 27.7 percent and in 1982-83, 27.4 percent.[9]

Pupil counts

Changes in the statutory definition of weighted pupils have made the New York formulas unduly complex. The law defines pupils differently depending on how the public count is used in the aid formulas. For computing aid payments, pupils are defined as "total aidable pupil units" (TAPU "for payment"). They are counted on the basis of average daily attendance (ADA) in the base year (the year preceding aid payment). An extra .25 weighting is assigned to pupils in grades 7-12; pupils with special educational needs (PSEN) receive an extra .25 weighting, pupils in summer programs an additional .12, and those in adult education programs an extra .50.

For measuring wealth, the pupil count is defined as "total wealth pupil unit" (TWPU). All weighted pupils, including those weighted for handicaps, are included. To conform with the year that audited data on property valuation becomes available, pupils are counted for TWPU on the basis of selected attendance periods for the year preceding the base year.

The large city plaintiffs in the Levittown case argued that the use of attendance in state formulas discriminated against urban school districts. They claimed that high absentee rates were characteristic of all large cities and required greater rather than reduced expenditures on the part of large city school districts.[10] Although the Board of Regents, the Rubin Task Force, and Governor Carey proposed a shift in the definition of pupils from an attendance based pupil count toward one based on enrolled pupils, average daily attendance (ADA) has continued to be the basis for aid computation in all of New York's aid formulas.

Composition of the aid package

The composition of aids that make up the state's contributions to educational support has changed from year to year, reflecting legislative priorities. In 1975-76, major aids included operating, transportation, building aid, BOCES, and special service aid and high tax aid. Operating aid accounted for 75.8 percent of the total state aid allocation, other "major" aids for 21.9 percent, and all other state aid for 2.3 percent.[11] By 1982-83, operating aid made up 68.9 percent of the total, other major aids 26.2 percent, and all other aids, 4.8 percent. The drop in the percentage of aid allocated in the form of operating aid is the result of the newly created separate "excess cost" formulas for handicapped pupils in public school programs and in private institutional placements and the growth of special purpose aid programs.

In 1979, four aid programs for handicapped pupils were consolidated and a separate aid ratio formula was developed for handicapped pupils in public schools. The handicapped aid ceiling was set to reflect the average level of operating expenditures in the state and handicapped pupils were assigned extra weights of 1.7, 0.9 and 0.13 according to the level of service received. Weightings for handicapped pupils were removed from the TAPU count for computing aid, but since 1981 they have been included in the count of pupils for determining district wealth (TWPU). A special formula covers the few pupils in public programs where costs exceed $10,000 per pupil or four times the local level of operating cost per pupil.

Over twenty separate formulas now allocate state funds to school districts.[12] Separate formulas provide for pupils in programs that serve the gifted and talented and pupils with limited English proficiency. Low-income (LISSA) aid is distributed to districts with relatively low personal income on an aid ratio formula basis. Aid for diagnostic screening in elementary grades is distributed by formula. The big five cities receive special services aid for data processing and occupational education and two other formulas provide aid for these functions in districts served by Boards of Cooperative Educational Services (BOCES). Separate minimum aid ratios and save-harmless provisions apply in many of the nonoperating aid formulas.

Categorical grants have proliferated and now include support for certain small cities that were affected adversely by a series of court decisions on constitutional tax limits. Categorical aids totaled approximately $180 million, or 2.4 percent of the $4,528 million distributed in state aid for 1982-83.

Cushions against change

Several devices were created by the legislature to protect districts against the 53 percent increase in property values that took place in New York State between 1975 and 1980.[13] Districts were given the option of selecting the most advantageous of full valuation for the prior year minus one, or an average of two years preceding the prior year. In 1981, the average increase in property value per pupil over a two year period was limited to 120 percent for purposes of computing operating aid.

Another shield against change is provided by the option to average pupil counts for two years. Since 1979, districts have been permitted to select the most favorable of the previous year's TAPU count or an average of the two preceding years.

Many forms of save-harmless provisions were incorporated in the New York State aid system between 1974 and 1982.[14] Until 1980, districts were guaranteed at least as much per pupil and at least as much in total aid, as they received the year before. In 1980, per pupil save-harmless was discontinued, but districts with rapidly falling enrollments were guaranteed "special" aid increases of 108 percent per pupil over the prior year's per pupil aid, provided that aid did not exceed the prior year's total dollar entitlement.

Limits on the increase in state aid that a district was permitted to receive from year to year were imposed in 1974-75. These limits, or "caps" were reduced and adjusted in subsequent years and were eliminated entirely in 1981.

DEFINING AND ASSESSING THE EQUITY OF NEW YORK'S AID SYSTEM

Past assessments

An assessment of the equity of New York state's method of funding public education was offered in testimony for the plaintiffs during the Levittown trial.[15] The analysis focused on two criteria of equity: (1) Disparities in local school district wealth and spending and their effect on educational resources; and (2) the correspondence between local wealth and local school district expenditures throughout the system. The study, prepared by the Education Policy Research Institute (EPRI), was based on data for 1974-75 supplied by the New York State Education Department (SED) from state computer runs and the state's Consolidated Data Base. Expenditures were represented by "approved operating expenditures (AOE) per weighted pupil in average daily attendance (WADA)" and wealth by "full property value per resident pupil in weighted average daily attendance (FV/RWADA)."

Four findings were offered as evidence of the system's overall inequity in 1975:[16] (1) the range in the value of real property per weighted pupil in school districts throughout the state was substantial—from $412,370 to $8,884, a ratio of 46-to-1. When the values at the extremes of the range were disregarded, the ratio between the property wealth of the district at the 10th percentile and the district at the 90th percentile was still more than 4-to-1. (2) There was a wide range in school district spending between the state's highest spending district and its lowest spending district—from $4,215 to $936 per pupil, a ratio of 4.5-to-1 and there was a spread in spending level between the districts at the 10th and 90th percentiles of close to 2-to-1. (3) The dependence of local school district spending on local school district property wealth was demonstrated by ranking districts in order of property wealth per pupil (full value per RWADA) and comparing average property wealth per pupil with the average approved operating expenditure per pupil for each of seven levels of wealth. The Pearson correlation between full value per RWADA and operating expenditures per WADA was found to be +.71; the correlation between operating expenditures and median family income was +.64 and correlations between local spending and variables measuring teacher experience, training, and salary were all highly significant. (4) Finally, the Levittown witnesses testified that disparities in operating expenditures were directly related to the quality and extent of available educational resources, as represented by the numbers of classroom teachers and professional staff per student, and the training, salary, and experience level of teachers.

Three years later, the Rubin Task Force found that inequities in the system had persisted.[17] After a careful review of alternative equity standards and measures and their implications, the Task Force decided to focus on two equity goals: expenditure equality and fiscal neutrality. Among the statistical tools to measure expenditure equality, the research staff selected the range, the restricted range, and the coefficient of variation. To measure the interdependence of spending and wealth throughout the system, the Task Force research examined the correlation between local property wealth (FV/RWADA) and approved operating expenditures per pupil (AOE/TAPU), as well as the correlation between personal income and approved operating expenditures per pupil. As an indicator of the strength of the relationship between wealth and expenditures, Task Force reports used regression analysis to determine the elasticity of expenditures (AOE/TAPU) with respect to both property and income wealth. Data were supplied by the State Education Department using computer runs for 1975-76 and subsequent years.

Methodology

To update these earlier assessments of the equity of New York State's system of financing education, this paper used data from the same State Education Department sources that supplied data for the studies made in 1975 and 1978. As far as possible, the statistical measures used in the previous studies will be applied to recent data. New York City will be treated separately, as it was in Levittown testimony and Task Force analyses, and regressions will be weighted by pupils, as they were used to determine elasticity for the Rubin Task Force.

As an indicator of local property wealth per pupil, one can compare data for the two periods on the full value of property behind each child defined as pupil in resident weighted average daily attendance (RWADA), a definition that has remained constant and correlates closely with the wealth measure in current use, full value per total weighted pupil unit (TWPU). Income data did not become available for use in school aid formulas until 1979. Income data for 1981-84 will be examined in two forms—income per pupil (TWPU), the definition used in the current formula to determine local fiscal capacity for tier II operating aid, and income per tax return, the most accessible indicator of personal income per household.

In New York State, local school spending is defined by statute as approved operating expenditures per total aidable pupil unit (TAPU). For 1982-83 aid, TAPU for expense was defined to encompass all weighted pupils, including handicapped pupils, and can therefore be compared to the definitions of local expenditures used in 1974-75 and 1977-78.

An index of need that related the weighted to unweighted pupils in each district will be used to assess the system's effectiveness in targeting aid to special pupil groups. Districts will be ranked according to the needs index and their needs analyzed in relation to local wealth and the flow of special aids. Needs and aids will be examined for different regions as represented by the eleven labor market areas in the state.

Findings

Disparities.—When the statistical procedures used by witnesses in the Levittown trial and by the Rubin Task Force are applied to 1981-82 data on school spending and local fiscal resources in New York State, little change in the pattern of wealth and spending is found. Indicators of local property wealth for 1982 aid continue to show a wide disparity from the wealthiest to the poorest district—a range for full value per RWADA of $1,093,534, and a ratio of 48-to-1 between the richest and poorest district compared to 53.3-to-1 in 1974-75 and 51-to-1 in 1977-78.[18] When values for the districts at the 90th and 10th percentiles are compared, the range is $83,563 and the ratio between the wealth of the district at the 90th compared to the wealth of the district at the 10th percentile is 2.8-to-1 in 1982 compared to 3.4-to-1 in 1974-75 and 3-to-1 in 1977-78.[19]

The ranges in personal income per pupil are narrower than the spread in property wealth; the ratio between the highest and lowest values is 20-to-1 and the ratio between the income level of the district at the 90th percentile compared to the income level of the district at the 10th percentile is 2.5-to-1. When income is defined as personal income per tax return, the ratio between the highest and lowest values is 8.3-to-1 and the ratio between the income level of the district at the 90th percentile compared to the district at the 10th percentile is 1.6-to-1.

Table 1 compares expenditures statistics for 1974-75, 1977-78, and 1981-82 data. Approved operating expenditures per pupil still vary widely throughout the state, ranging from $1,370 per pupil to $12,683 per pupil (TAPU), with a ratio of 9-to-1 between the highest and lowest spending district and a ratio of 1.8-to-1 when spending in the districts at the 90th and 10th percentiles are compared. The range, restricted range, and coefficient of variation have increased since 1974-75 and 1977-78.

Fiscal Neutrality.—When pupils are grouped by ranked intervals of local district property wealth and the average spending level of each interval is examined, the relationship between local wealth and school spending is illustrated. Table 2 shows that the patterns for 1982 are very similar to those described by the Rubin Task Force, and the Levittown plaintiffs. As district wealth increases, more is spent on local schools, and more educational resources are available for each pupil.

When the relationship of wealth and spending is examined using a variety of definitions, one finds that the interrelation between the wealth and expenditures of local school districts persists, despite the intervention of state aid. Correlations confirm the association between wealth and expenditure throughout the system. In 1981-82, the correlation between property value per RWADA and approved operating expense per pupil was +.63, compared to +.71 in 1974-75. In 1981-82, the correlation between total school expenditures and property value per RWADA was +.69, the correlation between approved operating expenditures and personal income per TWPU was +.63, and the correlation between approved operating expenditures and personal income per tax return was +.72. The correlation between approved operating expenditures and classroom teachers per 1,000 pupils continued to be highly significant, +.50 in 1981-82 compared to +.60 in 1974-75, while the correlation between professional staff per 1,000 pupils and expenditures was +.62 in 1981-82 compared to +.69 in 1974-75.

Measuring the percent change in local spending with respect to wealth, one finds an elasticity of 0.293 when approved operating expenditure per pupil spending is related to full value per pupil and an elasticity of .572 when related to personal income per pupil for the 1981-82 year. Put differently, a .29 percent change in spending is produced by each percent change in property wealth and local spending will respond by .57 percent for each percentage change in the local level of personal income. The Rubin Task Force found a .32 percent elasticity for property related disparities and a .66 percent elasticity for income related disparities in 1979-80.[20]

Matching aid needs

An index of pupil need was constructed for this study by relating weighted to nonweighted pupils in each district. As a proxy for pupil costs or pupil need, the index is limited; it only reflects extra costs that are explicity recognized by the weighting formula. Research for the Rubin Task Force found that the weightings used for the New York formula significantly understate pupil costs,[21] and the Regents concur, as stated in their 1982 Report and Recommendations to the legislature. The index of pupil need tests only the effectiveness of the aid system in targeting resources to those pupils that it has identified as requiring extra aid, rather than the adequacy of the weights. Nevertheless, it offers a simple if limited indicator of the system's capacity to compensate for extra pupil needs.

When pupils are ranked and grouped in deciles according to the needs index, and the average wealth and levels of aid for each decile are computed, it is clear that aid is not related to local need. On the contrary, as Table 3 shows, aid tends to be negatively related to pupil need. District wealth determines both operating aid and total aid and overwhelms whatever weightings are incorporated in the formula. Table 4 indicates that not only operating aids, but targeted aids for specific pupil groups, are not directly responsive to the number of handicapped or low scoring pupils in a district, because they are wealth equalized. In addition, only a few dollars per child are available in each district for pupils with limited English proficiency, for diagnostic screening, or programs for the gifted and talented.

Labor market differentials

When average values for selected variables are examined on the basis of labor markets, marked regional differentials are apparent. Data for 1977-78 were compiled by labor market area by the Rubin Task Force. The task force found that average operating expenditures were 1.4 times higher downstate than in the upstate metropolitan and nonmetropolitan areas, and that property wealth, household income, and tax effort also were greater in the downstate area.[22]

Table 5 illustrates similar upstate/downstate differentials for 1981-82. It also shows that the downstate metropolitan suburbs receive the lion's share of save-harmless aid and are considerably richer than the rest of the state. At the same time, they have higher tax rates, higher operating expenditures, and higher than average pupil needs.

CURRENT CONCERNS

Once again, the nonequalizing provisions of the aid formula are threatening its viability and equity. According to a report by the New York State Division of the Budget, 263 districts are expected to receive 1982-83 aid on a save-harmless basis.[23] Of these, 186 have been receiving save-harmless aid since 1980-81 or before, and 142 have been on save-harmless for seven years or more. The report points out that 73 percent of the 1982-83 save-harmless aid is distributed to districts in five suburban counties. Save-harmless aid per pupil goes, for the most part, to districts that have the highest property and income wealth and spend the most for education. These districts receive the greatest share of other nonequalizing aids, such as transportation and BOCES aid, flat grants, and aid attributable to special options for averaging pupil counts and limiting property valuation.

The Board of Regents identified three key deficiencies of the present school finance system: (1) the state level of support is too low to prevent a growing wealth-related gap in expenditures; (2) pupil counts and weightings understate the cost of educating pupils; and (3) aids are allocated without regard to district need.[24]

For 1983-84, the Regents recommend a comprehensive reform package that would phase out save-harmless and flat grant provisions and relate aid to local tax effort. The Regents' plan would require an increase of $359 million in state funds for 1983-84, assuming a 10 percent increase in the level of local spending. This proposal is redistributive in its impact and the political costs of implementing the plan are high; the Regents estimate that 211 districts would lose aid in 1983-84 under the proposal, most of them in metropolitan suburban areas.[25]

Another approach to revising the current aid plan was offered in the final Report and Recommendations of the Rubin Task Force submitted in February 1982, following three years of research and debate. The Task Force offered seven alternative suggestions for making the New York plan more equitable. All were based on the percentage equalizing format that has been traditional in New York State and most of the options included an increase in ceilings, to reflect current spending levels, a revised definition of local wealth, an enrollment based pupil count, and adjustments for special needs and overburdens. The cost to the state of the recommendations varied from $500 million to $1.5 billion for the initial year of the plan.[26]

The Levittown case is closed and court action no longer threatens to force comprehensive reform of school finance in New York State. Yet, the issues raised by the case continue to influence the state legislature and executive policy makers. The Executive Budget presented by Governor Cuomo incorporated many of the reforms suggested by the Rubin Task Force and accepted most of the concepts of equity that were put forward in the course of the Levittown trail. The Governor proposed to eliminate save-harmless aid, reduce flat grant provisions and "provide increased support for those districts least able to support basic programs from the real property tax.[27] While substantially improving the distributional equity of the system, the Governor's plan would have imposed severe cutbacks on many districts.

The legislature declined to adopt so punitive a plan. Instead it continued existing law with a relatively small increase in ceilings, even declining to reduce aid allocations for the few most wealthy districts. Instead of permitting the formulas to determine the distribution of aid freely and fully, the legislature agreed on a school aid increase of $203 million for the 1983-84 school year,[28] and then made sure that New York City's share of the total funds distributed remained close to 30 percent. Once again, the formulas were fine-tuned to meet this overriding political priority. Of the 708 districts in the state, 291, or 41 percent, will receive aid on a save-harmless basis, thereby diminishing the equalizing effect of the system.

CONCLUSION

Disparities in local wealth and spending have remained wide in New York State, despite structural changes in the aid formulas since 1975. Local wealth, whether defined in terms of property valuation per pupil or personal income, remains closely associated with local school spending, according to statistical indicators.

The effect of recent legislation shifting emphasis in the formula from property wealth to income is reflected by a slight change in the elasticity measures, but the variables still reflect a high degree of interdependence between wealth and spending.

State aid is distributed in inverse relation to district wealth, as it was in 1975. As in 1975, it is still insufficient to compensate for disparities in local spending.

Pupil needs continue to be greatest in relatively wealthy areas. Because aid is wealth-equalized, combined state aid as well as aid for handicapped and PSEN pupils does not go to districts in relation to the concentration of need. Aid for pupils with limited English proficiency, for the gifted and talented, and diagnostic screening is limited, averaging from $8 to $44 per pupil.

The nonequalizing features of the system have proliferated and the number of districts receiving aid on a nonformula basis has recently increased.

Save-harmless aid tends to go to downstate suburban areas, where fiscal capacity and spending levels are high. As more districts receive aid on a save-harmless basis, the system becomes more inequitable. Furthermore, when funding levels fall, interregional inequities are exaggerated.

The analysis shows that recent legislation to improve the equity and efficiency of the New York school finance system has not significantly reduced disparities or intercepted the link between wealth and expenditure. Adjustment in formula elements and minor programmatic initiatives cannot improve the system without a substantial rise in state funds. Both equity and efficiency are difficult to achieve without incurring costs, be they the political costs of redistributive schemes such as the Regents' or the Governor's, or the dollar costs of increased state support, as recommended by the Rubin Task Force.

In New York State, disequalizing and equalizing elements continue to conflict within the system. The motion they produce is not like that of a pendulum; reform is not followed by counterreform. Rather, the legislature continues to respond to the need for change on an ad hoc basis, creating a school finance system that is inconsistent, "schizophrenic," and increasingly complex.

A DEFENSE PROCUREMENT SUCCESS STORY

● Mr. GARN. Mr. President, the Wall Street Journal recently published an editorial which details the success of the B-1 procurement program. As a supporter of the B-1 bomber, I am glad to reiterate the Journal's message: "two years into development and (the B-1) is well ahead of schedule and below cost." The success of the B-1 program is based to a large extent on the effective use of multiyear procurement, exploitation of existing technology and equipment, use of a fixed-price incentive program to encourage cost savings, and tight management by the Air Force. I commend the Air Force and Rockwell, the major contractor, for their work on the B-1, and urge them to continue in their efforts to use the taxpayers' money wisely and efficiently.

Mr. President, I ask that the Journal editorial, "Procurement Success Story," be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

[From the Wall Street Journal, February 6, 1984]

PROCUREMENT SUCCESS STORY

Waste, fraud, mismanagement. Those words have become popularly synonymous with the Pentagon procurement process. It is good, then, to be able to cite recent evidence counter to that image.

The big news Friday was that the Air Force had divided a huge jet-engine contract between General Electric and the former, exclusive contract-holder, Pratt & Whitney. The competition is expected to produce cost savings, plus a warranty system that shifts some costs for material failures back on the contractor.

Another success story also appears to be underway, involving the B-1. The B-1 bomber program, which Jimmy Carter killed and Ronald Reagan resurrected, is not two years into development and is well ahead of schedule and below cost. That's no small accomplishment for a $20.5 billion program, which some critics contended might cost nearly twice that. Much of the credit goes to an Air Force management that decided not to re-invent the wheel and to the multiyear procurement procedure that Defense Secretary Weinberger has been advancing.

The Air Force has already documented $550 million in cost savings, and the figure could reach more than $1 billion, according to Gen. William E. Thurman, who manages the B-1 program. He attributes the savings to the multiyear procurement procedure, which helps drive down unit costs by avoiding costly fits and starts in the production program. New incentives for cost savings have led, as well, to some smart engineering decisions to use available standard components, where possible, instead of designing new ones.

For instance, the B-1 will use the Air Force's standard radio equipment, and the radar will be the same one already developed for the F-16. On the other hand, the Air Force didn't spare any money on providing the B-1 with the special capabilities needed to replace the aging B-52s as America's penetrating strategic bomber; emphasis was placed on developing sophisticated computers, avionics and other electronic equipment both to protect the aircraft from enemy attack and to improve its ability to locate and destroy targets.

Contractors have been encouraged to save money under the B-1's fixed-price incentive program, under which the government and the contractors evenly split the savings when an item comes in under budget. Rockwell, the major contractor, already has saved about $500 million. At the same time, aircraft assembly is moving ahead so briskly that the first plane may be ready as soon as next fall, about six months ahead of schedule. The last of the 100 planes is due by mid-1988.

The B-1's primary function will be to strengthen the U.S. nuclear deterrence capability through its ability to penetrate Soviet air defenses and its ability to find dispersed Soviet weapons. Greater Soviet deployment of mobile missiles threatens to weaken the U.S. counterstrike capability, since it is difficult to target U.S. ballistic and cruise missiles on these weapons. But the Air Force expects that the aircraft also can function as a long-range tactical bomber, carrying either conventional bombs or "smart" guided weapons. It may well serve a special role in projecting American air power into remote areas that are too distant for our current land-based or carrier-based tactical aircraft. Some British military experts believe that the costly war over the Falkland Islands might have been averted had the British had such a long-range bomber capable of interdicting the Argentine ships and thus capable of discouraging a seaborne invasion of the islands.

The handling of the B-1 appears to point the way for all new military procurement programs, entailing less congressional disruption of year-to-year budgeting and better incentives for cost saving. It demonstrates how much room there has been for improvement and how much more military muscle this country can acquire for its money through more intelligent procurement practices.●

LITHUANIAN INDEPENDENCE DAY

● Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, in mid-February 1918, the people of Lithuania declared their right to self-determination and asserted their territorial rights. That declaration represents a hallmark in the history of the free world. Lithuania had freed itself from the imperial dominion of a neighboring power and had burst forth as a fresh and independent nation. Promises of unstymied political, economic and cultural growth lay on the horizon—attainable now that the nation was free to pursue its own destiny. Establishment of an independent Lithuania was an absolute triumph for the people of the small Baltic State and a real advance for the cause of global freedom.

The fruits of victory were sweet, but they were fleeting. A short 22 years after the declaration of independence, the Soviets marched in. In 1940, the Soviet bear crushed the Lithuanian progress with a cruel blow. It battered and bruised the fledgling sovereign state—wiping out political institutions and deporting some 35,000 political leaders. The bear did not stop with decimating Lithuanian political achievements, it strangled her linguistic and cultural traditions—factors vital to national identity. The bear stomped on Lithuanian dignity. As has been the case not only in the Baltic nations but also in Eastern Europe and Afghanistan, the Soviets refused to recognize the territorial integrity of a people and have absorbed an entire nation into their huge union.

The Soviets openly violated internationally recognized human rights agreed to in the Helsinki accords and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. And the campaign to annihilate all vestiges of an independent Lithuanian state has continued to this very day. That the Soviet effort still persists is testimony to Lithuanian fortitude and deep-rooted nationalism. In the face of this repression, Lithuanians hold fast to an intangible that can be neither stifled nor destroyed. All lovers of freedom that hope, that a sovereign state of Lithuania will one day be restored.●

BLACK HISTORY MONTH

● Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, each February, during the celebration of Black History Month, our Nation commemorates the tremendous contributions of blacks to our country. This month provides us an opportunity to recognize their contributions and increase our awareness of black history, perhaps one of the most neglected aspects of our history.

The rich field of black history has been opened chiefly as a result of the efforts of Carter G. Woodson, a black scholar and historian. In 1926, he established Negro History Week, to "dramatize the achievements of the race." This early celebration has been modernized through the years into Black History Month. During this month, we reflect on the countless accomplishments of an the integral role played by black Americans. It is a month in which we make an extra effort to educate and reeducate America on this underrepresented chapter of our history.

In Michigan, we take great pride in the leadership and contributions of our black heroes and heroines. Sojourner Truth, who helped lead this country out of the dark days of slavery; Elijah McCoy, a noted inventor of engine lubricating devices; American diplomat and Nobel Prize winner Ralph Bunche; Rosa Parks, whose refusal to give up her seat on an Alabama bus sparked the civil rights movement; and the "Brown Bomber," Joe Louis, a great athlete who held the heavyweight boxing title longer than any other man; to mention only a few.

These individuals strove for greatness and achieved it. Their contributions and the contributions of millions of black Americans to this country and the world are incredible, especially in light of the tremendous obstacles and discrimination they faced and fought and which today we are still working to overcome.

If there is one enduring message to be drawn from Black History Month, let it be that we are proud of all black Americans and that we will not backslide on any of the hard fought advancements of the past 200 years; that as a nation we will work together toward opening wider the doors of equality, justice and opportunity to all.●

A TRIBUTE TO FRANK CAVAN

● Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, it is a real pleasure for me to pay tribute today to Frank L. Cavan, of the Ford Motor Co.'s labor relations staff, who is retiring after 37 years of distinguished service during which he has made an outstanding contribution to the field of equal employment opportunity.

Mr. Cavan has had a principal role in administering programs stemming from the plans for progress, executive orders, title VII of the 1964 Civil Rights Act, veterans, youth and handicapped programs, Age Discrimination in Employment Act, State and local EEO provisions, as well as a variety of other programs to aid the disadvantaged.

With his expertise in employment matters, he served in key roles with New Detroit, Inc., Greater Detroit Chamber of Commerce, and Detroit Personnel Management Association.

His reputation for fairness, honesty, and integrity is widely recognized by representatives of management, labor, and government with whom he has worked over the years.

Following his graduation from the University of Michigan in 1941, and prior to joining the Ford Motor Co., Mr. Cavan enlisted in the U.S. Army and ultimately achieved the rank of major while serving his country from 1941 to 1945 in the Engineering and Amphibian Command in the Philippines and the Southwest Pacific.

We salute Frank L. Cavan as a contributor to a better America.●

CONSUMERS, MANUFACTURERS ALIKE NEED OUR HELP

● Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I am sure that every Member of this body counts among his or her constituents businessmen who manufacture goods. In addition, all of us represent consumers who buy the goods these manufacturers produce. If a problem affecting manufacturers and consumers alike were to arise, and it were within Congress power to solve rather easily, one would expect rather speedy congressional action to correct the situation.

Unfortunately, we have today a problem that is costly to producers and consumers, that is nevertheless easy to fix, but that Congress has been unwilling to resolve. The problem comes from existing product liability laws, an uncoordinated jumble of statutes varying from State to State. They produce confusion and uncertainty, resulting in high insurance rates, greater consumer costs, and needless litigation. A uniform system of product liability laws would produce savings for both the private and public sector. Such a system requires simply that we pass a Federal product liability bill to provide a national standard with which everyone can live. We have such a bill before us. It has received broad-based support and now awaits our action.

In the meantime, those who live under the present legal regime continue to suffer from its assorted quirks. People familiar with the current system speak eloquently about its unfairness and its costs. That is why I ask to include in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD two editorials out of Racine, Wis., an area noted for its manufacturing. They will show my colleagues why we need to fix the product liability situation as soon as possible.

I urge my colleagues to read these articles carefully and support the uniform product liability legislation.

The editorials follow:

[From the Journal Times, Jan. 18, 1984]

UNIFORM LAWS SENSIBLE

Imagine a football game where the rules change every two yards. That would mean 50 sets of rules apply depending on the location of the ball. Sound difficult? Not, apparently, much more so than the nation's product liability law problem.

Rules for deciding liability law, vary widely from one state to the next. In fact, only 30 states actually have such statutes—and no two are alike. Because most manufacturers ship their goods to other states, they are faced with a virtually impossible task of meeting all the vague and conflicting standards that are set by each state.

In Wisconsin, perhaps 75 percent of all goods made here is shipped for out-of-state use and it becomes extremely difficult for a Wisconsin manufacturer to be certain his product will satisfy the rules and regulations in all the states.

In Arizona, a court will find the product's design adequate if it conforms with the "technical, mechanical and scientific knowledge of designing in existence and reasonably feasible for use at the time" the product leaves the plant.

In California, however, that same Wisconsin product can be found defective if it "fails to perform as safely as an ordinary consumer would expect."

In Nebraska, the design would be appropriate if the product incorporated what was "generally recognized" as the "best prevailing technology reasonably available."

But a Georgia court would find the product defective if the design caused it to be "not merchantable" and "reasonably suited to the use intended." Further confusing the issue is the Pennsylvania law, which says that if the product lacks any element necessary to make it safe, this same design would be found defective.

As a result of this hodge-podge of laws, if you make a product in Wisconsin, under the current state-wide system, you may lose a lawsuit in California, but win a virtually identical suit in Minnesota or other states.

What's needed, obviously, is a product liability law that would implement uniform rules of law in all 50 states—with clear rules defining the legal rights of consumers and the obligation of manufacturers in injury cases.

The first positive things such a law would produce would be to cut down on unnecessary litigation and reduce legal costs.

Fortunately, a bill (S. 44), seeking to create such uniform rules for product liability, now is pending in the U.S. Senate. It is sponsored by Sen. Robert Kasten, R-Wis., and endorsed by the administration and both Democrats and Republicans in Congress—because it is believed it would provide benefits to both consumers and businesses nationwide. The Senate Commerce Committee is scheduled to take action on S. 44 later this month.

The federal law, as proposed, appears to be a major step forward for everybody: labor, consumers and business, because what it really would do is make the Wisconsin law and judicial precedent a national law and precedent. In the same way that Wisconsin was the forerunner of OSHA—because we had strict rules about health and safety in the work place, we required other states to meet our standards—this proposed law would force other states to a reasonable and workable uniformity standard.

The proposed law would NOT remove the strict liability of manufacturers and designers and engineers to design and make products of the highest standards, but it WOULD provide a set of rules whereby all U.S. citizens could measure quality and force compliance. This would be more fair for all persons concerned—and should make for faster, more certain justice, in the event of law-suits.

It would appear that Kasten's bill deserves the careful consideration of the Congress. Certainly, it should be an improvement if everyone were required to play by the same rules.

RADIO 14 WRJN—SENTRY BROADCASTING, INC.—EDITORIAL, THURSDAY, JANUARY 26, 1984

Wisconsin Senator Bob Kasten is a cosponsor of a bill in Congress that is designed to put together a Product Liability law that would establish uniform rules for the entire country. To the many manufacturers in the Racine area this is indeed, good news. As it stands now, every state differs and the laws and regulations are a hodge podge. Major features of this bill are: it sets forth the basic standard of responsibility to which product sellers are to be held. . . . The bill requires distributors and other non-manufacturing sellers to exercise reasonable care in their handling of products. It provides a system of comparative fault, allocating the cost of product liability claims among the parties. Where the claimant or third party has misused, altered, or modified the product; (and the product seller proves that such misuse, alteration or modification caused the harm) damages are reduced accordingly. A Claimant must bring a product liability action within two years after he or she discovered the harm and the cause, and jury determines by clear and convincing evidence whether the product seller's conduct was so reckless that he deserved to pay punitive damages. What this all means to our manufacturers is the achievement of stability and fairness in the law of product liability and a reduction of legal costs. A uniform product liability law will enable every consumer to better understand the conditions of the sale of items, and the responsibility of the seller and buyer. Because the Racine area is heavily industrialized and the lives and fortunes of so many of our people depend on the growth and success of these industries, we feel that support for Senate Bill 44 is deserved by our representatives in the Senate and Congress. This is Bill Gumm, WRJN General Manager.●

METROPOLITAN GOVERNMENT OF NASHVILLE/DAVIDSON: A RECORD OF PROGRESS

● Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, as the ranking member of the Senate Subcommittee on Intergovernmental Relations, I take this opportunity to note the appearance of Mayor Richard Fulton, the chief executive officer of the metropolitan government of Nashville-Davidson County, Tenn. at the February 6, 1984 hearing on metropolitan regional governance.

I often find it useful to consult with Dick Fulton on issues of interest to local goverments—both in my role on the subcommittee and as a member of the Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations. So, I am pleased that he could lend his expertise to the hearing on metropolitan regional governance.

I know him to be an able and dedicated public servant in Tennessee. Since 1975, he has been mayor of the metro government—which is one of the oldest and most successful consolidated governments in the country. His testimony reveals how this form of government streamlines services and saves tax dollars for those who live within its boundaries.

Before he became mayor, Dick Fulton represented the Fifth District of Tennessee in the U.S. Congress for 13 years. He was a member of the powerful House Ways and Means Committee and served as the Democratic regional whip. Early in his political career, Dick Fulton was a State senator in Tennessee. So, when he addresses questions of federalism and the Federal system, he brings a unique background which includes extensive experience at every level of government. Dick Fulton's talents brought him national recognition this year when he was elected president of the U.S. Conference of Mayors. As their chief spokesman, Dick brought to the hearing a national perspective on the concerns of local governments throughout this country.

So, Mayor Richard Fulton's testimony is a valuable contribution to the hearing on metropolitan regional governance. I commend Senator DAVID DURENBERGER for focusing the attention of the subcommittee on this subject. I submit for the RECORD the prepared statement of Mayor Fulton to the subcommittee.

TESTIMONY—METROPOLITAN REGIONAL GOVERNANCE FOR THE INTERGOVERNMENTAL RELATIONS SUBCOMMITTEE

(By Richard H. Fulton)

INTRODUCTION

The rapid growth and modernization of our Nation has brought with it a highly mobile, highly demanding public which is involved daily with a number of local governments. People are no longer restricted to the boundaries of a single city or county, whether rural, suburban or urban. Today's citizen rarely works, lives, shops and enjoys his recreation within a single jurisdiction.

However, the development of a regional community has not been accompanied by the development of a political process or governmental system which relates to these new communities and their challenges. Many problems facing local governments (transportation, economic development, environment, law enforcement, health protection, solid waste disposal, etc.) cross jurisdictional boundaries and can only be solved on a broader geographic basis. Recently, however, local governments have come under increasing pressure to implement solutions to these areawide problems. Three (3) examples in Nashville are:

1. Air pollution: where we are having to implement a city-wide auto emissions program or lose federal transportation funds.

2. Hunger: where food lines grow longer and more displaced and homeless people migrate to the city seeking shelter.

3. Health care: where our General Hospital serves as a "hospital of last resort" for the medically indigent, many who live outside Davidson County.

With the cost of local government increasing, the challenge facing local officials today is to create a political process and management system that will pool administration operations for economy and efficiency, and bring their combined resources to bear on "regional" problems. There are several approaches available to translate a geographic and economic area into a regional governmental organization and process. These include:

Reorganization of local government (consolidation); or

Creation of special state or federal agencies; or

Creation of a special purpose or functional government; or

Geographic and functional modifications of local government (annexation, transfer of responsibilities and interlocal agreements); or

Intergovernmental cooperation (regional councils).

I am appearing before this sub-committee today to discuss the approach which I am most familiar with and which I feel is the most efficient, that is consolidation.

On April 1, 1963, the City of Nashville went out of business. So did Davidson County, which surrounded it. Instead there was a robust vital entity called "The Metropolitan Government of Nashville and Davidson County."

Now, twenty-one years after its birth, Nashville's "Metro" still is the only local political subdivision in the United States with a single central government and a single chief executive. Indeed Nashville's government is unique, designed specifically to cope with America's 20th Century problem of urbanization. Before discussing some of the accomplishments of this innovative region-wide government, let me first describe the why and how of the consolidation process.

WHY CONSOLIDATE?

In the mid 1950's the Nashville area had about 325,000 people, (approximately 175,000 in the then city of Nashville with surrounding Davidson County having a population of approximately 148,000) with a population growth of at least 50,000 every decade. This expanision was directed toward the undeveloped country-side, where there was an unending demand for services: new water, new sewer, new drainage systems, more schools, more fire and police protection. Nashville, the legally incorporated area to which the state legislature had granted broad powers to provide all needed municipal services, was a 23 square mile area hole in the center of the 100 square mile "actual city." Indeed, the government that existed just across this line actually lacked the legal authority even to own a fire engine. For the urban "ring" of the doughnut—Davidson County, founded in 1783—was ruled by a "farmers government" a throwback to horse-and-wagon days. A Tennessee county could repair roads, provide sheriff's services, operate hospitals and schools, but could not perform such basic functions as setting speed limits without special state legislation. As a result, the county, part of which was as thickly settled as the city itself, collected no garbage, erected no street lights, owned no parks or libraries, provided no fire protection or water service. Sewers were virtually non-existent.

Thus the problem: a single metropolitan area with overlapping governments, one with plenty of power but a limited area, the other with plenty of area but limited power. This two-headed government created constant friction and in-fighting. The resulting rivalry poisoned city-county relationships and created a costly chain reaction of inefficiency and waste. City police and the county sheriff's office hoarded crime information from each other; burglar's loot from the county could be openly displayed in city pawnshops without the police knowing it was stolen. The two school systems battled continously over how to split state education aid. On some major roads, where the city-county line went down the middle, the speed limit was 35 m.p.h. in one direction, 45 in the other. No libraries were built in the suburbs, where they were most needed. The city discontinued buying new parkland, at a time when burgeoning population demanded more green space. It even rejected offers of free parklands, on the premise that the county would refuse to contribute to the upkeep.

Because Davidson County was legally incapable of providing water or sewer service, 93 percent of its houses were dependent on septic tanks or outhouses. With only 282 hydrants in the entire county (outside the then existing city limits), fire departments had to rely on pumper trucks or ponds and residents paid $50 to $150 more a year for fire insurance than city dwellers. Most devastating of all, the whole pattern of the city's growth was thrown into chaos: because Nashville is underlaid with hard limestone, housing developments were squeezed into relatively small areas where soil cover was deep enough for septic tanks—in addition millions of dollars of new industry was lost because companies balked at building their own services.

In his now classic Metropolitan Government written more than 40 years ago, Victor Jones summarized the problem of metropolitan communities: "Disintegrated local government in metropolitan areas results in an unequalized services, in a disparity between need and fiscal ability to meet the need, and in a dispersion and dissipation of political control of the development of social, economic and political institutions . . . everywhere—in Europe as well as in America—the problem of providing services for the entire metropolitan community and of financing and controlling its local government is conditioned by its disintegration."

Nashville, therefore, provided a classic example of the tax battle now raging in most of Metropolitan areas between the city government and its non-taxpaying guests, the "daytime" citizens from the suburbs. Although most Nashvillians paid taxes only to their bedroom communities beyond the city lines, their jobs depended on Nashville's existence as a business center, and they used a vast range of city-supported services. The city did its best to even the balance by overcharging county residents for city-supplied water and electricity and slapping a $10 tax on commuter's cars, but the suburbanites invariably came out ahead.

This, then, is why Nashville needed a new government.

NASHVILLE'S CONSOLIDATION PROCESS

It wasn't easy for Nashville to achieve reform. Two enormous forces of inertia had to be overcome: the voter's fear change; and the state laws and constitutional provisions that made it far easier to create new governments than to be rid of old ones. Beginning in 1951, with a community services commission survey, it took Nashville's reformers twelve years to push the new government through. It required one constitutional amendment, three acts of the state legislature, one planning-commission report, two charter-commission reports and two referendums.

As stated earlier, the government that was finally voted in on June 28, 1962 is unlike anything else in the United States. Under the old city and old county government, there were six incorporated communities, seven special district for a total of 15 governmental units to service 399,743 people. The city had 12 departments, 20 council districts, an elected Vice Mayor, a Mayor and 24 Boards and Commissions. The county was governed by a county court with 55 members and a County Judge. Under Metro, this was consolidated into a single legislative body with 35 district members, 5 at large members and elected Vice Mayor and Mayor, all of this within a new governmental entity composing 533 square miles.

A nine member Board of Education (now elected) supplanted a seven-member city board and a seven-member county board.

The Sheriff, elected for a two-year term, was stripped of law enforcement duties and made responsible for process serving and for maintenance of the Metropolitan jail and workhouse. The Metropolitan Police Department is now responsible for all law enforcement within Metro boundaries.

The city and county road services were merged into one department, Public Works. Water and Sewer services were consolidated into a Department of Water and Sewerage. In all, 87 departments and agencies were pared down to 25.

In 1958-59 it was estimated that close to 40 percent of the old city's total real estate was tax-exempt because it was owned or operated for governmental, charitable or religous purposes. The city faced, in addition, the decline of inner city tax receipts. Finally, the city received little return for the many services it provided to surburbanites who worked in the city. In coming to grips with this challenge, a compromise had to be worked out to satisfy and to serve the urban and suburban citizens of Nashville. In tax matters, Nashville-Davidson County was given an unprecedented authority to levy different property-tax rates on its citizens, creating two separate districts. The County-wide General Services District taxes everyone to pay for services the whole county uses; police, fire, airport, parks libraries, roads, hospitals. The Urban Services District is limited to residents of the built-up urban area; it pays for such services as garbage collection, sewers, street lights. Moreover, as the urban area continues to push out into the country-side, bringing the need for more services, the boundaries of the urban-service taxing district will expand with it, to pay for the growth.

A single Tax Assessor and Trustee (both elected) were also retained while county-elected judges and court officials remained largely undisturbed.

HAS METRO WORKED?

The answer is, an unqualified YES. The difference that the "Metro" government has made in Nashville is spectacular.

First, expanded levels of public service have been provided and financed—county-wide police, fire and ambulance service. Services have been upgraded. In 1962, 27 miles of the city sewered. There are now over 1600 miles of sewer lines and 2162 miles of water lines are in the ground. Recently we have embarked on an $90 million expansion program that will give us an even greater capacity.

Second, property taxes have stabilized. Nashville had the highest effective tax rate in Tennessee when Metro came in 1963. Today, Memphis and Shelby County have not consolidated, Knoxville and Knox County have not; and Chattanooga and Hamilton County have not. Nashville/Davidson County has a much lower effective tax rate than they have. [See Chart Appendix]

Third, service economics have been achieved. For example, centralized purchasing for the Government and the Board of Education has saved 2 million dollars in the first year, $100,000 each year after. We now manage a self-insurance program which saved 1.5 million dollars the first year, 1 million dollars each year after. Serious consideration is being given to consolidating the equipment of Public Works, Water and Sewer, and Parks and Recreation. Also, consolidation of the engineering divisions of Public Works, Water and Sewer and Traffic and Parking is being reviewed.

In addition to these benefits, other gains have been found. A public opinion survey in Nashville revealed that political accessibility and accountability in Metro equalled or exceeded that in its predecessor governments. The political visibility of the Mayor has been high and has led to increased political responsibility. Stability is a benefit too, in the 21 years of Metro government, there have been but two Mayors.

CONCLUSIONS AND RECOMMENDATIONS:

What should be the federal role in promoting and supporting regional goverance?

In the past, the federal government has used a "carrot and stick" approach to foster regional planning and local government cooperation. As a "carrot", funds have been made available to plan, coordinate and review interlocal community developments. However, in some cases the federal government has taken a further step to provide grant-in-aid for functional regional programs. This, I believe, provides the greatest assistance. For instance, federal funds are being used to extend water and sewer lines to the most northern and western sections of Davidson County. In effect two cities (Hendersonville on the north. Brentwood on the west) in two different counties (Sumner and Williamson) have been "linked" by this network. Their problems became ours and vice-versa.

Another example, is in coping with the problems of hunger, homelessness and health services. Nashville serves as one of 76 urban medical centers in the United States. We have 2 medical schools and 16 hospitals including one city owned and operated facility which serves as a hospital of last resort. As a result, many people came to Nashville seeking medical assistance and very often their families join them later. More often than not, these people have no means of support and must rely on public and private assistance programs. These assistance programs do not recognize county lines when determining eligibility, and although many jurisdictional questions still exist, at least governments are encouraged to find a regional approach to solving these problems. Certainly, then, federal funds and policies used in this manner can be a very effective catalyst in establishing a base for regional governance.

However, there are instances where the federal government has mandated policies and used a stick as an enforcement tool. Air pollution programs, which I alluded to in the beginning of this presentation is a case in point. Here, federal funds have been provided for implementing on auto emissions testing programs in Nashville. If such a program was not started by July of this year, Nashville would have been "spanked" and federal transportation funds would have been withheld. Yet, is this approach really going to accomplish its goal of reducing air pollution? I think not and the reason is simple . . . the problem is multi-area while the solution is a single approach. For years, Metro has tried to get funds to implement a computer traffic signalization program which would alleviate traffic congestion and thus air pollution. Yet the federal government has insisted that this testing program be implemented first. Is this really a cost effective approach to the problem?

In each of these examples, the federal government has played a central role in determining the final outcome. In the case of the carrot, the role was a positive one, and in the case of the stick, a negative one. What really needs to be done is to analyze the factors which contribute to the deterioration of our nation's infrastructure on urban fabric and then design programs which address these needs.

What lessons does Nashville's Metropolitan Government experience hold for a Metropolitan area with area-wide problems.

First, we pay a high price for ultra local government in this country but I am convinced that the oft-stated desire for grass roots government is more myth in the minds of Americans than reality. Moreover, good government is never cheap. For example, an essential part of school reform has been hiring more teachers while simultaneously raising salaries. As a result, the School System budget has grown from a 1973-74 figure of 76 million dollars to a 1983-84 budget of 143 million dollars.

Second, Metro is a concept and not a precise formula. Be it consolidation, annexation, tax-base sharing, or the council of government's approach, unless it is truly a genuine local arrangement, it is unlikely to succeed. Regionalization tailored to the conditions and needs of a particular local area makes sense, but we should be weary of any national formula through action by the federal government to force urban area into adopting regionalization plans.

The road to city-county consolidation may not cover the entire distance to the ideal governmental reform. But Nashville has proven one fundamental point that is applicable to almost every city: the concept can be designed to work.

In closing, there are numerous consequences to the multi-headed government found in Metropolitan areas. First, is in inequities in financing local public services. In many instances the heaviest service needs occur in the areas with the least financial capacity. Second, is the realization and concern of how local governments of various sizes can cope with area-wide problems. Many believe, as I believe, this committee will come to believe, that local communities in metropolitan areas are mutually interdependent and that integrative governments are therefore needed to formulate and execute area-wide policies in which all have a stake. Fragmented government can be illogical and inefficient, whether the problem is transit, water, sewers, health or planning. Unified policy formation and execution without a single metropolitan government to guide the process with authority is an impossibility.

REHABILITATION ACT AMENDMENTS—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. WEICKER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut is recognized.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report to accompany S. 1340, Rehabilitation Act amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 1340) to revise and extend the Rehabilitation Act of 1973 and to extend the Developmental Disability Assistance and Bill of Rights Act, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses this report, signed by all of the conferees.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the conference report.

(The conference report is printed in the House proceedings of the RECORD of February 6, 1984.)

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, I rise in support of the conference report on S. 1340, the Rehabilitation Amendments of 1984. Enactment of this measure is important to handicapped Americans, for this legislation before us today continues the tradition of vocational rehabilitation services established in 1920 by the Smith-Fess Act. Data collected by the Rehabilitation Services Administration indicates that lifetime earnings for persons rehabilitated will improve by about $11 for every dollar spent on services.

The Rehabilitation Amendments of 1984 extends and amends the Rehabilitation Act of 1973 for 3 years. In addition, the measure makes provision for an additional year of authority for the State grant program in the event that legislation has not been enacted beyond fiscal year 1986.

This measure contains important new initiatives which will benefit handicapped Americans. The client assistance program, which assists vocational rehabilitation clients by informing and advising them of benefits under the Rehabilitation Act, has been a discretionary program; this measure requires all States to have a client assistance program so that handicapped individuals can benefit from the services. The conference agreement recognizes the diversity of the existing client assistance projects and has included provisions to allow client assistance projects that formerly were or currently are administered and/or housed in a vocational rehabilitation agency to be administered and/or housed in that same vocational rehabilitation agency.

The measure also contains amendments to provide the Director of the National Institute of Handicapped Research with the authority to test new concepts and innovation ideas, to allow grants to research and training centers to include faculty support for teaching of rehabilitation related courses, and to clarify that research and training centers can include both centers dealing with multiple disabilities and centers focusing on one disability.

In order to target resources on personnel shortages, this measure has directed the Commissioner of the Rehabilitation Services Administration to prepare a report on personnel needs and how funds will be allocated in order to meet those needs.

The conference agreement establishes the National Council on the Handicapped as an independent agency and makes such technical and clarifying changes to the Rehabilitation Act of 1973 as are necessary to assure the Council's independence. In addition the National Council on the Handicapped is charged with the responsibility of reviewing Federal programs for handicapped Americans, assessing disincentives or incentives of those programs which relate to community based services, full integration, and independence and dignity, making recommendations based on the assessments, and preparing and submitting a report to the President and the Congress not later than February 1, 1986.

The conference agreements amends the projects with industry authority to require that applicants have an evaluation plan, that the Commissioner publish standards for evaluation, and that the Commissioner conduct a comprehensive evaluation of the total program. The measure also requires that to the extent practicable that the Commissioner assure an equitable distribution of payments made under the projects with industry authority.

The conference agreement includes evaluation requirements for the independent living centers authorized under part B. Regrettably, part A of title VII, the State grant program, has never been funded. Although the independent living centers are providing valuable services to severely handicapped Americans, it is my hope that funds will become available so that a Statewide service delivery system under part A can be initiated.

In the 97th Congress I introduced a measure, S. 2459, to establish the "Helen Keller Center for Deaf-Blind Youths and Adults" as a separate institution. I am pleased that this measure included a title II, the Helen Keller National Center Act, which establishes a separate authorization for the Helen Keller Center for Deaf-Blind Youths and Adults.

Mr. President, I commend the chairman of the Committee on Labor and Human Resources (Mr. HATCH), the chairman of the Subcommittee on the Handicapped (Mr. WEICKER), the members of our Subcommittee on the Handicapped, and our colleagues from the House of Representatives, who have directed their time and efforts to insure that vocational rehabilitation services continue to be available for handicapped Americans.

I support this measure and ask that my Senate colleagues join with me in supporting a measure vitally important to this Nation's 36 million handicapped citizens.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, on behalf of the Senate-House conferees on S. 1340, I rise to offer the conference report and statement of the managers on the Rehabilitation Act amendments of 1984. The purpose of this legislation is to amend the Rehabilitation Act of 1973 and to extend the authorization of appropriations for this act and the Developmental Disabilities Assistance and Bill of Rights Act.

In presenting S. 1340, we are pleased to report a bill which represents a strong bipartisan effort. S. 1340 was originally reported unanimously out of both the Subcommittee on the Handicapped and the full Labor and Human Resources Committee and passed the Senate on the consent calendar with no objections. The House bill also had unanimous bipartisan support until the nonrehabilitation provision of titles IV and V were added. After agreement was reached to drop these nongermane amendments, the conferees were able to proceed to this final version of S. 1340 rather quickly.

I thank all of my colleagues for their contributions to this finished bill. My distinguished colleague, Senator LOWELL WEICKER, who chairs the Subcommittee on the Handicapped, labored diligently to create a bill which we now have before us today. In addition, I should like to acknowledge Senator JENNINGS RANDOLPH, the distinguished ranking minority member of the subcommittee. He has been a consistant supporter of S. 1340 and has worked hard on its development. It is so fitting that a man whose life has been so devoted to helping the disabled achieve a higher quality of life can conclude his illustrious career with passage of this bill that reauthorizes the Rehabilitation Act. I would like to recognize the fine work of the other subcommittee members: Senators STAFFORD, HAWKINS, NICKLES, EAGLETON, MATSUNAGA, and KENNEDY.

I would be remiss if I did not also thank the Congressman from the House Education and Labor Subcommittee for their conscientious efforts to arrive at a final resolution of differences so that we could today vote on S. 1340. I would especially like to extend my appreciation to Chairman PERKINS and Congressmen BARTLETT, MURPHY, SIMON, and ERLENBORN for their efforts.

As reported by the Senate-House conferees, the Rehabilitation Act amendments of 1984 extends the Rehabilitation Act of 1973 for an additional 3 years. While our committee believes the original act is working well, the bill mandates changes in several areas of the original statute which will strengthen and improve the delivery of services to handicapped people of our Nation.

Ninety percent of the money authorized for the Vocational Rehabilitation Act provides States with funding to evaluate and train for employment more than 1 million disabled persons per year. In S. 1340, the authorization for State grants will be increased to $1,037 million for fiscal year 1984, $1,117.5 million for fiscal year 1985, and $1,203.2 million for fiscal year 1986. This amounts to approximately a 9.4 percent, and 7.7 percent increase for the 3 years respectively. Since the States administer the program and are required to match the Federal contribution on an 80-percent Federal and 20-percent State basis, this grant exemplifies the epitomy of a highly successful Federal-State partnership.

The remaining 10 percent of the act's funding goes for various federally sponsored support and demonstration projects. Some of the projects and programs funded with this discretionary money include professional training, the National Institute of Handicapped Research, the National Council on the Handicapped, Projects With Industry, special recreation and comprehensive rehabilitation centers. In addition, S. 1340 mandates that a client assistance program be established in each State and that the National Council on the Handicapped become an independent agency. Further, the Helen Keller Center for the Deaf and Blind is given a separate authorization for the first time and the reports and evaluation authorized of the various programs were also clarified.

Mr. President, the conferees are pleased to present today what we believe is a strong bill for final consideration by the Senate. It will assure the continuation of a program which is important to disabled persons and their families throughout the country; it is a program which demonstrates the cost effectiveness of training handicapped persons for employment; it is a program that deserves the continued support of our Congress.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I move the adoption of the conference report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to.

Mr. BYRD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I have a number of items in my folder that are cleared on this side for action by unanimous consent. If the minority leader is prepared to work through these things, I would like to go forward with them at this time.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I am ready to proceed.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the minority leader.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE ON MONDAY, FEBRUARY 20, 1984

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, first an order with respect to the adjournment of the Senate. I ask unanimous consent that, when the Senate convenes on Monday, February 20, 1984, under the provisions of House Concurrent Resolution 255, as amended, the reading of the Journal be dispensed with; that no resolutions come over under the rule; that the call of the calendar be dispensed with; that the second reading of H.R. 4656 not occur until Tuesday, February 21, during morning business; that the morning hour be deemed to have expired; and that, following the reading of Washington's Farewell Address, the Senate then stand in recess until the hour of 11 a.m. on Tuesday, February 21, 1984.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER APPOINTING SENATOR LAUTENBERG TO READ WASHINGTON'S FAREWELL ADDRESS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, also in that connection, in view of the fact that cloture has now been invoked on the pending measure, I ask unanimous consent, notwithstanding the resolution of the Senate of January 24, 1901, with respect to the reading of President Washington's Farewell Address, and notwithstanding the provisions of rule XXII dealing with proceedings after cloture, that on Monday, February 20, 1984, immediately following the prayer and the disposition of the Journal, the traditional reading of President Washington's Farewell Address take place and that the Chair be authorized to appoint a Senator to perform that task.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Chair appoints the Senator from New Jersey, Mr. LAUTENBERG, to read President Washington's Farewell Address on Monday, February 20, 1984.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the Chair.

THE CALENDAR

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, there are four items on the calendar of business on this side that are cleared for action by unanimous consent. I say to the minority leader that I am prepared to go forward with those four, as follows:

Senate Resolution 201, which is Calendar Order No. 473; H.R. 3655, Calendar Order No. 623; Senate Resolution 337, which is Calendar Order No. 649; and H.R. 1557, which is Calendar Order No. 650.

Could I inquire of the minority leader if he is prepared to clear all or any portion of those items at this time?

Mr. BYRD. Yes; I am glad in particular that the majority leader is moving to take up Senate Resolution 201, which expresses the sense of the Senate concerning the use and/or provision of chemical warfare agents by the Soviet Union and that he is also moving to take up Calendar Order No. 650, which is of interest to my good friend, Mr. CONTE, in the House.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the minority leader.

Mr. President, I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the items identified in the order stated.

CHEMICAL WARFARE OF SOVIET UNION

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The bill clerk read as follows:

A resolution (S. Res. 201) expressing the sense of the Senate concerning the use and/or provision of chemical warfare agents by the Soviet Union.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

AFGHANISTAN AND CHEMICAL WARFARE

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, this resolution reflects the concern which I and many of my colleagues have about Soviet policy in Afghanistan and elsewhere that makes innocent civilians the target for inhuman, illegal chemical attacks. Since 1982, the Soviets have refused to allow Red Cross representatives into the country of Afghanistan to assist those innocent people caught up in the war between invading Soviet forces and Afghan freedom fighters. Can Soviet reluctance to admit the Red Cross be traced to the use of chemical weapons? Are they hiding the effects of their policies on the civilian population from public scrutiny? We cannot know, but we can speculate about Soviet motives.

An excellent review of the situation in Afghanistan is now available. The State Department's Bureau of Intelligence and Research has made public a report entitled "Afghanistan: Four Years of Occupation." I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AFGHANISTAN: FOUR YEARS OF OCCUPATION

(Following is a paper prepared by the Bureau of Intelligence and Research in December 1983. It is a sequel to Special Report No. 106, "Afghanistan: Three Years of Occupation.")

OVERVIEW

Four years after Soviet troops invaded Afghanistan neither a political nor a military solution seems likely in the near future. The Afghan resistance shows no sign of weakening or loss of popular support. The countrywide insurgency continues and the mujahidin deny the Soviets military success.

During 1983 resistance operations against Soviet/regime forces have become more effective even in urban areas. Tactical cooperation has increased among resistance groups and most of the country's land area remains under resistance control. Typically, once Soviet/regime sweep operations have been completed, areas return to mujahidin control. Major problems of supply and disunity remain, however, and resistance forces are unlikely to be able militarily to eject the Soviets from Afghanistan.

Despite some optimism following the April round of indirect negotiations in Geneva that the parties might be able to work out a settlement, the UN-sponsored negotiations among the concerned parties have thus far not made significant progress because of Moscow's unwillingness to set a timetable for the withdrawal of its forces. The Soviet Union appears committed to a strategy of attempting to wear down the resistance militarily, gaining control of urban areas, and remodeling the Afghan political and social structure in its own image. Soviet troop strength remains at approximately 105,000.

Afghanistan's internal problems have multiplied as the regime remains factionally divided and as Soviet control deepens. During 1983 economic and administrative chaos increased. The war has severely damaged Afghanistan's social and economic infrastructure, causing major declines in social services, agricultural production, and industrial output. Afghanistan is becoming more dependent upon outside food sources, and its economy is ever more dependent upon Soviet aid.

Significant declines in security in both urban and rural areas have led to increased Soviet use of KHAD—Khedamati-i-Etal'at-i-Dolati, the Afghan intelligence and security organization. KHAD is being greatly expanded but has been ineffective in promoting loyalty to the regime.

Intense Soviet efforts to fashion the Afghan military into an effective force also have failed and the people are increasingly alienated by forced conscription drives. Soviet frustration over inability to stop resistance activities has led in recent months to a deliberate policy of increased brutality and reprisals against the civilian population.

The refugee problem continues to grow. Between one-fifth and one-fourth of Afghanistan's pre-1979 population now lives outside its borders, mainly in Pakistan and Iran. The UN High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR), the World Food Program (WFP), and a variety of voluntary agencies and governments, including the United States, assist Pakistan in caring for these refugees—the vast majority of whom are determined to return to their homeland when it is freed from foreign occupation.

U.S. policy goals for Afghanistan remain the same. We seek the earliest possible negotiated political settlement in Afghanistan to effect the withdrawal of Soviet forces and end the agony of the Afghan people. Such a settlement must also provide for the other three requirements spelled out in five UN resolutions on Afghanistan: the independent and nonaligned status of Afghanistan, self-determination of the Afghan people, and the return of the refugees with safety and honor. The United States supports the UN negotiating efforts to achieve these goals.

THE SOVIET OCCUPATION

In 1983 the military struggle for Afghanistan continued unabated. As before, the Soviets concentrated on building up key logistical bases, securing Kabul and other major cities, improving security for lines of communication, and controlling infiltration routes across the Pakistani and Iranian borders. During the year, no major changes occurred in the size or composition of Soviet forces committed to Afghanistan. The total number remains at about 105,000 Soviet troops in Afghanistan with some 30,000 additional men on the Soviet side of the border.

Throughout 1983 Soviet/Afghan forces regularly conducted multibattalion operations designed to interrupt resistance supply lines and respond to reports of mujahidin concentrations, but these efforts have not significantly affected mujahidin activity. The resistance has been remarkably resilient, and the mujahidin today are stronger and better equipped than ever before. They have an extensive intelligence capability and regularly learn in advance about Soviet/Afghan operations from sympathizers in the Afghan military.

Large areas of the country remain under resistance control, and even in principal cities Soviet/Afghan control is being increasingly challenged. Throughout the year the resistance has dramatically demonstrated its ability to extend the war into the capital by regularly conducting operations inside Kabul and its suburbs. During the winter months, Kabul's electricity supply was a principal target of the mujahidin. Power cuts lasting several days were caused by destruction of the power lines leading from power stations outside Kabul, confronting the capital with an energy crisis unprecedented in the 4 years of Soviet occupation. Frequently, only the Pule Charki thermal power station located on the outskirts of Kabul could be relied upon, but its capacity was limited due to repeated interdiction of fuel supplies from Termez on the Afghan/Soviet border. A key petroleum pipeline which services Kabul and the major Soviet airbase at Bagram, 50 km north of Kabul, has been sabotaged so often that it is no longer dependable as a regular source of fuel.

During the summer, Marshal S. L. Sokolov, the Soviet first deputy defense minister, returned to Afghanistan for another inspection tour. Following his previous visit in late 1981, the Soviets significantly stepped up their military operations and increased their troop strength. While there has been no discernible increase of troops or step-up in operations this year, Sokolov's latest visit clearly reflected the Soviet leadership's concern about the progress of the war. The upsurge in reprisals against civilians also appears to reflect growing frustration over failure to stem the resistance.

During the summer, the level of fighting in Kabul was also significantly higher than last year. In mid-June, a few days before resumption of the UN-sponsored indirect negotiations, the mujahidin staged a nightlong attack against the Soviet-manned Bala Hissar fortress and attacked a Soviet command post near the Darulaman Palace. The attacks resumed in early July with a successful rocket attack on Kabul airport that damaged military and civilian aircraft.

On the night of August 13-14, the mujahidin staged the most ambitious operation in the capital since the Soviet invasion. Using coordinated rocket, mortar, and small arms fire, they attacked Radio Afghanistan, Soviet residential complex, and the Bala Hissar fortress. On October 1 the mujahidin brought the Soviet Embassy in Kabul under attack for several hours. These incidents, involving some of the most heavily guarded and important installations in the city, along with bombings and frequent assassinations of regime officials, underscore the tenuous government control in Kabul.

In a move to demonstrate the regime's control of the capital, on September 28 Babrak Karmal conducted a highly publicized walking tour of Kabul. That he felt compelled to undertake such a step and the elaborate security precautions necessary to carry it out, only served to further highlight the strength of the resistance.

Large sections of the cities of Qandahar, Mazar-e Sharif, and Herat likewise remain in the hands of the resistance. Movement of regime personnel into many areas of these cities is possible only with substantial military support and during daylight hours. In April, in response to mujahidin attacks, the Soviets conducted heavy bombing and shelling of the western suburbs of Herat. As many as 50 planes a day flew missions over the city, causing extensive damage and resulting in several thousand civilian casualties. This savage bombing of Herat and the surrounding villages, however, brought no improvement in the government's security situation. Even daylight resistance operations in Herat are not uncommon, and fighting in and around the city takes place every night.

Throughout the year, Soviet/Afghan forces also have been repeatedly attacked in and around Qandahar, the country's second largest city. An incident in late August vividly demonstrated the regime's limited control there. The day following a regime speech proclaiming that the power of the "counter-revolutionaries" had been broken in that city, mujahidin from Qandahar and the countryside appeared on rooftops around government installations in the city center and at many military posts surrounding the city. For several hours they taunted regime soldiers through loud speakers and exhorted them to defect.

In recent months, even in Jalalabad, which has been one of the most secure cities in Afghanistan, the situation has eroded with frequent attacks on the airfield. Similarly, the regime faces resistance in northern Afghanistan. Mazar-e Sharif has been subjected to repeated mujahidin attacks. In September, an attack against the airfield outside the city caused extensive damage.

In late April and early May, following a deterioration of security in Paktia and Paktika Provinces, which lie astride supply lines from Pakistan, a major Soviet/Afghan offensive was launched. The operation, involving some 10-15,000 government forces, was designed to relieve pressure on several Afghan cantonments that were under mujahidin pressure and could be resupplied only by air. A Soviet-trained elite Afghan unit, the 38th Commando Brigade, was decimated near the town of Urgun. One battalion was wiped out, and the remainder of the unit deserted to the resistance. This defeat represented a major setback to Soviet efforts to reconstruct the Afghan army.

In late summer, the mujahidin again stepped up pressure in Paktia and Paktika Provinces. During August and September many isolated government outposts in these provinces deserted or were overrun. Major cantonments at Urgun, Khowst, and Jaji Maidan were brought under seige. Although no important towns fell to the mujahidin during the September attacks, the fighting highlighted the growing strength of the resistance in this region and reflected increasing tactical coordination among mujahidin bands inside Afghanistan.

This past year has been marked by increased mujahidin success in convoy interdiction. Resistance efforts in Paktia and Paktika Provinces were significantly boosted by the interdiction of Soviet and regime resupply convoys traveling through the Lowgar Valley. Although additional government military posts have been set up along the major highways to protect the convoys, the mujahidin have proven increasingly skilled in the use of mines and in preventing convoy movement. The road through the Lowgar Valley—which begins just south of Kabul and is the primary land route from Kabul to Paktia and Paktika Provinces—has been a particular problem for the Soviets. Soviet/Afghan convoys were repeatedly ambushed with heavy losses, often forcing the convoys to return to Kabul. Security in the Shomali region south of the Salang Tunnel on the road to Kabul also has posed a major problem for the Soviets. Traffic through this area, the principal line of communications between the Soviet border and Kabul, is often halted for days.

The insurgents likewise have become more efficient this year in combating Soviet air power—Moscow's most effective weapon. Using heavy machineguns, the mujahidin have become adept at downing Soviet MiGs and helicopters. The resistance has capably employed heavy machineguns during attacks on convoys and claims its successes have forced Soviet/regime helicopters to fly at high altitudes, thus reducing their ability to support the ground forces. Although there have been isolated reports of surface-to-air missiles in the hands of the resistance, such weapons are still limited. The presence of a few missiles, however, is sufficient to compel Soviet/Afghan pilots to be more cautious.

A disturbing trend has been the increasing use of reprisal attacks in response to mujahidin successes. The level of violence against the civilian population by Soviet firepower has reached new heights. Attacks against Soviet convoys have led to the destruction of nearby villages, cultivated fields and orchards, and the execution of male inhabitants. In July, Soviet forces executed 20-30 elders in the provincial capital of Ghazni in reprisal for the deaths of several Soviet personnel. In October, following a series of hit-and-run attacks on convoys outside Qandahar, reprisals were launched against villages in the area resulting in significant destruction and the deaths of some 100 civilians.

In the Shomali region, the sustained bombing of villages has created virtual free-fire zones along the highway. The vineyards and orchards of what was once the showcase of Afghan agriculture have suffered irreparable damage from repeated Soviet attacks. In late October during a Soviet/Afghan operation in the Shomali, at least half of the historic town of Istalef was leveled by aerial bombardment and artillery shellings in reprisal for Soviet losses in the area. Civilian casualties totaled several hundred women and children were bayoneted and village elders shot.

NEGOTIATIONS AND CEASE-FIRE

A new tactic adopted this past year has been the attempted negotiation of ceasefires between resistance groups and the Soviets. While many have quickly broken down, one prolonged highly publicized cease-fire was in the Panjsher Valley—which opens onto the vital Salang pass route between Kabul and the Soviet border. The Panjsher truce, arranged between the mujahidin leader Mahsud and the Soviets without the participation of the Karmal government, reveals the strengths and weaknesses of both the Soviets and the resistance.

The Panjsher cease-fire began in March and officially ended in August, but the valley remains quiet. Coming after six large-scale and costly Soviet Panjsher Valley campaigns over the past 3 years, the truce promised to free Soviet troops for duty elsewhere by reducing the Soviet presence in the valley to token level. At the same time, it provided Mahsud an opportunity to consolidate his position and develop his logistical and economic base and harvest a vital food crop. This cease-fire has also enabled Mahsud to resupply and train his forces and to expand his organization and operations well beyond the Panjsher Valley. In recent months Mahsud's forces have been conducting operations outside the valley in Konduz, Paghman, and the Shomali region.

SOVIET CASUALTIES AND POW'S

Soviet casualties since December 1979 now total at least 17-20,000 killed and wounded. General dissatisfaction with conditions in Afghanistan have prompted a number of Soviet troops to desert. Accounts of indiscipline, drug usage, and black marketing—including the sale of weapons and ammunition—are numerous.

In the early period of the Afghanistan war, there were very few prisoners taken on either side, but now various resistance groups hold Soviet prisoners of war. In 1982 the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) was able to work out an agreement among the Karmal regime, the Soviet Union, Pakistan, Switzerland, and the Afghan resistance whereby Soviet prisoners of war captured in Afghanistan and held by the resistance would be taken to Switzerland for internment for 2 years. At the end of their internment, the prisoners would be turned over to the ICRC by the Swiss Government for repatriation. In February 1983 the president of the ICRC told the press that the ICRC would not participate in the forced repatriation to the U.S.S.R. of Soviet prisoners interned in Switzerland. In July one of the eight Soviet prisoners interned under this agreement escaped to West Germany where he is seeking political asylum. Another Soviet soldier arrived in Switzerland on October 28.

Two Soviet army privates from Afghanistan arrived in the United States as refugees on November 28. Their resettlement is being assisted by a private voluntary agency.

POPULAR SUPPORT FOR THE RESISTANCE

Popular support for the mujahidin remains high even though the fighting has brought destruction and reprisals on civilians, has disrupted social services and administration in most of the country, and has contributed to competition for food supplies. Local populations continue to provide the mujahidin with shelter, food and recruits. Casualties among civilians and the resistance fighters have not reduced mujahidin activities, and morale remains high.

It is impossible to assess the exact number of mujahidin since the numbers fluctuate according to the season and in relationship to the level of Soviet operations in specific areas. Loosely organized in some six main organizations and several smaller groups, the resistance forces operating out of Peshawar are split into two alliances—the moderates and fundamentalists—both calling themselves the "Islamic Unity of Afghan mujahidin." Despite ongoing efforts—mainly by groups in Peshawar—to promote unity, disagreements between groups, including armed attacks upon each other, are not infrequent.

Allegiance of the fighting groups operating in Afghanistan to headquarters in Peshawar is often flexible and contingent on a continuation of adequate supplies. In the past, only a few of the fundamentalist groups in Peshawar have exercised significant operational control over affiliated units in Afghanistan. However, the major mujahidin offensive in Paktia and Paktika Provinces during September and October was conducted by groups with direct links to Sayed Ahmad Gailani, leader of a moderate group in Peshawar.

Tactical cooperation among mujahidin groups inside Afghanistan has increased during this past year. This has been evident in the Shomali region and in attacks conducted inside the capital. Moreover, Mujahidin operations in Paktia and Paktika Provinces have been supported by other resistance groups who have interdicted Soviet/regime convoys traveling through the Lowgar Valley.

While the mujahidin have demonstrated increasing military effectiveness and cooperation this year, the resistance is still plagued by internal divisions and factional fighting. No nationwide resistance organization has yet evolved that is capable of coordinating activities throughout the country, and progress toward organizational and logistical coordination is slowed by serious territorial and ideological rivalries.

Both moderate and fundamentalist alliances have problems of organization. The spring of 1938 witnessed an effort to forestall the fragmentation of the Peshawar-based fundamentalist groups. In May, seven of these groups appointed Professor Abdul Rasal Sayaf, the leader of a minor group, to a 2-year alliance presidency. Despite this mediation, however, internal strains continue within the fundamentalist alliance as some groups accuse others of being more interested in expanding their own power bases than in fighting the Soviets.

Supply shortage remains another serious problem for the resistance. Although small arms appear to be available in sufficient numbers, ammunition, medicines, and frequently food are sometimes critically short. Resistance leaders frequently mention to the media and others the need for increased supplies of heavy machineguns and weapons such as mines and rocket grenades for use against armored vehicles. Nonetheless, this year the resistance has registered a higher kill ratio against Soviet aircraft, increased ability to challenge the Soviet policy of urban control, and continued success in operations against Soviet bases and supply lines.

Participation of Iranian-based Afghans in the resistance has also increased in recent months, although the Iranian Government exercises tight control over cross-border activites. The primary beneficiaries of the limited Iranian support have been the Shia groups in Afghanistan.

The most dramatic new development this year, involving an initiative to organize the resistance more effectively, was an appeal by ex-King Zahir Shah in June concerning the need to create a united organization capable of speaking on behalf of the Afghan people. The timing of the ex-king's announcement stemmed from growing concerns that representatives of the Afghan people have not been included in the UN-mediated indirect negotiations in Geneva and frustration over inability to create a united resistance organization. Zahir Shah expressed his willingness "to better coordinate our resistance activities and to better represent them in international conferences and activities." At the same time he also stated that he had no personal ambitions and did not want to reestablish the monarchy.

In August, following consultations with the ex-king, the three groups belonging to the moderate alliance announced the establishment of a "United Front for the Liberation of Afghanistan." Its sponsors called on Zahir Shah to "take necessary measures" to obtain international recognition of a 12-man committee set up to oversee implementation of the united front. The moderates hope that this involvement will provide a rallying point and give new visibility to the Afghan cause, thus increasing their effectiveness in the international arena.

Provisions were made for the accession of other resistance groups to the united front with the same rights as the founding members, thus leaving the door open to participation by the fundamentalists. Although the latter have to date publicly eschewed involvement in any organization involving the ex-king, if Zahir Shah's initiative gains momentum, it could eventually receive some fundamentalist support.

ACCELERATION OF THE GOVERNMENT'S PROBLEMS

As the Afghan resistance against Soviet occupation enters its fifth year, the Soviet-sponsored Babrak Karmal regime faces continued widespread popular dissatisfaction. Most observers feel that the regime could not survive without Soviet military support.

Attacks on Soviet and regime offficials are common even in areas claimed to be under government control, and Soviet personnel need extremely tight personal security because of the constant threat of kidnaping and assassination. Increased Soviet brutality against civilians has, moreover, undermined the intense Soviet/regime propaganda campaign portraying the Soviets as peacekeepers and Karmal himself as a beloved and democractically chosen leader.

The Karmal regime has been unable to expand its influence beyond a small coterie of party loyalists, who themselves are divided into warring factions. Factionalism and corruption are serious obstacles for the regime, and steps by the dominant Parcham faction to heal the deep divisions within the party and promote a National Fatherland Front have not been successful. The 12th Party Plenum in early July revealed continuing rifts. Addressing the plenum, Karmal observed that previous decisions had not been fully implemented, a situation which he blamed on "lack of unity, disorganization, lack of ability, and fatalism."

Serious clashes have occurred between the Parcham and Khalq factions, including a confrontation in mid-August near Herat in which more than 100 persons were reported killed. In mid-May, an argument over a military promotion list favoring Parcham officers led to a violent altercation between Minister of Defense Abdul Qader and his Khalq deputy, Major General Khalilullah, who physically assaulted Qader.

Soviet dissatisfaction with Karmal over his inability to unite the warring factions also has surfaced. Rumors have abounded throughout much of the year that a major shift in leadership was imminent. A Cabinet reshuffle in October may have reflected an attempt to alleviate some of the intragovernmental strains. Open Soviet preference for the Parchamis could, however, exacerbate tensions in the party. In early 1983, for example, a money-market scandal involving Soviet advisers and high-level Parchamis was publicized by the Khalq faction in an effort to enhance its own position.

The Afghan intelligence and security organization, KHAD, has been largely ineffective in its efforts to counter the insurgency and ensure loyalty in the military and among the general populace, and its operations have added to the fear and distrust permeating Afghan society. KHAD responsibilities include counterinsurgency, military intelligence, security for Afghan VIPs and official installatons, and foreign intelligence and covert action. Organized under Soviet direction, KHAD is designed to assist the Afghan communists in setting up the same kinds of party and government institutions used by the U.S.S.R. to control its own population. The Soviet presence pervades the KHAD leadership, and the KGB continues to play a significant role in training and operations.

KHAD, however, shares in the internecine Parcham-Khalq competition resulting in factionalism, fear, and incompetence within the organization itself. Intraparty violence, moreover, frequently overlaps with mujahidin operations and obscures responsibility for violent acts. Agents in the Parcham-dominated KHAD often provide information enabling the mujahidin to assassinate Khalq party members. The Khalqis play a reciprocal game with the Parchamis. KHAD activities also have contributed to the already low morale with the Afghan military.

It is widely believed in Pakistan that KHAD has sent its agents among refugees to foment discord in the camps and to stir up trouble between the refugees and their Pakistani hosts. Nearly 3 million Afghans now live in Pakistan; the inevitable conflicts over access to land, grazing rights, and social services make fertile ground for KHAD mischief. KHAD agents also are suspected of having infiltrated Afghan resistance organizations based in Peshawar to gain intelligence on mujahidin activities and to exacerbate divisions among the resistance groups. KHAD agents are believed to have fueled Shia-Sunni religious conflicts especially in border areas of Pakistan's Northwest Frontier Province where most of the refugees have settled, and to have supported the tribal Baluch separatist movement in Baluchistan Province.

In 1983 KHAD was significantly strenghtened in an effort to exert greater control over the Afghan civilian population, particularly in the cities. The organization, which now includes between 15-20,000 personnel, is widely recognized as being responsible for prisoner interrogation. Amnesty International—which has appealed to Babrak Karmal to stop torture, arbitrary arrest, and secret trials which deny defendants the right of defense—issued a report in early November citing systematic torture of prisoners. Based on interviews with ex-prisoners and their relatives, the Amnesty International report said those tortured include civil servants, teachers, teenage students, and persons arrested as a warning to others—as well as those actually associated with armed resistance to the regime.

The decline in security this year is only one aspect of Afghanistan's grave internal plight. Domestic opposition to the Soviet presence and to the Karmal regime also has accelerated the trend toward economic and administrative chaos which will take years to repair. The country's social and economic infrastructure has been decimated, and in 1983 the Afghan Government approached the International Monetary Fund seeking credits. Social services, agricultural production, and industrial output continue to suffer reverses, and inflation is estimated at around 20%-25%.

In a speech before the UN General Assembly (UNGA) on October 6, Afghanistan's Foreign Minister Mohammad Dost acknowledged the impact of resistance activity on the Afghan economy. He stated that "50 per cent of the country's schools, 14 per cent of our hospitals, 75 per cent of our public transportation vehicles, all communications cables and significant numbers of other public installations have been destroyed." He noted that the damage to the economy totaled $287 million or roughly half of the total investment during the 20 years before the 1978 revolution.

The continued refugee exodus is another impediment to the functioning of social and educational services, as well as the business sector. Reduction of the work force by the continuing flight of refugees, particularly the middle class, has had a similarly negative impact. Shortages of raw materials and manpower as well as lack of security have forced many industrial units to close. Mujahidin operations, moreover, have damaged power facilities and disrupted the flow of petroleum products to urban areas. Most utility projects planned before the Soviet invasion remain uncompleted.

The Afghan economy is increasingly linked with the Soviet Union. In a recent speech at the military academy, Babrak Karmal indicated that the value of trade between the U.S.S.R. and Afghanistan will increase threefold between 1983 and 1987. He noted that more than half of the country's industrial output comes from facilities built with Soviet aid.

Despite other problems, the natural gas industry continues to function more or less normally, due in part to the proximity of the Sheberghan gas fields to the Soviet border. Babrak Karmal claims that revenues from the sale of natural gas amount to 40% of Afghanistan's total exports, but the figure is probably much higher. Afghanistan uses its revenues from gas sales to reduce its debt to the U.S.S.R. and as barter for Soviet machinery and other goods. Afghanistan also exports dried fruit, raisins, and skins and remains a major source of opium; trade in the latter commodity being conducted by Soviet soldiers, as well as by Afghan citizens.

The war's impact on agricultural production varies widely from province to province. Although the Soviet/regime forces have destroyed crops and depopulated many food-producing areas near highways, the country has generally remained self-sufficient in food. Shortages have been experienced mainly in urban areas as a result of swelling urban populations and the interdiction of road transportation by the resistance. Kabul's population now stands at 1.8 million in contrast to 600,000 in 1979; as a result Kabul is increasingly dependent on imported foodstuffs such as wheat, cooking oil, and sugar. Other basic commodities, including medicines, also are generally in very short supply.

The Soviet Union has supplied food and other commodities to meet the basic needs of the cities. In November, for example, the Soviet Union announced agreement to provide Afghanistan with 20,000 tons of wheat immediately and a further 180,000 tons over the next year. According to official press reports from Kabul, half of the wheat would be given as a grant and the other half sold in Kabul in exchange for Afghan goods. This significant increase—115,000 tons of wheat were supplied from the Soviet Union in 1982 and 74,000 tons in 1981—illustrates both increased food shortages and growing reliance on the Soviet Union as a supplier. Although the food supply improved somewhat this year over 1982, a shortfall is again expected during the winter.

PROBLEMS IN THE MILITARY

The Soviets have failed to rebuild the Afghan army, comprised of 40-50,000 men, into an effective military force. Its size is far short of the regime goal and far less than the 90,000 in the Afghan military in 1978. Morale and discipline remain low and the army continues to experience desertions at about the same rate as it gains new conscripts. Many conscripts, in fact, desert and are reconscripted repeatedly. The desertion rate—up to 80% reported in some units—is higher in the less secure and more contested areas of the country.

As a result of recruiting problems and desertions, reservists during 1983 were once again retained beyond their legal release date. Revised draft laws promulgated in August, in concert with a massive conscription drive, further reduced exemptions from military service and increased the flight of eligible men from the country or into rural areas. These latest changes have led to the recall of men who completed their military service as late as 1980. The regime employs the talashi—in which an entire village or section of a city is cordoned off and a house-to-house search conducted for conscripts, weapons, or mujahidin. Following an intensive conscription drive in Kabul during October, Interior Minister Gulabjoi protested that the drafting of recent reservists would severely disrupt the economy.

In addition to problems of low morale and inadequate training and equipment, the army suffers from lack of a skilled officer corps. Many senior officers were killed following the 1978 coup, and the army has been unable to fill this professional vacuum. As part of the effort to rebuild the Afghan armed forces, military personnel annually numbering in the thousands have been sent to the Soviet Union for training. In addition, Soviet advisers serve at all levels of the Afghan army. The Soviet presence has caused considerable problems. As in previous years, during 1983 there were instances of Afghan troops turning on their Soviet advisers.

The Afghan military, which is dominated by the Khalq faction, is further weakened by Khalq-Parcham animosity, with the Khalqis generally taking the view that the Parchamis have sold out to Moscow. The Parchamis in turn suspect the Khalqis of disloyalty and have moved to limit Khalq authority in the officer corps and the military schools.

Despite such problems, Moscow may still have ambitious long-range regional plans for the Afghan military. In 1982, in an interview published by the Yugoslav news agency Tanjug, Afghan Minister of Defense Abdul Qader asserted that the Afghan army will have a significant future role, similar to that played by the Cuban and Vietnamese armies. Tanjug also quoted a 1981 statement by Babrak Karmal that, "Not far away is the day when our army will become a strong and energetic army capable of defending peace and security not only in Afghanistan, but in the region as well."

THE REFUGEES

At year's end 2.9 million Afghan refugees were in Pakistan, according to official Government of Pakistan figures, while an estimated 650,000 Afghan refugees were in Iran. (About 850,000 Afghans worked in Iran before 1979, bringing the present total of Afghans in Iran to roughly 1.5 million.) Before the Soviet invasion, some 14–17 million persons lived in Afghanistan, meaning that between one-fifth and one-fourth of the country's population has now been displaced outside its borders.

Although the refugee exodus has slowed down, it continues steadily, picking up when fighting becomes heavier or when food supplies are particularly scarce. This fall, for example, fighting in Paktia and Paktika Provinces caused a new flight into Pakistan's North Waziristan and Kurram Agencies along the Afghan border. A campaign by the Kabul regime to convince refugees that it is safe for them to return to Afghanistan has been a complete failure. Increasingly harsh Soviet reprisals against civilians suspected of collaborating with the mujahidin will no doubt increase the refugee flow into Pakistan and Iran.

In addition to those persons who have left Afghanistan, an undetermined number have been displaced within the country itself as fighting and destruction have driven people into urban areas. Since the Soviet invasion, the Kabul population, for example, has expanded by an estimated 1.2 million despite the exodus from the city of large numbers of businessmen and other professionals.

Loss of much of the country's educated elite and work force has had a serious negative impact on the Afghan economy. Furthermore, changes in the country's ethnic balance and destruction of the educational and social infrastructure have combined with the loss of educated professionals to create social problems that will endure for many years to come.

The UNHCR has, with the assistance of the Government of Pakistan, undertaken an international relief program for the refugees in Pakistan which includes basic housing and health and educational services. Despite the heavy burden the refugee influx has placed on Pakistan, the refugees have been welcomed and good rapport continues between them and their hosts. Pakistani assistance to the refugees includes some cash allowances to individuals and payment of relief administration costs. Contributions from several other countries and international voluntary agencies have greatly assisted this program.

The Afghan refugees in Iran have not been handled in any systematic way and there have been no international relief efforts there.

Most of the Afghan refugees are Pathan and, therefore, feel comfortable in the Pathan-dominated Northwest Frontier Province (NWFP). Due to the large concentration of refugees in the Northwest Frontier Province, however, Pakistani authorities began in 1982 to move refugees into new camps in less populated parts of the adjacent non-Pathan Punjab Province. Efforts to move the refugees increase the possibility of conflicts between the refugees and their hosts. Nonetheless, more than 40,000 Afghans were relocated from the NWFP in order to relieve population pressures and provide better living conditions. Large numbers, subsequently left the Punjab to return to Pakistan-Afghanistan border areas citing adverse climatic conditions in the south and a desire to remain close to their homeland.

Pakistani authorities continue seeking ways in which to manage the massive refugee population to the advantage of all concerned. President Zia has reaffirmed his commitment to a political solution including repatriation, and the Government of Pakistan adheres to a ruling by the Organization of the Islamic Conference that no member country should deal with the Karmal regime.

Working through the UNHCR, the World Food Program, and a variety of voluntary agencies, the U.S. Government continues to share in the international assistance program. Since 1980, the United States has contributed more than $300 million to Afghan refugee relief. During fiscal year 1983, the United States contributed $80 million to support Afghan refugees in Pakistan, including $49 million through the WFP. The U.S. contribution represents some 35% of the total UNHCR budget and about 50% of the international food contribution.

SOVIET STRATEGY

The Soviets have failed to reduce the level of the insurgency, but they do not seem to have changed their long-term goals or altered their overall strategy in Afghanistan. Their troop strength remains at approximately 105,000 men. Furthermore, they seem to believe, perhaps erroneously, that in terms of the international reaction, the worst is over. While Afghanistan has proved to be a far knottier problem than Moscow originally envisaged, the Soviets seem to judge that the costs are bearable and that in the long run they will be able to wear down the insurgency.

If anything, Moscow's commitment to preserving a pro-Soviet, Marxist-dominated regime in Kabul appears to have grown over the last 4 years as the Soviets have come to view Afghanistan as a test of their credibility. Despite constant rumors, the Soviets evidently are unprepared to replace Babrak Karmal, probably because no viable alternative exists.

The Soviets appear to be trying to impose a Soviet-style political and economic system. Their efforts, however, have been frustrated by the unsettled conditions in the countryside. Still, where possible, the Soviets have introduced changes aimed to increase the central government's control and security. Afghan Government and party officials are routinely sent to the U.S.S.R. for training and indoctrination.

The Afghan economy has been progressively integrated into the Eastern bloc. Afghanistan was an observer at the October 1983 council meeting of the Council for Mutual Economic Assistance in Havana. Last spring, TASS announced that the U.S.S.R. was the main trading partner of the Democratic Republic of Afghanistan. The Soviets control Afghanistan's natural gas industry, virtually all Afghan gas going to the U.S.S.R. to serve Kabul's Soviet debt. Moscow's current ambassador to Afghanistan was previously the first secretary of the Tartar Autonomous Soviet Socialist Republic where he oversaw the development of the West Siberian oil and gas fields.

Since the invasion, 10–20,000 Afghan students have been educated in the U.S.S.R. Moscow considers this program sufficiently important to exempt the students from military service in Afghanistan. There has been a steady stream of articles in Soviet academic journals and the national press comparing Afghanistan with the U.S.S.R.'s Central Asian republics, where final pacification and integration took a similar form.

In their approach to Afghan tribal and nationality problems, the Soviets have taken another page out of their own Central Asian experience as they pursue a policy of divide and rule. The Karmal regime's strategy has been to offer large sums of money, weapons, and privileges as an inducement to tribes and villages to abandon the resistance and to obstruct mujhidin activity. It was the failure of this program—with previously neutral tribal groups joining the resistance instead—that contributed to the government setbacks in Paktia and Paktika Provinces this year.

In recent months the regime has widely publicized the surrender of mujahidin groups under an official amnesty program. The resistance, however, discourages potential collaborators from aiding the regime by regularly using assassination and other forms of retaliation against government supporters. Mujahidin frequently accept arms and cash subsidies from the government only to return to the resistance after a few months. To date no major sustained defections from the mujahidin to the regime have occurred.

STATUS OF THE UN-SPONSORED NEGOTIATIONS

UN efforts to help negotiate a solution to the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan date from a November 1980 resolution by the UN General Assembly. The then Secretary General, Kurt Waldheim, appointed Perez de Cuellar as this personal representative to see if the United Nations could play an active and useful role in negotiations concerning Afghanistan. When Perez de Cuellar succeeded Waldheim, he followed the same formula and appointed Diego Cordovez, UN Under Secretary General for Special Political Affairs, to act for him on the problem.

Cordovez shuttled between Kabul and Islamabad in April 1982 and gained agreement for a round of indirect talks between Pakistan and Afghanistan which were held in Geneva that June. Iran decided not to participate formally but agreed to be kept informed and thus associated with the talks.

Following these discussions, the United Nations, Pakistan, and Afghanistan all issued positive statements and indicated that there was a measure of flexibility in the negotiating positions of both sides. Kabul apparently agreed in principle to allow the subject of troop withdrawal to be part of the negotiating package and to accept the idea that at some point the refugees must be consulted on the conditions of their return. Cordovez announced in a press conference that he kept a written record of the understandings that he has reached and that he would work from these texts in subsequent discussions.

From January 21 to February 7, 1983, Cordovez again visited the area to refine the text of the agreement. His consultations dealt with four items previously identified for consideration: withdrawal of foreign troops from Afghanistan; noninterference and nonintervention; international guarantees of a final settlement; and voluntary return of the refugees.

During Perez de Cuellar's March visit to Moscow, he and Cordovez exchanged views on the Afghanistan situation with both Chairman Andropov and Foreign Minister Gromyko. According to the Secretary General, the Soviet Government expressed itself strongly in favor of a political settlement and supported a continuation of his efforts.

A second round of indirect talks took place in Geneva from April 11 to April 22, 1983. Cordovez met separately with the Pakistani and Afghan Foreign Ministers and with Soviet observers daily to further develop the text of a possible agreement. Once again Cordovez also kept Iran informed of the discussions. At the conclusion of this round, there were suggestions that a breakthrough might be possible.

After consultations with the capitals concerned, another round of indirect talks took place in Geneva from June 12 to 24, 1983. Although the parties reportedly made progress in defining the nature of a comprehensive settlement—its principles and objectives, the interrelationship among its four components, and the provisions for its implementation—the talks stalled on the crucial issue of the Soviets' unwillingness to provide a timetable for troop withdrawal from Afghanistan. Although the parties had agreed that Cordovez should visit the region in September for further discussions, Perez de Cuellar decided in late summer that such a visit at that time would not be productive.

On November 23, the UNGA again passed a resolution urging immediate withdrawal of all foreign troops from Afghanistan by a vote of 116 to 20, with 17 abstentions—the largest majority since the Soviet invasion nearly 4 years ago. This was the fifth time since January 1980 that the UNGA had called for a troop withdrawal from Afghanistan, each time by overwhelming margins.

Also during the UNGA, Perez de Cuellar and Cordovez met informally with both the Pakistani and Afghan Foreign Ministers to explore conditions for resuming the diplomatic process. On November 30, the United Nations announced that Cordovez would continue the diplomatic process by further negotiations in Islamabad, Kabul, and Tehran at a mutually convenient date.

Mr. MATHIAS. Will the Senator yield for just a brief comment?

Mr. BYRD. I yield the floor.

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, the Senator has referred to the desperate conditions of the people in Afghanistan. I thought he would be interested in knowing that at 5 o'clock this afternoon there will be in the Secretary's office a group of three French doctors who are the only humanitarian workers who have been allowed by Afghan elements to treat the residents of villages and members of the resistance in the remote parts of Afghanistan. I urge the Senator and all others who would like to meet these remarkable people to come meet them.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the Senator for making that announcement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 201) was agreed to.

The preamble was agreed to.

The resolution, and the preamble, are as follows:

S. RES. 201

Whereas the accumulated evidence indicates that the Soviet Union is engaged in the use and/or provision of chemical warfare agents in Southeast Asia and Afghanistan;

Whereas this finding is based upon investigations conducted by the United States Government and by other governments and international organizations such as the United Nations and the Governments of Canada and France; and

Whereas such activities are in contravention of arms control agreements signed and ratified by the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved. That it is the sense of the Senate that the United States should immediately seek to—

(a) urge that other governments carefully assess the evidence and, where possible, conduct their own independent investigations of suspected chemical warfare;

(b) assist the United Nations to gain unhindered access for United Nations investigators to areas where chemical and toxin weapons use is suspected; and

(c) negotiate with the Soviet Union and other nations the strengthening of existing agreements on chemical, biological, and toxin weapons so as to provide effective mechanisms for assuring compliance, to include provision for on-demand, onsite inspection when necessary.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. BYRD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

RETIREMENT AGE FOR JUDGES

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The bill clerk read as follows:

A bill (H.R. 3655) to raise the retirement age for judges of the Superior Court of the District of Columbia and judges of the District of Columbia Court of Appeals.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill which had been reported from the Committee on Governmental Affairs with an amendment at the end of the bill insert:

SEC. 2. That section 903 of title 11 of the District of Columbia Code is amended by striking out "forty-three" and inserting in lieu thereof "fifty".

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, I support the adoption of this urgently needed legislation.

H.R. 3655 accomplished two goals. First, it will increase the number of judges on the Superior Court of the District of Columbia by seven. The addition of seven judges will greatly help the court to meet its caseload. In hearings held last April before he Senate D.C. Appropriations Subcommittee, chaired by our distinguished colleague Senator ARLEN SPECTER, superior court officials testified that pending caseloads were at an all-time high, with no relief in sight. The resulting strain put on the judicial system means not only longer working hours for court personnel. It means delayed completion of individual cases raising the spectre of speedy trial violations; it means increasing burdens on already overburdened local jails; it means a basic lack of judicial efficiency in the local courts of the Nation's Capital. The situation is beyond the ability of the court to manage, despite all of the in-house measures that have been taken to alleviate and deal with the problems. Without the addition of more judges, the court's caseload cannot be managed and the current backlog will continue to grow.

Mr. President, the second purpose of H.R. 3566 is to increase the mandatory retirement age of D.C. judges—on both the superior court and the District of Columbia Court of Appeals—to age 74 from age 70. This will also help the court to address its backlog by enabling its more experienced judges to remain on the court for an additional 4 years.

The Budget Committee has alerted the Governmental Affairs Committee that H.R. 3655 contains authorizations for fiscal year 1984 which were reported after the May 15 deadline contained in section 402(a) of the Budget Act. It was not the intent of the committee to ignore this deadline. The Budget Committee has acknowledged the importance of this legislation in light of the District of Columbia's overburdened court system. The purpose of the May 15 deadline is to encourage timely consideration of authorization legislation so as to avoid hindering the appropriations process. Since that was clearly not the case here, the Budget Committee has generously consented to refrain from raising a point of order against H.R. 3655.

Mr. President, in closing, I would like to urge that my colleagues approve this important and timely legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the engrossment of the committee amendment and third reading of the bill.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. MATHIAS. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

HONORING DR. WILLIAM R. AND DOROTHY JANE WOOD

The resolution (S. Res. 337) honoring Dr. William R. and Dorothy Jane Wood, was considered, and agreed to as follows:

S. RES. 337

Whereas Doctor William R. Wood serve as president of the University of Alaska from 1960 to 1973;

Whereas Doctor William R. Wood, and his wife Dorothy Jane, since his retirement, remained in Fairbanks and have devoted their time to community projects including the Fairbanks Industrial Development Council and Festival 1984;

Whereas Doctor William R. Wood served as mayor of the city of Fairbanks from 1978 to 1980;

Whereas Doctor William R. Wood and his wife Dorothy Jane have been active in Fairbanks and Alaska public affairs since their arrival in Alaska twenty-four years ago; and

Whereas the city of Fairbanks is designating the week of February 5, 1984, as "William R. and Dorothy Jane Wood Appreciation Week": Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the United States Senate joins with the people of Fairbanks in saluting Doctor and Mrs. Wood for their contributions to the community of Fairbanks.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, this resolution recognizes a distinguished Alaskan educator and his wife who have left their mark not only on the university they served, but on their community as well. The resolution recognizes the contributions of Dr. William R. Wood and his wife Dorothy Jane as Fairbanks, Alaska, their hometown for the past 24 years, honors them with William R. and Dorothy Jane Wood Appreciation Week.

Dr. William R. Wood has had a full career in education and public service. It has included Federal Government service, public school teaching and administering, service in the Navy during World War II where he rose to the rank of captain, and of course, many, many years in academia.

During the 1920's and 1930's he played professional basketball. He continued his education, earning his Ph. D. from the University of Iowa in 1939.

Following World War II, Bill returned to his home State of Illinois for several years. After that, and before joining academia, he served 4 years in the U.S. Office of Education. From that time on he consulted on a regular basis on higher education development, particularly as it pertained to Pacific rim nations. He has regularly served as a consultant on education to the Department of State on Indonesia, Colombia, and Vietnam.

In 1954 Bill started his travels West which in 1960 would lead him to Fairbanks where he has remained ever since. He went to the University of Nevada where he was vice president, and for almost 2 years, acting president.

By this time, most people would say that Bill Wood had had a complete career. Rather than rest on his laurels he headed for Alaska in 1960 where he took over the helm of the University of Alaska, a position he held until his retirement from academic life, but not from public service, in 1973.

During Dr. Wood's tenure at the university, it expanded from 921 full-time students to 2,828 in 1973. The year he retired, 900 students graduated from the university system, almost as many as had been students when he started.

I used the word "system," to describe the university at Bill's retirement. That is because during the 31 years he achieved his goal of making the university a statewide system which reached all Alaska citizens. When he retired, the university had in addition to the Fairbanks campus, major campuses in Anchorage and Juneau. The number of community colleges had doubled from 4 to 8; 23,000 people were taking some kind of instructional program from the university.

The Fairbanks campus saw some major changes during those 13 years. In addition to the construction program which saw the addition of 17 major buildings including several dormitories, the fine arts complex which includes the Elmer E. Rasmusen Library, classroom buildings, and the Elvey geophysical building, the academic program expanded considerably. Nine research institutes were established during that time. The musk ox and fisheries programs were established. All in all, the university went from being a small single campus school to a major university system available to all of Alaska's citizens.

During this time he and Dorothy Jane raised a family. They now have, by last count, seven grandchildren. Dorothy Jane has involved herself in the Fairbanks community since her arrival. She has been a violinist with the Fairbanks Symphony Orchestra and has been active in Fairbanks gardening and beautification projects as well as many volunteer civic and community organizations.

Throughout his years at the university, Bill involved himself in community affairs. During those years he was very active in the Rotary in Fairbanks where at different times he served as secretary and president.

When Bill retired in 1973, rather than leaving for warmer climates which many Alaskans retirees do, he stayed in Fairbanks and became even more involved in Fairbanks and Alaskan affairs.

He set up, with some others, a small international consulting firm specializing in Pacific rim development. This continued an interest he has had in the Pacific rim for many years as evidenced by his work with the State Department. He served from 1976 to 1980 as vice president of the Fairbanks Industrial Development Corp. which worked to foster investment in Fairbanks.

In 1978 Dr. Wood was elected mayor of Fairbanks, a position he served in until 1980. In 1980, along with others, he formed the Festival 1984 organization which is working on Alaska's celebration of its 25th year of Statehood.

One measure of Alaska's respect for Bill Wood was the granting of honorary membership in Pioneers of Alaska—a very rare honor. Membership usually requires 30 years residence in Alaska. I want to assure you that that rule is very strictly adhered to so the action was no small honor.

Dr. Wood has not only been honored by his fellow Alaskans. In 1971 Liberia honored him with its Star of Africa award, that nation's highest honor given to a noncitizen. The University of Iowa gave him their Distinguished Alumnus Award. He is also a member of the Explorers Club.

Mr. President, you can see from this brief recitation what a distinguished career Dr. William R. Wood has had, not only in Alaska, but also in the world. I thank my colleagues for joining me and my colleague from Alaska in passing this resolution recognizing Dr. Wood's contributions to his city, his State, and his Nation.

The Anchorage Times, on February 3, 1984, printed an editorial praising Dr. Wood's contributions to Alaska. I ask unanimous consent that the editorial be printed following these remarks.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Anchorage Times, Feb. 3, 1984]

THANK YOU, DR. WOOD

Among Fairbanks' greatest treasures is Dr. William R. Wood, who has directed his life toward exemplary public service in the decade since his retirement as president of the University of Alaska.

Fairbanks plans a number of activities next week in Dr. Wood's honor to thank him for his enormous contributions to the betterment of the community.

Dr. Wood became president of the University of Alaska in 1960 after having been vice president of the University of Nevada. Little did Alaskans know then that he would stay around and eventually become one of the state's premier citizens.

During the 13 years of his presidency the statewide community college system was expanded, the university curriculum was enriched, the teaching staff increased, fundraising was accelerated and a tremendous building program was completed.

Since his retirement in 1973 he has served Fairbanks as mayor and as the unpaid executive director of the Fairbanks Industrial Development Corp.

His most recent challenge has been the chairmanship of Festival Fairbanks '84, which promises to be the piece de resistance in Alaska's observance of the silver anniversary of statehood.

Highlight of the city's celebration on Jan. 3 was the reunion of members of the Alaska Statehood Committee and delegates to the Constitutional Convention. Dr. Wood conceived, planned and coordinated the event, which will live long in the memories of those who were there.

The fruits of his public service have been tasted far beyond the boundaries of Fairbanks.

When he came to the state, the university had a campus at Fairbanks and four community colleges. During his tenure, campuses were developed in Archorage and Juneau and the number of community colleges grew to eight. The Wood era also saw the establishment of several research facilities, which bring credit and benefit to the whole state.

Alaskans all over the state can join Fairbanks in a big "thank you" to Dr. Wood.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. BYRD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

RELIEF OF WILLIAM D. BENONI

The bill (H.R. 1557) for the relief of William D. Benoni, was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BAKER. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. BYRD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

ORDER TO PLACE H.R. 1750 ON THE CALENDAR

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I have a request now with respect to the discharge of a bill from the Judiciary Committee. I ask unanimous consent that the Judiciary Committee be discharged from further consideration of H.R. 1750, a bill for the release of Po Namyu Polama, and others, and I ask that the bill be placed on the calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

MISCELLANEOUS AMENDMENTS TO THE CIVIL SERVICE LAWS—H.R. 4336

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I would say next to the minority leader I am prepared to ask the Senate to turn to the consideration of H.R. 4336.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I have no objection.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I thank the minority leader. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate H.R. 4336, the civil service amendments bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be stated by title.

The bill clerk read as follows:

A bill (H.R. 4336) to make certain miscellaneous changes in laws relating to the civil service.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Senate will proceed to its immediate consideration.

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, H.R. 4336 makes miscellaneous amendments to the civil service laws. It is necessary to take this bill up at this time primarily because of the urgency involved with section 6 and section 7 of the bill, concerning respectively, the President's Commission on Executive Exchange and the Department of the Navy personnel demonstration project at China Lake and San Diego, Calif. Both the Commission's executive exchange and the Navy's demonstration project are highly innovative Federal programs which deserve our continued support. The Commission's authorization to utilize an Office of Personnel Management revolving loan fund expired on December 31, 1983, and this legislation reauthorizes the use of that fund. The Navy's authorization to continue operation of the demonstration project expires in June 1985, and this legislation would extend that authorization until September 30, 1990.

Additionally, I have three amendments which I am offering at this time. First, section 5 dealing with the Vacancies Act would be deleted because it makes substantive changes to existing law which need to be studied further. My second amendment would allow the President's Commission on Executive Exchange to continue to use an Office of Personnel Management revolving loan fund instead of establishing a new fund in the Treasury. Finally, amendment 3 would lift the 5,000-individual ceiling on the Navy's demonstration project because this cap has been reached and the Navy would like to add, initially, approximately 750 individuals.

Section 2 allows a retired administrative law judge to be reappointed for a specified period or for the period which may be necessary for the judge to conduct and complete the hearing and disposition of one or more specified cases. In supporting this provision, the Office of Personnel Management said it would be useful because agencies sometimes experience unexpected retirements and/or temporary increases in ALJ workload and could make effective use of retired administrative law judges in those cases. I agree.

Section 3 designates the chairman of the Federal Labor Relations Authority to be the chief executive officer of the Authority. This section is identical to S. 1664, ordered reported from the Government Affairs Committee on November 17, 1983. In would eliminate the ambiguity as to who has responsibility and authority for the management of internal administrative matters in the Authority.

This designation would insure that one individual is responsible and accountable for the sound management of the Authority. Accountability would be established for matters such as personnel management, fiscal management, general administrative support services, property management, procurement and contracts, and personnel property and document security, and management analysis and program evaluation. With the chairman functioning as head of the Authority for the management of internal administrative matters, the agency would have a single individual to look to for leadership and direction. The empowering of the chairman with this authority is not intended to diminish the powers and duties of the other members in matters relating to cases before them as prescribed in section 7105 of title 4, United States Code.

Section 4 clarifies the time period within which an exception to an arbitration award must be filed. This section defines the period that an arbitration award will be final and binding to be 30 days beginning on the date the award is served. Current law provides that the 30-day period for filing an exception runs from the date which is written on the award.

Section 5 amends the Vacancies Act which provides for the filling of a vacancy if an agency head or officer dies, resigns, or is sick or absent. In such a case, the first assistant would perform the duties until a successor is appointed or the absence or sickness stops, unless the President designates another individual to perform those duties. Under current law, a vacancy caused by death or resignation may be filled temporarily for not more than 30 days.

H.R. 4336 would make well intentioned changes to this act. However, on the basis of discussions with the House, OMB, the Federal Labor Relations Authority, and the Justice Department, I have an amendment to strike all of section 5 from the bill because these proposed changes to the Vacancies Act are substantive and require more study before they should be taken up by the full Senate.

Section 6 affects the President's Commission on Executive Exchange by defining training as including the private sector assignment of an employee in the executive exchange program meaning that employees would have to sign a service agreement prior to participating in the training. The service agreement must provide that the employee will remain in the service of the agency at the end of the training for a period of time equal to three times the length of the training and that the employee will pay the Government the cost of the training if they leave before the end of this period. The payment can be waived under certain circumstances. Additionally, section 6 permanently reestablishes a revolving fund for the executive exchange program in the Treasury of the United States.

I have an amendment to this section, requested by the President's Commission on Executive Exchange, which would allow the program to continue to use the OPM revolving fund instead of establishing a new fund in the Treasury.

Section 7 provides the authority for the Department of Navy to continue operation until September 30, 1990, of the personnel demonstration project at the Naval Weapons Center, China Lake, Calif. and the Naval Ocean Systems Center, San Diego, Calif.

I have a final amendment, requested by the Department of the Navy, which would lift the 5,000-individual ceiling currently imposed by section 4703(d)(1)(A), of title 5, United States Code.

AMENDMENT NO. 2708

(Purpose: to delete the matter relating to detail authority to fill certain vacancies; to remove the limitation on the number of individuals who may be included in the demonstration project authorized to be continued by the Department of the Navy, and to reauthorize the President's Commission on Executive Exchange to use the revolving fund which such commission was authorized to use before December 31, 1983)

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, next I have three amendments I offer on behalf of the distinguished Senator from Alaska (Mr. STEVENS) and I ask unanimous consent that they be considered en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment will be stated.

The bill clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Tennessee (Mr. BAKER), for Mr. STEVENS, proposes an amendment numbered 2708.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 4, beginning with line 1, strike out all through page 5, line 23, and redesignate the succeeding sections accordingly.

On page 7, line 9, strike out "implementation" and insert in lieu thereof "operation".

On page 7, line 11, strike out "and currently in operation".

On page 7, line 14, strike out "4703(d)(1)(B)" and insert in lieu thereof "4703(d)(1)".

On page 6, line 16, beginning with "There" strike out all through "which" on line 17, and insert in lieu thereof "The revolving fund referred to in section 1304(e)(1) of this title".

Mr. BINGAMAN. Mr. President; H.R. 4336, the "Civil Service Miscellaneous Amendments Act of 1983," was passed by the House of Representatives on November 16, 1983. This bill makes several necessary changes in existing Federal personnel law.

While all sections of this bill are important, I would like to highlight section 3 which makes the Chairman of the Federal Labor Relations Authority (FLRA) the chief executive and administrative officer of the Authority. This provision is needed to clarify the confusion which has existed since the creation of the FLRA in 1979.

The enabling legislation, the Civil Service Reform Act of 1978, does not indicate the relationship of the Chairman to the other two members of the Authority. As a result, the role of the Chairman particularly with respect to administrative authority in the agency is undefined. This lack of further description has contributed to certain administrative problems at the FLRA. While the three members and the General Counsel agreed by signed memorandum on May 20, 1982, to delegate to the Chairman "responsibility and authority for the management of internal administrative matters," there is a need to establish in law that the Chairman is the chief executive and administrative officer of the Authority. In carrying out this responsibility the Chairman has authority for the management of internal administrative matters, which include procurement, fiscal management, personnel management, and office services. This bill fulfills this need while in no way diminishing the authority of the other two members to carry out their case decisionmaking statutory responsibilities under 5 U.S.C. 7105.

Any attempt to invest the Chairman with responsibilities other than for the management of internal administrative functions would create a problem for the members in carrying out their statutory responsibilities. Strong staff support is necessary in order to carry out the case decisionmaking process.

Since its creation, the FLRA has had a single unitary staff which provides equal support with equal responsiveness to each member of the Authority. Any disruption of this setup would have extreme consequences in fulfilling the statutory responsibility of the Authority.

If the performance of statutory responsibilities is hindered by the establishment of a single unitary staff, consideration should be given to reorganizing the staff so that each member would have his or her own legal staff. This would insure independence and foster competition.

However, the purpose of this section is to insure that the Chairman is the chief executive officer of the Authority while, at the same time, preserving equality and independence for each of the three Authority members in the performance of their statutory responsibilities.

I urge my colleagues to approve H.R. 4336 as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment (No. 2708) was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the engrossment of the amendment and third reading of the bill.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read a third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill having been read the third time, the question is, Shall it pass?

So the bill (H.R. 4336) as amended, was passed.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

VETERANS' COMPENSATION AND PROGRAM IMPROVEMENTS AMENDMENTS OF 1984

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask that the Chair lay before the Senate a message from the House of Representatives on S. 1388.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the House of Representatives:

Resolved, That the bill from the Senate (S. 1388) entitled "An Act to amend title 38, United States Code, to increase the rates of compensation for disabled veterans and the rates of dependency and indemnity compensation for survivors, to increase rates of compensation for certain blinded veterans, to modify the periods during which certain temporary increases in compensation are paid, to provide for continuation of compensation pending the administrative appeal of certain reductions or discontinuances, to make certain improvements in the Veterans' Administration home loan guaranty program, to repeal the 1989 termination date of the Vietnam-era GI Bill, and to make certain improvements in other veterans' programs; to express the sense of the Congress that increases in compensation should take effect on December 1 beginning in fiscal year 1985, and to establish a pilot project to expedite certain medical facility construction projects; and for other purposes", do pass with the following amendments:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert: That (a) this Act may be cited as the "Veterans' Compensation and Program Improvements Amendments of 1984".

(b) Except as otherwise expressly provided, whenever in this Act an amendment or repeal is expressed in terms of an amendment to, or repeal of, a section or other provision, the reference shall be considered to be made to a section or other provision of title 38, United States Code.

INCREASES IN COMPENSATION ON ACCOUNT OF CERTAIN PERIODS OF HOSPITALIZATION OR CONVALESCENCE

SEC. 113. Section 3011(c) is amended—

(1) by inserting "(1)" after "(c)"; and

(2) by adding at the end the following new paragraph:

"(2) In the case of a temporary increase in compensation for hospitalization or treatment where such hospitalization or treatment commences and terminates within the same calendar month, the period of payment shall commence on the first day of such month.".

EFFECTIVE DATE

SEC. 114. The amendments made by this part shall take effect as of October 1, 1983.

TITLE II—VETERANS' PROGRAM IMPROVEMENTS

INCLUSION OF CERTAIN ADOPTED PERSONS WITHIN THE TITLE 38 DEFINITION OF CHILD

SEC. 201. Section 101(4)(A) is amended by adding at the end the following new sentence: "A person described in clause (ii) of the first sentence of this subparagraph who was a member of a veteran's household at the time the person became 18 years of age and who is adopted by the veteran shall be recognized as a legally adopted child of the veteran regardless of the age of such person at the time of adoption.".

FIVE-YEAR EXTENSION OF PROGRAM TO PROVIDE ASSISTANCE TO STATE VETERANS' CEMETERIES

SEC. 202. Section 1008(a)(2) is amended by inserting a comma and "and such sums as may be necessary for fiscal year 1985 and for each of the four succeeding fiscal years," after "fiscal years".

MISCELLANEOUS EDUCATION PROGRAM AMENDMENTS

SEC. 203. (a) Section 1602(1) is amended by adding at the end the following new subparagraph:

"(D)(i) The requirement of ineligibility for educational assistance under chapter 34 of this title, prescribed in subparagraph (A), shall be waived in the case of a veteran described in division (ii) of this subparagraph who elects to receive benefits under this chapter instead of assistance under such chapter 34. A veteran who makes such an election shall be ineligible for assistance under such chapter. Such an election is irrevocable.

"(ii) A veteran referred to in division (i) of this subparagraph is a veteran who before January 1, 1977, performed military service described in subparagraph (C)(iii), is entitled under section 1652(a)(3)(C) of this title to have such service considered to be 'active duty' for the purposes of chapter 34 of this title, and is eligible for assistance under such chapter only by reason of having such service considered to be active duty.".

(b) Section 1733(a) is amended—

(1) by inserting "(with no dependents)" after "an eligible veteran"; and

(2) by striking out all after "of this title" the second place it appears and inserting in lieu thereof a period.

(c)(1) Section 1781 is amended—

(A) by inserting "(a)" before "No educational"; and

(B) by adding at the end the following new subsection:

"(b) No person may receive benefits concurrently under two or more of the provisions of law listed below for the pursuit of the same program of education:

"(1) Chapters 31, 32, 34, 35, and 36 of this title.

"(2) Chapter 107 of title 10.

"(3) Section 903 of the Department of Defense Authorization Act, 1981 (Public Law 96-342, 10 U.S.C. 2141 note).

"(4) The Hostage Relief Act of 1980 (Public Law 96-449, 5 U.S.C. 5561 note).".

(2)(A) Subsection (a) of section 1795 is amended to read as follows:

"(a) The aggregate period for which any person may receive assistance under two or more of the provisions of law listed below may not exceed 48 months (or the part-time equivalent thereof):

"(1) Parts VII or VIII, Veterans Regulation numbered 1(a), as amended.

"(2) Title II of the Veterans' Readjustment Assistance Act of 1952.

"(3) The War Orphans' Educational Assistance Act of 1956.

"(4) Chapters 32, 34, 35, and 36 of this title, and the former chapter 33.

"(5) Chapter 107 of title 10.

"(6) Section 903 of the Department of Defense Authorization Act, 1981 (Public Law 96-342, 10 U.S.C. 2141 note).

"(7) The Hostage Relief Act of 1980 (Public Law 96-449, 5 U.S.C. 5561 note).".

(B) Subsection (b) of such section is amended—

(i) by striking out "clauses (1), (2), (3), and (4)" and inserting in lieu thereof "subsection (a)"; and

(ii) by striking out "forty-eight" and inserting in lieu thereof "48".

SUBSTITUTION OF HOUSING LOAN-GUARANTY ENTITLEMENT

SEC. 204. Section 1802(b)(2) is amended by striking out "an immediate" and inserting in lieu thereof "a".

LOAN GUARANTIES FOR MANUFACTURED HOMES PERMANENTLY AFFIXED TO LOTS

SEC. 205. (a) Section 1810 is amended—

(1) by inserting after subsection (a)(8) the following new clause:

"(9)(A)(i) To purchase a manufactured home to be permanently affixed to a lot that is owned by the veteran.

"(ii) To purchase a manufactured home and a lot to which the home will be permanently affixed.

"(B)(i) To refinance, in accordance with the terms and conditions applicable under the provisions of subsection (e) of this section (other than paragraph (1)(E) of such subsection) to the guaranty of a loan for the purpose specified in clause (8) of this subsection, an existing loan guaranteed, insured, or made under this chapter that is secured by a manufactured home permanently affixed to a lot that is owned by the veteran.

"(ii) To refinance, in accordance with section 1819(a)(5) of this title, an existing loan that was made for the purchase of, and that is secured by, a manufactured home that is permanently affixed to a lot and to purchase the lot to which the manufactured home is affixed."; and

(2) by adding at the end the following new subsection:

"(f)(1) For a loan to be guaranteed for the purpose specified in subclause (A)(ii) or (B)(ii) of subsection (a)(9) of this section, the purchase of (or the refinancing of a loan secured by) the manufactured home and the lot for that home shall be considered as one loan and must comply with such criteria as may be prescribed by the Administrator in regulations.

"(2) A loan may not be guaranteed for the purposes of subsection (a)(9) of this section unless the manufactured home purchased, upon being permanently affixed to the lot, is considered to be real property under the laws of the State where the lot is located.

(b) Section 1819(a)(5) is amended by inserting "or section 1810(a)(9)(B)(ii) of this title" after "paragraph (1)(G) of this subsection" both places it appears.

(c) Section 1803(c)(3) is amended—

(1) by striking out "or (8)" in clause (A) and inserting in lieu thereof a comma and "(8), or (9)(B)(i)"; and

(2) by inserting "1810(a)(9)(B)(ii) or" in clause (E) after "section".

EMPLOYMENT EMPHASIS UNDER FEDERAL CONTRACTS FOR VETERANS WITH SERIOUS EMPLOYMENT HANDICAPS

SEC. 206. Section 2011(1) is amended to read as follows:

"(1) The term 'special disabled veteran' means—

"(A) a veteran who is entitled to compensation (or who but for the receipt of military retired pay would be entitled to compensation) under laws administered by the Veterans' Administration for a disability (i) rated at 30 percent or more, or (ii) rated at 10 or 20 percent in the case of a veteran who has been determined under section 1506 of this title to have a serious employment handicap; or

"(B) a person who was discharged or released from active duty because of service-connected disability."

PAYMENTS FOR FIDUCIARY SERVICES

SEC. 207. (a) Section 3202(a) is amended—

(1) by inserting "(1)" after "(a)"; and

(2) by adding at the end the following new paragraph:

"(2) In a case in which the Administrator determines that a commission is necessary in order to obtain the services of a fiduciary in the best interests of a beneficiary, the Administrator may authorize a fiduciary appointed by the Veterans' Administration to obtain from the beneficiary's estate a reasonable commission for fiduciary services rendered, but the commission for any year may not exceed four percent of the monetary benefits under laws administered by the Veterans' Administration paid on behalf of the beneficiary to the fiduciary during such year. A commission may not be authorized for a fiduciary who receives any other form of remuneration or payment in connection with rendering fiduciary services on behalf of the beneficiary.".

(b)(1) The heading for section 3202 is amended to read as follows:

"§ 3202. Payments to and supervision of fiduciaries".

(2) The item relating to such section in the table of sections at the beginning of chapter 55 is amended to read as follows:

"3202. Payments to and supervision of fiduciaries.".

BOARD OF VETERANS' APPEALS MEMBERSHIP

Sec. 208. (a) Section 4001(a) is amended by striking out "(not more than fifty)" and inserting in lieu thereof "(not more than 65)".

(b) Section 4001 is amended by adding at the end the following new subsection:

"(c)(1) Subject to paragraph (2) of this subsection, the Chairman may from time to time designate employees of the Veterans' Administration to serve as temporary members of the Board. Any such designation shall be for a period of not to exceed one year, as determined by the Chairman. An individual may not serve as a temporary member of the Board for more than 24 months during any 48-month period.

"(2) Designation under paragraph (1) of this subsection of an individual as a temporary member of the Board may not be made when there are fewer than 65 members of the Board.

"(3) In each annual report to the Congress under section 214 of this title, the Administrator shall provide detailed descriptions of the activities undertaken and plans made in the fiscal year for which the report is made with respect to the authority provided by paragraph (1) of this subsection. In each such report, the Administrator shall indicate, in terms of full-time employee equivalents, the number of temporary Board members designated under this subsection and the number of acting Board members designated under section 4002(a)(2)(A)(ii) of this title during the year for which the report is made.".

(c) Sections 4001 and 4002 are each amended by striking out "associate" each place it appears.

(d) Section 4002 is amended—

(1) by inserting "(a)(1)" before "The Chairman";

(2) by striking out the second sentence and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"(2)(A) If a section is composed of fewer than three members as a result of the absence of a member or a vacancy on the Board or the inability of a member assigned to a section to serve on that section, the Chairman—

"(i) may assign another member of the Board to the section;

"(ii) may designate an employee of the Veterans' Administration to serve as an acting member of the Board on such section for a period of not to exceed 90 days, as determined by the Chairman; or

"(iii) may direct the section to proceed with the transaction of business without awaiting the assignment of an additional member to the section.

"(B) An individual may not serve as an acting member of the Board for more than 270 days during any 12-month period.

"(3) A section of the Board may not at any time have among its members more than one individual who is a temporary member designated under section 4001(c) of this title or an acting member designated under paragraph (2)(A)(ii) of this subsection";

(3) by designating the sentence beginning "A hearing docket" as subsection (b); and

(4) by designating the sentence beginning "A section of" as subsection (c).

MEMBERSHIP OF SPECIAL MEDICAL ADVISORY GROUP

SEC. 209. Section 4112(a) is amended—

(1) by inserting a comma and "other individuals considered by the Chief Medical Director to have experience pertinent to the mission of the Department of Medicine and Surgery," after "professions";

(2) by striking out "Director, whose duties" and inserting in lieu thereof "Director. The duties of the special medical advisory group"; and

(3) by striking out "direct" and inserting in lieu thereof "directly".

REVISION OF EFFECTIVE DATE FOR CERTAIN RESERVE OFFICERS' TRAINING CORPS PARTICIPANTS' ELIGIBILITY FOR VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION BENEFITS

SEC. 210. Subsection (d) of section 113 of the Veterans' Compensation, Education, and Employment Amendments of 1982 (Public Law 97-306; 96 Stat. 1433) is amended to read as follows:

"(d) The amendments made by subsections (a) and (b) and the provisions of subsection (c)—

"(1) with respect to deaths and disabilities resulting from diseases or injuries incurred or aggravated after September 30, 1982, shall take effect as of October 1, 1982; and

"(2) with respect to deaths and disabilities resulting from diseases or injuries incurred or aggravated before October 1, 1982, shall take effect as of October 1, 1983.".

PILOT PROGRAM FOR EXPEDITING CERTAIN MEDICAL FACILITY CONSTRUCTION PROJECTS

SEC. 211. (a)(1) Subject to subsection (b) and notwithstanding any other provision of law, during fiscal years 1984 and 1985 the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs may obligate, for the purpose described in paragraph (2), a total of not more than $25,000,000 of funds appropriated to the Veterans' Administration under the appropriation account "CONSTRUCTION, MAJOR PROJECTS" that are unobligated and that the Administrator determines are no longer needed for the projects for which such funds were appropriated and are not needed for contingencies arising in the Veterans' Administration's construction program.

(2) Funds described in paragraph (1) may be obligated for the purpose of undertaking during fiscal year 1984 or 1985 working drawings for any project for construction or alteration of any medical facility that is planned to be undertaken (subject to appropriations for such project) during fiscal year 1985 and 1986.

(b)(1) Funds may not be obligated under subsection (a) for working drawings for projects for the complete replacement of an existing health-care facility or for projects for the new construction of a complete health-care facility.

(2) The amount obligated under subsection (a) for working drawings for any one project may not exceed $2,500,000.

(3) The Administrator may not undertake under subsection (a) working drawings for a project unless the Administrator, not less than 30 days before undertaking the drawings, has provided to the Committees on Veterans' Affairs and on Appropriations of the Senate and House of Representatives written notice of the drawings to be undertaken, the estimated cost of the drawings, and the estimated range of the total cost of the project.

(c) For the purpose of this section:

(1) The term "medical facility" has the meaning provided in section 5001(3) of title 38, United States Code.

(2) The term "working drawings" includes specifications and other related technical services.

SPRINGFIELD CONFEDERATE CEMETERY

SEC. 212. The land comprising the Confederate cemetery at Springfield, Missouri, shall be considered part of the Springfield National Cemetery and may be used for the purposes for which national cemeteries may be used under chapter 24 of title 38, United States Code. The provision of the first section of the Act of March 3, 1911 (36 Stat. 1077, chapter 211) requiring that the land comprising that cemetery be used only as a cemetery for the graves of men who were in the military or naval service of the Confederate States of America is hereby superseded.

TECHNICAL AMENDMENTS

SEC. 213. Title 38 is amended as follows:

(1) Section 351 is amended by striking out "title 28, United States Code," both places it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "title 28".

(2) Section 412(a) is amended—

(A) by striking out "section 414 of title 42" in clause (1) and inserting in lieu thereof "section 214 of the Social Security Act (42 U.S.C. 414)";

(B) by striking out "section 402 of title 42" in clause (3) and inserting in lieu thereof "section 202 of the Social Security Act (42 U.S.C. 402)"; and

(C) by striking out "subchapter II of chapter 7 of title 42" in the matter after clause (3) and inserting in lieu thereof "title II of the Social Security Act (42 U.S.C. 201 et seq.)"; and

(3) Section 3010(m) is amended by striking out "subsection" and inserting in lieu thereof "section".

Amend the title so as to read: "An Act to amend title 38, United States Code, to increase the rates of compensation for disabled veterans and the rates of dependency and indemnity compensation for survivors; to express the sense of the Congress that increases in the rates of compensation should take effect on December 1 beginning in fiscal year 1985; and for other purposes.".

● Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, it gives me great pleasure to speak in favor of final passage of S. 1388, with House amendments, the Veterans' Compensation and Program Improvements Amendments of 1984. This bill was passed by the Senate by unanimous consent at the "11th hour" before adjournment sine die on November 18.

The House's companion measure passed in that body on October 25, 1983, as title IV of H.R. 4169, the proposed Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1983. The pending measure, S. 1388 as amended by the House in February 1984, embodies a compromise agreement between the House and Senate Committees on Veterans' Affairs. It is, I believe, a fair and reasonable compromise—worked out after long and extensive negotiations.

The most important feature of this bill is the authorization of a 3.5-percent increase in cost-of-living allowance (COLA) for our Nation's service-connected disabled veterans, dependents and their survivors who receive dependency and indemnity compensation (DIC). It is not a well-known fact that without congressional action, the Nation's most deserving veterans—those injured in service to their country—do not receive an automatic increase in their benefits to keep up with inflation, as do beneficiaries of other Federal programs which are indexed and receive automatic annual adjustment. S. 1388 would provide for an across-the-board increase in compensation and DIC benefits to veterans of 3.5 percent, effective April 1, 1984. This increase would be the same as that received by beneficiaries of indexed income maintenance programs such as social security and veterans' pension, and reflects a welcome nationwide decrease in the rate of inflation now being experienced compared to that of a year ago.

This year the administration and the Congress asked recipients of veterans' disability compensation and DIC to participate in a small sacrifice to lower the anticipated amount of the Federal budget deficit: a delay of 6 months in the increase of their COLA's, making compensation and DIC increases for 1984 effective April 1 instead of October 1. As is typical of this patriotic group, all veterans organizations quickly announced their support of a shared sacrifice to be distributed between compensation recipients and all other beneficiaries of Federal income maintenance programs.

This bill proposes to conform the fiscal year 1985 effective dates of compensation and DIC COLA's with those of other indexed programs which are not effective December 1. The proposed legislation includes a provision which states congressional intent to enact a compensaton COLA effective December 1, 1984, and expresses the sense of the Congress that the fiscal year 1985 and subsequent year budgets should include the necessary sums to fund such an effective date. The results of this proposed change would be that in fiscal year 1985, service-connected disabled veterans would receive their COLA after the passage of 8 months rather than the usual 12-month period. In subsequent years, the effective date would remain December 1, which would then provide a 12-month interval as the usual basis for adjustment. The action would achieve the goal, established last year by the Budget Committee and ratified by the Congress in the fiscal year 1984 budget resolution, of lining up the time of annual increases for veteran's compensation and DIC with other Federal benefit programs increases.

Mr. President, some other important provisions in the compromise version of the bill includes a clarification of a presumption concerning dysthymic disorder—or depressive neurosis—for veterans who are former prisoners of war. It is derived from my original bill, S. 578, and will clarify the original intent of Public Law 97-37, the Former Prisoners of War Benefits Act of 1981, by adding dysthymic disorder—or depressive neurosis—to the list of presumptive diseases which is used as a basis for disability compensation and for eligibility for VA medical care. The specific addition of this diagnosis will clarify the intent of Public Law 97-37 and thereby aid in its implementation.

I am very concerned that congressional intent in Public Law 97-37 is met. Certainly when the original legislation was considered, the Senate recognized the need for some liberalization with respect to claims filed by former POW's for certain mental disorders. The complexity of anxiety states, anxiety neuroses, posttraumatic stress disorder, and dysthymic disorders and their associated and sometimes interrelated diagnoses inadvertently resulted in a lack of clarity regarding the granting of service connection for depression—a lack of clarity documented by correspondence, by testimony received by the committee pursuant to hearings on this and other health care issues, and by the literature on mental health disorders. The specific addition of dysthymic disorder will eliminate this problem.

The cost of this addition would be quite modest as the number of claims is small but the benefit would be great because these worthy veterans, if they are diagnosed as having a depressive neurosis, will now be granted the service connection they deserve.

Another provision contained in this measure is one which would remove an inequity in the method of determining eligibility for increasing compensation for service-connected veterans rated less than 100 percent, who, while being treated for their service-connected disability, are hospitalized or convalescent for a period longer than 21 days.

This inequity was created by the enactment of the Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1982—Public Law 97-253—which changed the period for which such payments are made by having them begin on the first day of the month following the month in which the hospital care begins, and end on the last day of the month in which it ends. As a result, some veterans who are not still hospitalized at the beginning of the month following their admission do not receive any increase at all, while other veterans, hospitalized for the very same length of time but admitted on a different day of the month, receive 1 full month of compensation at the 100-percent rate. Several measures were introduced to remedy this unintended inequity. The compromise provision would be an extremely equitable solution to this problem. It would provide that when a period of hospital care in excess of 21 days occurs entirely within 1 month, the period for which payment of increased compensation is based would commence on the first day of that month. Thus the problem with different policies for different dates of admission for treatment would be removed and every veteran who met the 21-day minimum under applicable VA regulations would receive payment at the 100-percent rate for no less than 1 full month.

Mr. President, the compromise also includes a measure which would provide adjustments in the disability rating schedule for certain blinded veterans who also suffer service-connected hearing loss. The joint explanatory statement provides a complete explanation and chart of the proposed adjustments for these veterans.

In conjunction with a realinement of the rating schedule for blinded veterans who also suffer hearing impairment, it became apparent that the VA has not examined recently the appropriateness of the correlations between the degrees of deafness and the rates of disability compensation paid by the VA. Therefore, the Senate bill included a provision which would have provided for a study of deafness, and a report on the results of that study, including the Administrator's recommendations for any legislative or administrative action, to the Committees on Veterans' Affairs in the House and Senate. Due to the House committee's extreme reluctance to include the requirement for such a study in statutory language, I have agreed to language in the joint explanatory statement directing the Administrator to conduct the study and to submit to the Committees on Veterans' Affairs of both Houses, by April 1, 1985, a report on the results of such a study. It is my expectation that this language will produce results comparable to those which would have flowed from the Senate provision and my hope that future legislative action in this regard will not be required.

Another provision in the compromise provides for a needed expansion of the Board of Veterans' Appeals from 50 to 65 members in order to allow it to be more responsive to its large caseload and reduce the waiting time for claimants appealing VA benefits decisions. The provision also would provide the Administrator with authority to designate temporary and acting members, subject to certain limitations, in order to further expand the ability of the Board to keep up with its heavy workload.

Once again the Senate has passed, and the House has rejected, the repeal of the December 31, 1989, termination date for the current Vietnam-era GI bill and the provision for the reimbursement to the VA by the Department of Defense of all amounts of such GI bill benefits paid after December 31, 1989. I am extremely disappointed that the House continues to reject this change which has now been passed by the Senate three times. Passage of this repeal would remove the discentive for current service persons who have remaining GI bill eligibility to remain in service because they feel pressured to separate from the service in order to take advantage of their educational benefits before the program expires in 1989.

A final provision which I wish to discuss in this statement is one that would permit certain medical facility construction projects to be expedited. It establishes a 2-year trial period during which the VA would be able to obligate up to $25 million from the so-called working reserve in the VA's major construction account for fiscal years 1984 and 1985 to allow the Administrator to undertake working drawings for certain construction projects before they are approved, as required under section 5004 of title 38, by the House and Senate Veterans' Affairs Committees. This time-limited change in congressional policy is proposed to allow the VA to see if it can save significant time, and therefore money, in the time spent, and dollars obligated, from the time working drawings are begun to the completion of new construction projects. I have some very basic concerns about the timeframe and the cost involved in new construction, and I look forward to seeing the results of this experiment. However, my concerns with new construction go beyond just time and money. I will be interested to see to what degree long-term planning is incorporated into this process and to what degree those long-range plans are shared with the Congress in order to provide us with a more complete basis for determining whether or not to approve projects the VA recommends for its construction program.

Mr. President, this bill as amended represents an excellent opportunity for us to join in bipartisan support of a very fair and well-measured compromise which preserves all of the important elements of both the Senate and House versions of the bill.

Mr. President, in conclusion I wish to thank sincerely the distinguished ranking minority Member from California, my friend Senator CRANSTON, for his invaluable help throughout the entire process of crafting this bill and reaching a very equitable compromise; my long time friend and mentor, the Senator from South Carolina, Senator THURMOND, for his contributions; each of the other committee members who are my colleagues of the Senate and, of course, G. V. "SONNY" MONTGOMERY, the very able and affable chairman, and the respected JOHN PAUL HAMMERSCHMIDT, the ranking minority member of the House committee, two gentlemen I greatly enjoy working with, and the very capable chairman of the Subcommittee on Compensation and Pension, DOUGLAS APPLEGATE.

In addition, I should like to recognize and thank the very able members of the majority staff for their efforts, Tom Harvey, the former staff director and chief counsel, a man I shall greatly miss; Julie Susman, deputy chief counsel and staff director and legislative director; Brent Goo, Scott Wallace, Joe Buzhardt, Becky Hucks, Kay Eckhardt, and our editorial director, Harold Carter; as well as members of the very capable minority staff, Jonathan Steinberg, chief counsel and staff director; Ed Scott, Babette Polzer, Bill Brew, and Ingrid Post. My thanks also to the staff on the House Veterans' Affairs Committee, especially Mack Fleming, the very able chief counsel and staff director, and Arnold Moon and Charles Peckarsky, who were essential to the achievement of this equitable compromise.

Mr. President, I am most pleased to have the opportunity to urge that my colleagues in the Senate ratify this measure on behalf of the entire committee, all Members of which are cosponsors of this measure, I urge the Senate's favorable consideration of this bill. I ask that the joint explanatory statement be printed in the RECORD in lieu of a conference report.

The statement follows:

EXPLANATORY STATEMENT OF HOUSE BILL (H.R. 4169), SENATE BILL (S. 1388), AND COMPROMISE AGREEMENT ON S. 1388, THE VETERANS' COMPENSATION AND PROGRAM IMPROVEMENTS AMENDMENTS OF 1984

This document explains the provisions of title IV of H.R. 4169 as passed by the House of Representatives (hereinafter referred to as the "House bill"), the provisions of S. 1388 as passed by the Senate (hereinafter referred to as the "Senate bill"), and the provisions of a compromise on S. 1388 as agreed to by the Veterans' Affairs Committees of the House and Senate. The difference between the House bill, the Senate bill, and the compromise agreement are noted below, except for clerical corrections, conforming changes made necessary by agreements reached between the Committees, and minor drafting, technical, and clarifying changes.

TITLE I—DISABILITY COMPENSATION AND DEPENDENCY AND INDEMNITY COMPENSATION

Part A—Rate Increases: Disability Compensation

Both the House bill (sections 402 through 404) and the Senate bill (sections 101 through 103) would amend chapter 11 of title 38, United States Code, to increase, effective April 1, 1984, the basic rates of service-connected disability compensation for veterans, the rates payable for certain severe disabilities, the dependents allowances payable to veterans rated 30-percent or more disabled, and the annual clothing allowance for certain disabled veterans. The House bill would increase such rates and allowances by 4.1 percent and the Senate bill by 3.5 percent. Under both bills, the increases are rounded to the nearest dollar.

The compromise agreement (sections 101 through 103) follows the Senate bill.

Dependency and indemnity compensation

Both the House bill (sections 405 through 407) and the Senate bill (sections 104 through 106) would amend chapter 13 of title 38 to increase, effective April 1, 1984, rates of dependency and indemnity compensation (DIC) payable to the surviving spouses and children of veterans whose deaths were service connected. The House bill would increase such rates by 4.1 percent and the Senae bill by 3.5 percent, with the increases in both bills rounded to the nearest dollar.

The compromise agreement (sections 104 through 106) follows the Senate bill.

The Senate bill (section 104(c)), but not the House bill, would specify that—for the purposes of section 156(e)(1)(A) of Public Law 97-377, relating to increases in benefits paid to replace, for the survivors of those who died on active duty or from service-connected causes, certain social security survivors' benefits terminated by section 2205 of the Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1981 (Public Law 97-35)—the overall average of the percentages by which each of the DIC rates set forth in present section 411 of title 38 is increased shall be considered to be 3.5 percent. Section 156(a) of Public Law 97-377 provides that the benefits thereby restored are to be increased, effective on the same date as section 411 DIC increases, "by a percentage that is equal to the overall average of" those increases (rounded to the nearest tenth of a percent). Hence, the effect of this provision would be to ensure that the increase in the replacement for each of those survivors, effective April 1, 1984, is 3.5 percent.

The compromise agreement does not contain this provision.

However, the Committees note that the Senate provision expresses the Committees' intention regarding the rate for the COLA for these benefits that would, upon enactment of the compromise agreement, take effect on April 1, 1984 (by virtue of Public Law 97-377), and that the VA has advised that it intends to provide a 3.5-percent increase in these benefits.

Effective date of future increases

The Senate bill (section 107), but not the House bill, would express the sense of the Congress that future increases in rates of disability compensation and DIC shall take effect on December 1 of the fiscal year involved and that the budget for each such fiscal year include amounts necessary to achieve that purpose.

The compromise agreement (section 107) contains this provision.

The Committees note their understanding that, in section 1(b)(15) of the Congressional budget for fiscal year 1984 (H. Con. Res. 91), provision is made, in the totals for Function 700, "Veterans Benefits and Services", for fiscal years 1985 and 1986, for compensation and DIC increases to be enacted effective December 1 of each of those fiscal years. Section 107 of the compromise agreement is intended as a formal declaration of Congressional policy as to the date on which future increases shall take effect.

Part B—Compensation program amendments: Presumption concerning dysthymic disorder

The Senate bill (section 111), but not the House bill, would amend section 312(b) of title 38 to provide, effective October 1, 1983, for the inclusion of dysthymic disorder (or depressive neurosis) in the list of diseases of certain former prisoners of war that are presumed to be service connected.

The compromise agreement (section 111) contains this provision.

Rates of compensation for certain blinded veterans

Both the House bill (section 411) and the Senate bill (section 112) would amend, effective October 1, 1983, provisions of subsections (o) and (p) of section 314 of title 38 that govern the rates of special monthly compensation payable to certain veterans who suffer from service-connected blindness in combination with a hearing loss that is service connected in at least one ear.

Under current law, veterans who suffer from blindness with "visual acuity of 5/200 or less" (meaning vision no better than 5/200) combined with bilateral deafness (with hearing impairment in at least one ear being service-connected) rated at 60-percent-or-more disabling are entitled to the payment of disability compensation at the rate prescribed by subsection (o) of section 314. The Senate bill, but not the House bill, would reduce from 60 percent to 40 percent the minimum degree of disability for bilateral deafness required to qualify for the subsection (o) rating. The House bill, but not the Senate bill, would establish an additional category of veterans entitled to the subsection (o) rating, those who suffer from blindness with "only light perception or less" (meaning vision with light perception only or with no light perception) combined with deafness rated from 10- through 40-percent disabling (with hearing impairment in at least one ear being service connected).

The compromise agreement (sections 112(a)) would establish an additional category of veterans entitled to the subsection (o) rating, those who suffer from blindness with only light perception or less combined with either bilateral deafness rated at 40-percent-or-more disabling (with hearing impairment in at least one ear being service connected) or total service-connected deafness in one ear.

Under current law, veterans who suffer from blindness with visual acuity of 5/200 or less combined with deafness (with hearing impairment in at least one ear being service connected) rated at 40-percent disabling are entitled, by virtue of subsection (p) of section 314, to the next higher rate of compensation (a "full-step" increase) above the otherwise applicable rate based on the condition of blindness only. These otherwise applicable rates are prescribed in subsection (l) of section 314 for blindness with visual acuity of 5/200 or less but with more than light perception, in subsection (m) for blindness with only light perception, and in subsection (n) for blindness without light perception. In both the House and Senate bills, the degree of disability for deafness combined with blindness required for the full-step increase would be reduced to 30 percent. In addition, the Senate bill, but not the House bill, would provide a full-step increase, instead of compensation at the next intermediate rate (a "half-step" increase), to those who suffer from blindness with visual acuity of 5/200 or less combined with service-connected total deafness in one ear.

The compromise agreement (section 112 (b)(1)) would expand the category of veterans with visual acuity of 5/200 or less who receive a full-step increase, currently consisting of those with deafness rated at 40-percent disabling, to include those with deafness rated at 30-percent disabling.

Under current law, veterans who suffer from blindness with 5/200 visual acuity or less combined with service-connected total deafness in one ear are entitled, by virtue of subsection (p) of section 314, to a half-step increase. Neither the House bill nor the Senate bill would modify the half-step-increase provision itself. However, the House bill, but not the Senate bill, would, as noted above in the discussion of the subsection (o) rating, reduce the requirements for the subsection (o) rating to include blindness with only light perception or less combined with certain deafness rated at 10-percent-or-more disabling. Since service-connected total deafness in one ear is rated as 10-percent disabling, the House bill, but not the Senate bill, would, therefore, grant the subsection (o) rating to certain veterans who currently benefit from a half-step increase. Such veterans are those who suffer from blindness with light perception only combined with service-connected total deafness in one ear and those who suffer from blindness without light perception combined with such deafness. Also, the Senate bill, but not the House bill, would provide a full-step increase to all those who, under current law, receive a half-step increase.

The compromise agreement (section 112(b)(2)), in the cases of veterans who suffer from blindness having only light perception or less, would expand the scope of the half-step-increase deafness, criterion, currently service-connected total deafness in one ear, to include those who have bilateral deafness rated at 10- or 20-percent disabling (with hearing impairment in at least one ear being service connected).

The following chart illustrates the differences in disability ratings for combinations of hearing and vision impairments under current law, the House bill, the Senate bill, and the compromise agreement:

[1] House bill.
[2] Senate bill.
[3] Compromise agreement.
[4] No change from current law.

The Senate bill (section 112(c)), but not the House bill would require the Administrator to conduct a study of the appropriateness of the correlations between degrees of deafness (including deafness combined with other diseases) and the rates of disability compensation paid by the VA and, not later than one year following the date of enactment, to submit to the Committees on Veterans' Affairs of the House of Representatives and the Senate a report on the results of the study together with the Administrator's recommendations for legislative or administrative action.

The compromise agreement does not contain this provision.

The Committees note that, under section 355 of title 38, the Administrator is charged with adopting and applying a schedule of ratings of reductions in earning capacity resulting from specific injuries. The Administrator is also charged with adjusting the schedule from time to time in accordance with experience.

In a letter dated January 10, 1984, to the Chairman of the House Veterans' Affairs Committee, the Administrator noted that the VA is currently exploring the medical and benefits aspects of hearing loss, and is considering a study of the current state of the art with regard to treatment and prosthetic devices for the hearing disabled.

The Committees direct the Administrator to provide for the conduct of a study, pursuant to the provisions of section 355, of the rating schedule with respect to the varying degrees of hearing loss (considered both alone and in combination with other disabilities) suffered by veterans. Particular attention should be given to the methods for conducting the medical evaluations upon which hearing-loss ratings are based.

The Committees further direct the Administrator to submit to them, not later than April 1, 1985, a report on the results of this study. The report should include a discussion of any plans or recommendations for administrative or legislative action that the Administrator considers appropriate with respect to VA programs for hearing-impaired veterans. The report should also include descriptions of the various methods currently used in the VA's Department of Medicine and Surgery and Department of Veterans' Benefits and outside the VA for measuring hearing loss and the extent to which such methods accurately and realistically measure the hearing loss that hearing-disabled persons experience in varied real-life situations, such as those that occur in the workplace, in school, at home, in public places, and in open spaces, and should set forth any plans or recommendations for changes in such VA methods that the Administrator may consider appropriate based on the study results. The Committees believe that the completion of the hearing-impairment study described above and the submission of a report on it, as directed, will remove the need for a statutory provision.

Increase in Compensation on Account of Certain Periods of Hospitalization or Convalescence

Both the House bill (section 408) and the Senate bill (section 113) would amend chapter 51 of title 38 to modify, effective October 1, 1983, the period during which the compensation paid to a service-connected disabled veteran rated less than 100-percent disabled is temporarily increased to the 100-percent rate on account of the veteran's hospitalization for a period in excess of 21 days for a service-connected disability or for hospital treatment followed by convalescence for such a disability. Under current law, the period for which payment is made begins on the first day of the month following the month in which the hospital care begins and it ends on the last day of the month in which the hospitalization or convalescence ends. The House bill would modify this period so that it would begin on the first day of such hospital care. (This was the status of the law prior to enactment of the Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1982 (Public Law 97-253).) The Senate bill would modify the period for which payment is made so that it would begin on the first day of hospital care and continue only until the day on which the hospitalization or convalescence ends.

The compromise agreement (section 113) would provide, effective October 1, 1983, that, when a period of hospital care in excess of 21 days for a service-connected disability occurs entirely within a single month, the period for which payment of increased compensation on account of such care is made would commence on the first day of that month. This provision, in conjunction with present section 3012(b)(8), which provides that the period of payment ends on the last day of the month in which the care terminates, would have the effect of making the period of payment in such cases the entire month in which the care was furnished.

The Committees note that, under the compromise agreement, veterans whose service-connected hospital care lasts for more than 21 days but does not carry over into a second calendar month would receive the same benefit—one full month of compensation at the 100-percent rate—as is received under current law by those whose care is of the same duration but happens to extend into a second calendar month.

Continuation of Compensation Pending Review and Appeal

The Senate bill (section 114), but not the House bill, would amend chapter 53 of title 38 to provide for the continued payment of disability compensation at the 100-percent rate pending review and appeal (and subject to repayment if the veteran loses on appeal) of a determination made after March 31, 1984, to reduce or discontinue such compensation as the result of a change in the service-connected or employability status or physical condition of a veteran whose disability had, prior to that determination, been rated as total for at least 10 years and who, within 30 days after that determination, files a statement of disagreement and requests continued payment.

The compromise agreement does not contain this provision.

TITLE II—VETERANS' PROGRAM IMPROVEMENTS

Inclusion of Certain Adopted Persons Within the Title 38 Definition of Child

The House bill (section 410), but not the Senate bill, would amend section 101(4) of title 38, effective October 1, 1983, to expand the definition of "child" for purposes of general eligibility for Veterans' Administration benefits so as to include a veteran's adopted child even though the child was age 18 or over at the time of adoption as long as (1) the child had become permanently incapable of self-support prior to reaching age 18, and (2) was a member of the veteran's household at age 18. Under the VA's interpretation of current law, a veteran's adopted child who became permanently incapable of self-support before turning 18 is considered as meeting the definition only if the adoption occurred before the child reached age 18.

The compromise agreement (section 201) contains this provision.

Five-Year Extension of Program to Provide Assistance to State Veterans' Cemeteries

The Senate bill (section 201) and section 5 of H.R. 2948 as passed by the House on May 24, 1983 (hereinafter referred to as H.R. 2948), would amend section 1008(a)(2) of title 38 to authorize the appropriation of such sums as are necessary for fiscal years 1985 through 1989 for matching-fund grants to States for establishing, expanding, or improving State veterans' cemeteries.

The compromise agreement (section 202) contains this provision.

Miscellaneous Education Program Amendments

Repeal of 1989 Termination Date for Vietnam Era GI Bill: The Senate bill (section 202), but not the House bill, would amend section 1662(b) of title 38 to repeal the December 31, 1989, termination date for the current, Vietnam-era GI Bill and provide for reimbursement to the VA by the Department of Defense for all amounts of Vietnam-era GI Bill benefits paid by the VA after December 31, 1989.

The compromise agreement does not contain this provision.

Authority for Advanced Payment of Educational Assistance: The House bill (section 421), but not the Senate bill, would amend section 1780(d) and various cross-references in chapters 31 and 36 of title 38 to terminate, effective October 1, 1983, the VA's making of advance payments of educational assistance to certain veterans and dependents enrolled in programs of education.

The compromise agreement does not contain these provisions.

Other Education Program Amendments: The Senate bill (section 203), but not the House bill, would amend chapters 34, 35, and 36 of title 38 to make a series of amendments relating to VA-administered educational assistance programs to (1) allow certain individuals who, despite having post-December 31, 1976, active-duty service that would make them eligible for the Post-Vietnam Era Educational Assistance program (VEAP) (chapter 32), are not eligible for VEAP because they have Vietnam-era GI Bill eligibility (under chapter 34) by virtue of certain pre-1977 training duty to elect to participate in VEAP in lieu of receiving GI Bill benefits; (2) conform the level of survivor's educational assistance benefits (under chapter 35) for entitlement-free pursuit of high-school training to the level of Vietnam-era veterans' GI Bill benefits for such training; (3) bar concurrent receipt of benefits under more than one VA-administered educational assistance program for pursuit of one program of education; and (4) expand the coverage of the 48-month maximum limitation on total educational assistance benefits to include certain recently-enacted programs administered by the VA.

The compromise agreement (section 203) contains these provisions.

Substitution of Housing Loan-Guaranty Entitlement

The Senate bill (section 204) and section 4 of H.R. 2948 would amend section 1802(b)(2) of title 38 to permit, effective on the date of enactment, substitution of a veteran's home-loan guaranty entitlement when a veteran-transferee is not an immediate transferee.

The compromise agreement (section 204) contains this provision.

Loan Guaranties for Manufactured Homes Permanently Affixed to Lots

The Senate bill (section 205) and section 3 of H.R. 2948 would amend chapter 37 of title 38 to provide, effective on the date of enactment, for the guaranty of a loan to a veteran for the purchase of a manufactured home (or the refinancing of a loan previously made for the purchase of a manufactured home) on the same terms and conditions as a loan for a conventionally-built home if two criteria are met: First, the manufactured home is or will be permanently affixed to a lot owned or being purchased by the veteran; and, second, as so affixed, the home is regarded as real property under the laws of the State in which the home is located.

The compromise agreement (section 205) contains this provision.

Employment Emphasis Under Federal Contracts for Veterans with Serious Employment Handicaps

The Senate bill (section 206), but not the House bill, would amend section 2011 of title 38 to expand, effective on the date of enactment, the definition of "special disabled veteran" for the purposes of certain employment and training initiatives under chapters 41 and 42 of title 38 to include a veteran with a service-connected disability rated at 10- or 20-percent disabling if the veteran has been determined to have a serious employment handicap under the VA's rehabilitation program for service-connected disabled veterans carried out pursuant to chapter 31 of title 38.

The compromise agreement (section 206) contains this provision.

Payments for Fiduciary Services

The Senate bill (section 207), but not the House bill, would amend section 3202(a) of title 38 to authorize, effective on the date of enactment, the VA to permit VA-appointed fiduciaries to deduct from beneficiaries' estates certain limited commissions for fiduciary services where the Administrator determines such commissions are necessary in order to obtain fiduciary services that are in the best interests of the beneficiaries and where the fiduciaries receive no other remuneration for their service.

The compromise agreement (section 207) contains this provision.

Board of Veterans' Appeals Membership

The Senate bill (section 211) and subsection (a) of H.R. 2936 as passed by the House on May 17, 1983 (hereinafter referred to as H.R. 2936), would amend present section 4001(a) of title 38 to authorize an expansion—from 50 to 65—in the maximum number of members of the Board of Veterans' Appeals.

The compromise agreement (section 208) contains this provision.

The Senate bill (section 211) and subsection (c) of H.R. 2936 contain provisions that would amend section 4001 and 4002 of title 38 to make a technical amendment to delete the word "associate" from the statutory description of members of the Board.

The compromise agreement (section 208) contains these provisions.

The Senate bill (section 211) and subsection (b) of H.R. 2936 would further amend section 4001 to authorize the appointment of individuals to serve as members of the Board in other than a permanent status. Under the Senate bill, the Chairman of the Board would be authorized, but only when there are 65 members on the Board, to appoint individuals from the professional staff of the Board to serve as "temporary" members of the Board for terms of up to one year each and to reappoint any such individual no more than once within the three-year period following the expiration of an initial appointment. Also, the Senate bill would authorize the Chairman, when there is a temporary absence of a Board member from one of the Board's three-member sections, to appoint an individual from the professional staff of the Board to serve as an "acting" member of the Board on that section for a period of up to 30 days at a time, with a maximum of 60 days service in any fiscal year.

Under H.R. 2936, the Chairman would be authorized to designate an employee of the VA who is an attorney or a physician to serve temporarily as a member of the Board without any time limitation.

Under the Senate bill and H.R. 2936, no section of the Board could have more than one individual who is serving as a member on an other-than-permanent basis.

The compromise agreement (section 208) follows the Senate bill with modifications to delete the requirement that non-permanent members be drawn from the Board's staff; to authorize the chairman to designate individuals as "acting" members to fill vacancies temporarily, as well as to serve in the event of temporary absences; and to lengthen the maximum periods of such designations to periods of up to 90 days, but not to exceed, in the case of any individual, a maximum total of 270 days in any 12-month period.

The Committees note that, although a requirement that an individual designated to the Board on an other-than-permanent basis be "from the professional staff of the Board" (Senate bill) or "an employee of the Veterans' Administration who is an attorney or a physician" (H.R. 2936) is not included in the compromise agreement, they intend that any non-permanent members be drawn from the professional staff of the Board unless no such staff members with appropriate qualifications for the positions involved are available. The Committees also note that, although the compromise agreement uses the word "designate" (as used in H.R. 2636) rather than "appoint" (as used in the Senate bill) to describe the Board Chairman's authority to place an individual on the Board in a non-permanent position, the Committees contemplate that, when a qualified employee of the Veterans' Administration is not available, it would be appropriate for a non-VA employee to be given an appointment for the purpose of serving as a non-permanent Board member pursuant to a designation by the Chairman.

The Senate bill (section 211), but not H.R. 2936, would amend section 4003(a) of title 38 to preclude temporary or acting members from casting a vote in cases in which the votes of the two permanent members are split.

The compromise agreement does not contain this provision.

The Committees intend, however, in providing the limited authorities for temporary and acting members, that the Chairman of the Board will continue the current practice of expanding the panel, or convening another panel, in cases in which the votes of the permanent members are split and a temporary or acting member votes against the claimant.

The Senate bill (section 211), but not H.R. 2936, would further amend section 4001 of title 38 to require the Administrator to report annually, as part of the annual report to the Congress required by section 214 of title 38, on the implementation of the provisions (described above) authorizing the designation of acting and temporary Board members.

The compromise agreement (section 208) contains this provision.

The Senate bill (section 211), but not H.R. 2936, would further amend section 4001 of title 38 to require the Chairman of the Board to report annually to the appropriate committees of the Congress on the Board's current and projected future workload together with an evaluation of the Board's ability, based on current and future personnel levels, to dispose of appeals in a timely manner.

The compromise agreement does not contain this provision.

Membership of Special Medical Advisory Group

The Senate bill (section 208), but not the House bill, would amend section 4112 of title 38 to expand, effective on the date of enactment, the membership of the VA's Special Medical Advisory Group to include individuals, other than members of health and allied scientific professions specified in current law, who have experience pertinent to the missions of the VA's Department of Medicine and Surgery.

The compromise agreement (section 209) contains this provision.

Revision of Effective Date for Certain Reserve Officers' Training Corps Participants' Eligibility for Veterans' Administration Benefits

The House bill (section 409), but not the Senate bill, would revise the effective date provision (subsection (d)) of section 113 of the Veterans' Compensation, Education, and Employment Amendments of 1982 (Public Law 97-306)—which provided general title 38 benefits eligibility to Senior Reserve Officers' Training Corps (SROTC) participants who, after September 30, 1982, incur a disability during field training or a practice cruise—so as to provide, effective October 1, 1983, such eligibility to SROTC participants who incurred a disability during field training or a practice cruise before October 1, 1982.

The compromise agreement (section 210) contains this provision.

Pilot Program for Expediting Certain Medical Facility Construction Projects

The Senate bill (section 209), but not the House bill, contains a provision that would permit certain medical facility construction projects to be expedited. Specifically, it would authorize the Administrator to obligate up to $25 million from the so-called "working reserve" in the VA's major construction account in fiscal year 1984 in order to undertake working drawings for certain construction projects prior to either the adoption of resolutions approving the projects by the House and Senate Veterans' Affairs Committees or the approval of the projects in the appropriations process. However, the Administrator would also be required, at least 30 days before initiating working drawings for a medical facility construction project, to provide the Veterans' Affairs and Appropriations Committees of both Houses with written notice of the intention to do so, together with the estimated cost of the drawings and the estimated range of the total costs of the construction project. No funds could be expended under this provision for working drawings for the replacement or new construction of a complete health-care facility, nor could more than $2.5 million be spent on working drawings for any one project.

The compromise agreement (section 211) contains a provision derived from the Senate provision with amendments. These amendments would also permit the VA to obligate funds for working drawings in fiscal year 1985—for projects on which construction could be initiated in fiscal year 1985 or 1986—with the same total $25 million limitation operating as a cap on aggregate expenditures for fiscal years 1984 and 1985 combined, and would provide a clarifying definition of "working drawings".

Springfield Confederate Cemetery

The Senate bill (section 210), but not the House bill, would, effective on the date of enactment, provide, that the land comprising the present Springfield (Missouri) Confederate Cemetery shall be considered part of the Springfield National Cemetery and remove a restriction on the use of that land which permits the burial of only Confederate veterans.

The compromise agreement (section 212) contains this provision.●

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I rise in support of S. 1388 and the compromise amendments now pending before the Senate. The House has overwhelmingly adopted this bill and upon Senate passage, it will be on its way to the President.

This bill is important for two reasons: First, it provides a 3.5 percent cost-of-living increase, effective on April 1, 1984, for veterans with service-connected disabilities. Over 2.6 million disabled veterans and their families who receive compensation benefits anticipate this COLA. In addition, the bill makes improvements in a variety of important veterans' programs. Second, the adoption of this bill will implement the fiscal year 1984 congressional budget and the reconciliation for veterans' programs that it contains.

I urge my colleagues to support this bill, which will give our Nation's disabled veterans a deserved increase in their compensation benefits.

I would like to commend Chairman SIMPSON and the distinguished members of the Veterans' Affairs Committee for bringing this bill to the floor in a timely fashion. This committee has a long tradition of serving the Nation's veterans, which it continues today.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I rise in strong support of S. 1388, the Veterans' Compensation and Programs Improvements Amendments of 1984.

I believe that S. 1388 is excellent legislation containing many significant provisions that will enhance and improve the benefits provided to the Nation's deserving veterans.

Mr. President, of particular importance is the provision of this legislation which provides for a 3.5-percent increase in the rates of disability compensation and dependency and indemnity compensation. This increase insures that the benefits that are received by veterans and their dependents keep pace with inflation.

Mr. President, I am also pleased that S. 1388 includes a provision that is derived from a bill that I introduced, S. 1187, which would provide increased awards of service-connected compensation to certain blinded veterans who are also suffering from hearing disabilities. I believe that this provision will provide needed assistance to a number of our most severely disabled veterans.

I regret that another provision, which was also derived from legislation that I introduced, S. 859, was not approved by the House in its consideration of this legislation. That provision would have allowed totally disabled service-connected veterans in receipt of benefits at the 100-percent rate for a period of 10 years or more to continue to receive benefit payments at the 100-percent rate during the appeal of a VA decision to reduce or discontinue their disability evaluation. These veterans often suffer severe hardships during the long period of time that it takes to appeal an adverse VA decision. In the absence of this provision, I urge the VA to use its existing authority under section 4007 of title 38 of the United States Code to grant expedited hearings to these veterans when requested.

Mr. President, despite the absence of the aforementioned provision, I strongly support this legislation and urge the support of my colleagues.

● Mr. EXON. Mr. President, the legislation currently pending before the Senate contains a version of legislation which I introduced last year, S. 995.

I introduced that bill in April, following disturbing reports which were brought to my attention by the Disabled American Veterans of Nebraska regarding disparities in benefits for hospitalized disabled veterans. The national DAV then assisted me in formulating this legislation and 30 Senators have cosponsored S. 995 to date.

The problem which I have sought to remedy is a complicated one which was caused by the Omnibus Reconciliation Act of 1982. One part of that act changed, for payment purposes, the effective date of original or increased awards of Veterans' Administration compensations and pensions from the first date of entitlement to the first day of the first full calendar month of entitlement. This change was made as a cost-cutting measure. The legislation I introduced last April would not have overturned that entire reconciliation provision; however, it would have deleted application of this provision as it pertains to the temporary 100-percent disability ratings received by disabled veterans during periods of hospitalization of longer than 21 days.

Following enactment of the 1982 reconciliation bill, two veterans who are hospitalized for an identical number of days for treatment of an identical service-connected disability could receive unequal compensation, depending solely on the date of the month the hospitalization began. Some could even receive no increased compensation.

Mr. President, at a time of personal financial stress and hardship created by having to enter the hospital, I do not believe that some of our disabled veterans should be denied their temporary 100-percent disability rating. Many of these veterans have limited incomes before their hospitalization begins. This disparity becomes especially apparent when the deciding factor is simply the day of the month which a veteran happens to begin his hospitalization. I do not think we should be placing disabled veterans in a situation where they will be forced to delay their hospitalization solely to become eligible for their benefits. Nor should we continue a situation which creates an incentive to stay in the hospital any longer than necessary for the same reason.

Following the introduction of my bill, the distinguished chairman of the Veterans' Affairs Committee agreed to have it considered at a hearing last June. During that session, the major veterans organizations supported S. 995, with only the Veterans' Administration opposing it on the grounds that the VA "is not aware of any hardship accruing to hospitalized veterans." I strongly disagreed, as did the committee, which included in the Senate-passed version of the veterans compensation bill a compromise version of S. 995. The House of Representatives passed similar legislation which encompassed major portions of my bill as well. The conference report before us today is acceptable to me and takes care of the most pressing problems which were created by the 1982 law for our hospitalized veterans.

Again, I want to thank the chairman, the ranking minority member and other members of the committee for their work on this issue. And I want to express a special "thank you" to the Nebraska and national Disabled American Veterans for all of their help as well.●

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I want to take this opportunity to congratulate the distinguished chairman (Mr. SIMPSON) and ranking minority member (Mr. CRANSTON) on bringing this legislation to the floor.

I am particularly grateful to see that the bill contains section 211, which provides for a pilot program for expediting certain medical facility construction projects, such as the $21.6 million clinical addition to the Clarksburg Veterans' Administration Medical Center in West Virginia. This provision is originally derived from amendment No. 1298 to this bill, which was submitted for printing on May 25, 1983, and which I cosponsored.

Section 211 would enable the VA—on a 2-year pilot basis—to avoid delays and expedite the final design and working drawings for certain major VA medical facility construction projects. This would be accomplished by permitting VA to use up to $25 million in its so-called working reserve to undertake working drawings for selected projects, concurrent with the completion of the congressional authorization and appropriations process.

Under current law, the VA cannot begin preparation of working drawings for a project until after construction funds have been appropriated. Thus, major projects, such as the Clarksburg VAMC clinical addition lie dormant between the time preliminary plans are completed and construction funds become available. Under section 211 of the bill, working drawings could be developed at an accelerated pace, with the consequent savings in inflation.

Enactment of this legislation is one more step to bringing to fruition the timely construction of the $21.6 million clinical addition to the Clarksburg, W. Va., VA medical center which will provide improved health care for West Virginia's veterans.

I am resolved to continue my efforts to work closely with the Veterans' Administration, the Veterans' Affairs Committee, and the Appropriations Committee to accelerate the Clarksburg project which will provide the dual benefits of improved health care for West Virginia's veterans and lower construction costs for taxpayers.

I thank the chairman (Mr. SIMPSON) and the ranking minority member (Mr. CRANSTON) for their cooperation in this effort.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, the ranking minority member of the Veterans' Affairs Committee (Mr. CRANSTON) is necessarily absent today. Therefore, I submit the following statement on his behalf for inclusion in the RECORD.

● Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, as the ranking minority member of the Committee on Veterans' Affairs, I am pleased to join with the distinguished chairman of the Veterans' Affairs Committee, my good friend from Wyoming (Mr. SIMPSON), in urging the Senate to approve the amendments of the House to S. 1388, the proposed Veterans' Compensation and Program Improvements Amendments of 1984. The provision of the House substitute amendment to the text embody a compromise agreed to after extensive negotiations between the two Veterans' Affairs Committees.

The compromise agreement is derived from the provisions contained in S. 1388 as passed by the Senate on November 18, 1983 and from the provisions of title IV of H.R. 4169 as passed by the House of Representatives on October 25, 1983.

Mr. President, the compromise agreement represents a most equitable resolution of the differences between the two bodies on this legislation. The Senate's position on the matters addressed in the compromise—including a number of key provisions derived from provisions I authored—are well represented in the final agreement. The committees', both majority and minority members, have worked closely together in achieving this compromise. The end result is an excellent demonstration of our committees' bipartisan, continuing concern for our Nation's veterans.

I firmly believe that the needs of the 2.3 million veterans with service-connected disabilities and the 300,000 survivors of those who died from service-connected causes must be our committees' No. 1 priority. The continuing fulfillment of the commitment we have established for our highest priority veterans to grant compensation benefit increases at least equal to increases in social security and VA pension benefits is, therefore, a matter of great importance to me.

Thus, I want to stress my strong support for the 3.5-percent increase—the percentage increase approved by the Senate in November—that this compromise agreement would provide, effective April 1, 1984, in the rates of compensation for service-connected disabled veterans and dependency and indemnity compensation—DIC—for survivors. This is the same percentage COLA that social security and VA pension received effective December 1983.

In addition to the compensation/DIC COLA, there are a number of other provisions in the measure before us today in which I have particular interest and which I am most pleased were incorporated in the compromise agreement.

EFFECTIVE DATE OF FUTURE COST-OF-LIVING ADJUSTMENT IN COMPENSATION RATES

Mr. President, section 108 of the compromise agreement would express the sense of the Congress that future cost-of-living adjustments—COLA's—in the rates of veterans' disability compensation and survivors' DIC after fiscal year 1984 shall take effect on December 1 of the fiscal year involved. It would further express the sense of the Congress that budgets—both the President's and the congressional budget—for fiscal years after 1984 be developed so as to include the necessary funds to make compensation COLA's effective on the December 1 date. This provision is derived from the provisions of amendment No. 1303 which was submitted for me by Senator BYRD on May 26, 1983, and which is cosponsored by Senators RANDOLPH, MATSUNAGA, and DECONCINI.

As members know, congressional agreement has been reached on delaying by 6 months 1983 COLA's in Federal income-maintenance programs. Legislation was enacted on April 20, 1983—in section 111 of the Social Security Amendments of 1983, Public Law 98-21—to delay by 6 months, until December 1, 1983, the social security increase that otherwise would have automatically occurred on June 1, 1983. Since both the timing and percentage of VA nonservice connected pension COLA's are, under section 3112 of title 38, United States Code, tied to the indexing of social security benefits, a 6-month delay—June 1 to December 1, 1983—is the effective date of the increase in that VA program automatically occurred as a consequence of the social security COLA delay enacted in Public Law 98-21.

However, in the cases of VA compensation and DIC, there is no provision of law linking these programs to social security or otherwise providing for automatic COLA's. For the last 7 years, however, the Congress has adopted the practice of providing annual increases in these benefits effective each October 1.

This year, in accordance with the 6-month-delay agreement for COLA's—which is reflected in the first concurrent resolution on the budget for fiscal year 1984, House Concurrent Resolution 91, as well as Public Law 98-21—the compromise agreement provides for the compensation/DIC COLA to be effective April 1, 1984. This is 6 months later than the date, October 1, 1983, that the increase would customarily have been made effective.

However, I believe, and both the Senate and the House have now adopted my view, that at the earliest opportunity the Congress should take action to provide assurance that the effective date of future increases in VA compensation rates will be consistent with the date on which other income-maintenance COLA's are effective—December 1. Thus, section 108 of the compromise agreement expresses the sense of the Congress that any future compensation COLA's shall take effect on December 1 of each fiscal year—the same date as will COLA increases under the social security and VA pension programs—and be budgeted for on that basis.

A major advantage of this approach is that, under it, Congress could enact compensation/DIC COLA's each year based on an equitable and actual—rather than a projected—inflation factor. That factor would be the social security COLA percentage, and there would be no built-in "lag time" between the end of the period on which that inflation factor is computed and the date on which it would be made effective with respect to the compensation program. Public Law 98-21 made two changes with respect to the social security COLA. Beginning in 1984, it permanently changed the social security COLA date to December 1 and moved from the first quarter to the third quarter of the calendar year the period on which the annual COLA is based. Thus, the amount of the COLA effective December 1 for social security will be based on a third-quarter-to-third-quarter increase in the applicable inflation indicator that is calculated only a few weeks earlier—in early November. Under the compromise agreement, the same time relationships would be available to be used by the Congress to calculate the compensation/DIC COLA.

I would also like to note that the budget resolution for fiscal year 1984, House Concurrent Resolution 91, makes provision in the outyears for compensation/DIC COLA's effective on December 1, 1985 and 1986. Section 108 of the compromise agreement will, upon enactment, formally make fully explicit the will of Congress that this is the approach that should be taken.

Regrettably, despite the agreement reached in the Congress on this issue in House Concurrent Resolution 91 and the action of the Senate in passing this provision on November 18, 1983, the President's budget for fiscal year 1985 proposes an April 1, 1985, effective date for next year's COLA. Therefore, consistent with this provision in the compromise agreement and the agreement reached in the budget process, I will be proposing to add to the President's budget the funds necessary, which I understand to be $157.4 million in budget authority and $157.3 million in outlays—to provide for a December 1, 1984, effective date.

INCREASES IN COMPENSATION ON ACCOUNT OF CERTAIN PERIODS OF HOSPITALIZATION

Section 113 of the compromise agreement resolves in a fair and equitable manner a problem that resulted from enactment of section 401 of the Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1982 that was addressed by the provisions of amendment No. 1302, which Senator BYRD submitted on my behalf on May 26, 1983, and which is cosponsored by Senators RANDOLPH and MATSUNAGA. This section would modify the period during which a temporary increase in compensation, to the 100-percent rate, is paid on account of certain periods of hospitalization and convalescence for the service-connected disability of a veteran rated less than 100-percent disabled. I also note that attention was first called to this problem by S. 995, introduced by the distinguished Senator from Nebraska (Mr. EXON) and cosponsored by 30 Senators.

Mr. President, the approach taken in the compromise agreement corrects an inequity in current law—one that was created by an amendment made by section 401 of the 1982 Budget Reconciliation Act. As Members may recall, the 1982 amendment delays the beginning of all awards of and increases in compensation to the first day of the first full month following the date on which the award or increase otherwise becomes effective. Thus, under the law as so amended, some veterans receiving hospital care for their service-connected disabilities for more than 21 days but less than a month do not receive an increase in their compensation to the rate for 100-percent disability. These are veterans whose hospital care begins early in a calendar month and ends late in the same month. In contrast, however, certain other veterans, those whose hospital care for their service-connected disabilities is for the same length of time, do receive compensation at the 100-percent rate for a full month. These are veterans whose hospital care begins later in a calendar month and ends in the next month.

The provisions in the compromise agreement would address this issue of inequity by providing that veterans whose service-connected hospital care lasts for more than 21 days but does not carry over into a second month would receive the same benefit—1 full month of compensation at the 100-percent rate—as is received under current law by those whose care is of the same duration but happens to extend into a second calendar month. As the author of the provisions in section 113 of the Senate bill, I was most pleased that the committees were able to devise this solution to a most difficult problem, and I fully endorse it.

PILOT PROGRAM TO EXPEDITE VA MEDICAL FACILITY CONSTRUCTION PROJECTS

Mr. President, the compromise agreement also contains, in section 209, a provision I authored to enable the VA, on a pilot-project basis, to expedite certain VA medical facility construction projects. That provision is derived from amendment No. 1450 to S. 1388 of June 29, 1983, which was derived from my amendment No. 1298 of May 25, which was cosponsored by Senators BYRD, RANDOLPH, MATSUNAGA, DECONCINI, SASSER, and EXON.

The compromise agreement would enable the VA—on a 2-year trial basis—to avoid the long delays between the completion of preliminary plans and the initiation of the final design and working drawings for certain VA medical facility major construction projects. It would achieve this purpose by permitting the agency to use up to $25 million in its so-called working reserve in the major construction account to undertake working drawings on certain projects in fiscal years 1984 and 1985, concurrent with the completion of the congressional approval and appropriations processes with regard to the actual construction phase of those projects. Under current law, the VA cannot begin preparation of the working drawings for a project until after construction funds have been appropriated. Thus, major projects lie dormant—generally for 18 months or more—between the time preliminary plans are completed and the construction funds become available. Under the compromise agreement, working drawings could be developed during what is currently a hiatus in the life of a project.

DEFINITION OF "SPECIAL DISABLED VETERAN" FOR CERTAIN VETERANS' EMPLOYMENT PROGRAMS

Section 206 of the compromise agreement would include in the definition of "special disabled veteran" for the purposes of certain veterans' employment programs those individuals in receipt of compensation for disabilities rated 10 or 20 percent disabling if they have been determined, under the VA's rehabilitation program for service-connected disabled veterans, to have substantial employment handicaps. I proposed this provision, based on a provision I authored last year in the Emergency Veterans' Job Training Act of 1983, Public Law 98-77, in order to liberalize somewhat the definition of special disabled veterans for purposes of the special emphasis under Federal contracts program in chapter 42 of title 38, United States Code. Under existing law, the term "special disabled veteran" means those who are entitled to compensation for disabilities rated at 30 percent or more disabling and those who were discharged or released from service because of a service-connected disability. These veterans as well as Vietnam-era veterans have the benefit of employment emphasis—which consists of mandatory job listing and affirmative action programs for Federal contractors—pursuant to section 2012 of title 38. They are also veterans to whom the VA may, pursuant to section 2014(g) of title 38, give preference in employment in certain programs.

BOARD OF VETERANS' APPEALS PROVISIONS

Section 208 of the compromise agreement, I am also delighted to note, contains a provision, based on legislation I sponsored in the Senate, to authorize expansion in the membership of the Board of Veterans' Appeals. This provision would increase the statutory limitation on the size of the Board from 50 to 65 members in order to help deal with the very substantial backlog of cases on the Board's docket—over 64,000 appeals that had accumulated by the end of fiscal year 1983.

In addition to this increase in the size of the Board, other provisions in section 208—which are derived from provisions originally included in S. 636, the proposed Veterans' Administration Adjudication Procedure and Judicial Review Act as reported by the Veterans' Affairs Committee on May 18, 1983, and first passed by the Senate, in H.R. 2936, on June 15 and later were added, by a floor amendment in which I joined with Senator SIMPSON, to S. 1388, as passed on November 18—would authorize the Chairman of the Board to designate individuals to serve as members of the Board in nonpermanent positions in certain circumstances and would require the Chairman to report to the Congress on the use of the new authority.

As discussed in more detail in the explanatory statement that the committee chairman (Mr. SIMPSON) has inserted in the RECORD as part of his remarks, the Chairman of the Board would be allowed to designate individuals to serve as acting members when there is a vacancy on the Board or a Board member is temporarily absent or unable to serve, or to serve as temporary members when the Board has a full complement of members. The authority to appoint temporary members is intended to be used when the Board Chairman wishes to expand the overall size of the Board to help reduce a backlog of pending cases. I also note the committees' intention, as set forth in the explanatory statement, that, under the new authority, the chairman will continue the current practice of expanding a Board panel, or convening another panel, in cases in which a nonpermanent member is involved and the votes of the permanent members are split and the nonpermanent member votes against the claimant.

Mr. President, S. 636, from which these provisions are drawn, is a comprehensive bill dealing with judicial review of VA claims decisions, the payment of reasonable fees to attorneys for representing claimants before the VA, and the VA's internal adjudication and regulation-issuing procedures. As I noted when S. 1388 was before the Senate on November 18 of last year, I want to make clear that my continuing support for the enactment of these few provisions from S. 636 outside of that legislation is in no way a reflection of any change in my longstanding, very strong support of legislation providing for judicial review of VA benefit claims. I would much prefer to be addressing these provisions in the context of that more comprehensive legislation. However, in view of the House's continuing unwillingness at this point to deal with the judicial review issue and my concern that the very significant backlog which the Board is now facing has the practical effect of denying a great many veterans access to a fair and timely decision on their claims, I support moving forward with these provisions in the compromise agreement.

PRESUMPTION CONCERNING DYSTHYMIC DISORDER

Mr. President, I would also like to mention two additional provisions that I strongly support and are contained in the compromise agreement.

First, Mr. President, I am very pleased that the House has accepted the Senate provision to include dysthymic disorder—or depressive neurosis—in the list of diseases of certain former prisoners of war that are presumed to be service connected. As my colleagues will recall, this provision was passed by the Senate twice, first in the Veterans' Health Care and Programs Improvement Act of 1983 last June, and then again in November in S. 1388.

This provision, contained in section 111 of the compromise agreement, should prove quite valuable in terms of assisting former prisoners of war who are suffering from this mental disorder to receive the benefits they deserve.

RATES OF COMPENSATION FOR CERTAIN BLINDED VETERANS AND STUDY

Second, Mr. President, section 112 of the compromise agreement would modify provisions of section 314 of title 38 that govern the rates of special monthly compensation payable to veterans who suffer from service-connected blindness in combination with a hearing loss. I am delighted that—after extensive negotiations—we were able to reach an accord on the complicated and complex issues involved, which were addressed in differing ways by the House and Senate bills. Rather than explain in detail the agreement that was reached, I would refer my colleagues to the explanatory statement of the compromise agreement that was inserted in the RECORD by the chairman of the House Veterans' Affairs Committee (Mr. MONTGOMERY) that appears on page 2298 during the House's consideration of the compromise agreement, and is being inserted in the RECORD in identical form by the chairman of the Senate committee (Mr. SIMPSON) as part of his statement on this measure. The explanatory statement contains an extensive discussion of the differences between the House- and Senate-passed provisions and of the compromise. As so often happens when our two committees work closely together to work out the differences between the provisions that each has passed, the end result in this instance represents, in my view, a better approach than either body had approved, and I fully endorse it.

Additionally, in lieu of a Senate-passed provision requiring the Administrator to conduct, and report to the Congress on, a study of the appropriateness of the correlations between the degrees of deafness and the rates of disability compensation paid by the VA, the committees have—in the explanatory statement—directed the VA, pursuant to its existing authority to establish and adjust the disability rating schedule, to provide for such a study, including the methods used for evaluating hearing loss. The committees have also directed that the report of the study include a discussion of plans and recommendations for action on VA programs for hearing impaired veterans and a description of the methods used by the VA and elsewhere to measure hearing loss and the extent to which those methods accurately measure the severity of the disability in real life situations. The issues relating to measuring hearing loss are quite complicated, and I believe that the conduct of this study will be quite valuable and will enhance our efforts to improve assistance for these service-connected disabled veterans and to bring about a reevaluation—and, I hope, a strengthening—by the VA of its present assistance programs with respect to hearing impaired veterans and its hearing loss measurement techniques. I will be looking forward with great anticipation to the submission of the report next spring.

I would also like to note in this connection the efforts of the Disabled American Veterans—DAV—to call attention to and create a greater understanding of the problems faced by veterans with hearing disabilities. Indeed, on October 18, 1983, the DAV organized and hosted a symposium on the needs of hearing impaired veterans to focus on identifying the problems and needs of such veterans, especially in terms of medical treatment, vocational rehabilitation, and assistive devices. The DAV is continuing to pursue these issues, and I applaud its efforts.

OTHER PROVISIONS

Other provisions contained in the compromise agreement also address the needs of veterans in a variety of ways: Inclusion of certain adopted persons within the title 38 definition of child; a 5-year extension of State veterans' cemeteries program; substitution of housing loan guaranty entitlement when a veteran transferee is not an immediate transferee; a provision to permit veterans buying manufactured homes that are permanently affixed to lots to permit the loans to be guaranteed under the same terms and conditions as loans for conventional homes; VA payments for fiduciary services for legally incompetent veterans under certain circumstances; expansion of the criteria for membership of the special medical advisory group; a revision of the effective date for providing certain reserve officers' training corps participants with eligibility for VA benefits; permitting the use of land at the Springfield, Mo., Confederate Cemetery as part of the VA National Cemetery System; and miscellaneous, largely technical education program amendments. I support the enactment of all of these provisions, which are each addressed in detail in the explanatory statement that Chairman SIMPSON has, as I have noted, included in the RECORD with his statement on this measure.

CONCLUSION

Mr. President, before concluding my remarks, I want to take a moment to express my thanks to those who worked so diligently on this measure—both for their outstanding efforts and for the cooperation and courtesy that was extended to me and the members of the committee's minority staff. I would first thank the distinguished chairman of each committee, Senator SIMPSON and Congressman MONTGOMERY, and the ranking minority member (Mr. HAMMERSCHMIDT) of the House committee, for their many contributions to the development of this measure.

In addition, the excellent work on this measure by staff members of the House committee—Mack Fleming, Arnold Moon, Charlie Peckarsky, Rufus Wilson, and Pat Ryan—as well as the splendid technical assistance of Robert Cover, assistant counsel, Office of the House Legislative Counsel, was invaluable and is deeply appreciated. Finally, I want to make special mention of the very fine work done on this measure by the Senate committee staff members—Julie Susman, Scott Wallace, Brent Goo, Victor Raymond, and Joe Buzhardt—and by Babette Polzer, Bill Brew, Ed Scott, and Jon Steinberg of the minority staff.

With final passage of this compromise agreement at hand, Mr. President, the Congress is once again reaffirming its commitment to those who have served our Nation in uniform and especially to those who, as a result of so serving, now bear the scars of battle.

Mr. President, the compromise agreement now before the Senate is an excellent one, and it has my complete support. I urge my colleagues to approve it unanimously.●

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I move that the Senate concur in the House amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

DIRECTING SENATE LEGAL COUNSEL TO INTERVENE—SENATE RESOLUTION 344

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I have a resolution with respect to the intervention by the Senate Legal Counsel that I offer for myself and the distinguished minority leader, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be stated by title.

The bill clerk read as follows:

A resolution (S. Res. 344) to direct the Senate Legal Counsel to intervene in the case of Irwin B. Arieff v. U.S. Department of the Navy.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Senate will proceed to its immediate consideration.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I have sent to the desk a resolution relating to the authority of the Senate Legal Counsel and ask for its immediate consideration. Because the matter personally affects the Members of this body, I would like to describe the case and the problems which are raised by it.

The Office of the Attending Physician to the Congress provides, on request, personal primary medical care to Members of Congress, Justices of the Supreme Court, former Members and Justices, pages, and senior officials of the Congress and the Court. One service which is provided to patients of the Office has been the filling of prescriptions. The medications for these prescriptions have been obtained from the National Naval Medical Center in Bethesda or are purchased from private pharmaceutical houses.

In January 1981, a reporter made a request under the Freedom of Information Act for the Navy's records of the prescription medications which it has supplied to the Attending Physician. In late 1979, the reporter had also asked for records of the supply by the Navy to the Attending Physician of prescription medications which are controlled substances. In response to that earlier request, the Clerk of the House of Representatives and the Secretary of the Senate sent a joint letter to the Secretary of the Navy which objected to the disclosure of the supply of those medications. On the basis of the objection of the Clerk and the Secretary, the Navy denied the reporter's requests.

In September 1981, the reporter brought an action under the Freedom of Information Act to compel disclosure of the supply by the Navy of prescription medications to the Attending Physician. The Department of Justice defended against disclosure on the ground that it would invade the privacy of the patients of the Attending Physician. In April 1982, the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia granted summary judgment in favor of the Navy and dismissed the complaint.

The reporter appealed to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit. In a decision in July 1983, the court of appeals found error in the failure of the district court to require the disclosure of any segregable portions of the Navy's supply records which would not invade the privacy of patients of the Attending Physician. The appellate court reversed without ordering the disclosure of any documents, and remanded to the district court for further proceedings.

Now that the case is back in the district court, the time for the adjudication of this controversy is at hand. The Department of Justice has been supportive of our concerns for the privacy of the Attending Physician's patients and has pledged to continue its efforts. We are appreciative of all that it has done and will continue to do. However, we have concluded that it is also important for the court to hear directly from representatives of the patients of the Attending Physician. The following resolution, accordingly, directs the Senate Legal Counsel to move to intervene in this action in the names of this Senator and of Senators BYRD, THURMOND, BIDEN, MATHIAS, and FORD to protect the interests of the patients of the Attending Physician. The Senators, in whose names the Counsel will move to intervene, comprise the Joint Leadership Group and are the members with responsibility under the Ethics in Government Act for superintending the litigation concerns of the Senate.

I would like for a moment to state our concerns. Even though the reporter's Freedom of Information Act request does not seek the individual prescriptions of the Attending Physician, the disclosure which is sought remains an intolerable invasion of personal privacy. Information on the cost of providing medications to patients of the Attending Physician is availale to the public. Beyond this, the interest of patients in the absolute confidentiality of medical treatment is paramount. Every patient of the Attending Physician, or of any other physician, is entitled to the expectation that he or she will never have to read, and that the public will not have the occasion to read, about the diverse illnesses which are treated in his or her physician's offices and which may be imputed to them, unless the patient personally and individually chooses to disclose to the public his or her illness and treatment.

It is true that the Congress could resolve this problem by legislation and it may be wise to consider that approach. But we also believe that the Freedom of Information Act was never intended to compel the kind of unwarranted intrusion into personal privacy which this lawsuit seeks. By intervening, we hope to render more secure the expectation of all persons that the Freedom of Information Act will serve its great functions without diminishing their reasonable expectations of medical privacy.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 344) was agreed to.

The preamble was agreed to.

The resolution, with its preamble, reads as follows:

S. RES. 344

Whereas, in the case Irwin B. Arieff v. U.S. Department of the Navy, case No. 81-2406, pending in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia, the plaintiff has asserted a claim under the Freedom of Information Act for records of prescription medications supplied by the Department of the Navy to the Office of the Attending Physician to the Congress;

Whereas the patients of the Office of the Attending Physician have a justifiable expectation in the confidentiality and privacy of records of the supply of these prescription medications to the Office of the Attending Physician to the Congress;

Whereas pursuant to section 708(c) of the Ethics in Government Act of 1978, 2 U.S.C. 288g(c) (1982), the Senate may direct its counsel to perform such duties consistent with title VII of the Ethics in Government Act as the Senate may direct: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Senate legal counsel is directed to intervene, in the case of Irwin B. Arieff v. U.S. Department of the Navy, in the name of Senator Howard H. Baker, Jr., Senator Robert C. Byrd, Senator Strom Thurmond, Senator Joseph R. Biden, Jr., Senator Charles McC. Mathias, Jr., and Senator Wendell H. Ford to protect the interests of the patients of the Office of Attending Physician to the Congress in the confidentiality and privacy of the records which are the subject of this action.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

AUTHORIZING THE PRODUCTION OF DOCUMENTS—SENATE RESOLUTION 345

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I have another resolution dealing with authority for the production of documents by the Senate Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations. I send the resolution to the desk for myself and the distinguished minority leader and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be stated by title.

The bill clerk read as follows:

A resolution (S. Res. 345) authorizing production of documents by the Senate Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Senate will proceed to its immediate consideration.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, since 1981, the Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations has been investigating alleged improper practices in the Hotel Employees and Restaurant Employees International Union. In 1982, the Department of Labor requested subcommittee records concerning the union's Honolulu local, and the Senate authorized the subcommittee to provide the records by adopting Senate Resolution 523 on December 17, 1982. Now, the Department of Labor is conducting an investigation of the dental plans and related operations of the union. Secretary Donovan has asked the subcommittee to furnish records of its investigation of these matters.

The enclosed resolution would authorize the chairman and ranking minority member of the subcommittee, acting jointly, to provide the necessary records and related documents. It reserves discretion for the subcommittee to withhold confidential matters.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 345) was agreed to.

The preamble was agreed to.

The resolution, with its preamble, reads as follows:

S. RES. 345

Whereas the Department of Labor has requested copies of records obtained by the Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations, and of related subcommittee documents, from the subcommittee's investigation of the dental plans and related operations of the Hotel Employees and Restaurant Employees International Union;

Whereas by the privileges of the Senate of the United States and rule XI of the Standing Rules of the Senate, no evidence under the control or in the possession of the Senate can, by administrative or judicial process, be taken from such control or possession but by permission of the Senate;

Whereas when it appears that documents, papers, and records under the control of or in the possession of the Senate are needful for use in any investigation for the promotion of justice, the Senate will take such action thereon as will promote the ends of justice consistently with the privileges and rights of the Senate: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the chairman and ranking minority member of the Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations, acting jointly, are authorized to produce to the Department of Labor records and related subcommittee documents pertaining to the dental plans and related operations of the Hotel Employees and Restaurant Employees International Union.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

DIRECTING THE SENATE LEGAL COUNSEL TO TAKE CERTAIN ACTION

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I have another resolution also concerning the Senate Legal Counsel. I send the resolution to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration. The resolution is offered for myself and the distinguished minority leader.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be stated by title.

The bill clerk read as follows:

A resolution (S. Res. 346) to direct the Senate Legal Counsel to represent the Senate parties in the case of Judd Gregg, et al. v. Danford L. Sawyer, Jr., et al., Civil Action No. 84-0204.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Senate will proceed to its immediate consideration.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, three Members of the House of Representatives, a law librarian, a practicing lawyer, and a law student have filed an action in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia with respect to the accuracy of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. The defendants are the Public Printer; the chairman and vice chairman of the Joint Committee on Printing; Representative HAWKINS and Senator MATHIAS; G. Russell Walker, Editor-in-Chief of Official Reporters of Debates in the Senate; and Geraldine Lyda, Director of the Office of Official Reporters in the House. The resolution directs the Senate Legal Counsel to represent the Senate parties in this litigation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 346) was agreed to as follows:

S. RES. 346

Whereas, in the case Judd Gregg, et al. v. Danford L. Sawyer, et al., Case No. 84-0204, pending in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia, the plaintiffs have asserted a claim against Senator Charles McC. Mathias, Jr., individually and in his capacity as Vice Chairman of the Joint Committee on Printing, and against G. Russell Walker, individually and in his capacity as the Editor-in-Chief of Official Reporters of Debates of the United States Senate;

Whereas, pursuant to section 703(a) and 704(a) of the Ethics in Government Act of 1978, 2 U.S.C. 288b(a) and 288c(a), (1982), the Senate may direct its counsel to defend the Members and employees of the Senate in civil actions relating to their official responsibilities: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Senate Legal Counsel is directed to represent Senator Charles McC. Mathias, Jr., and G. Russell Walker in the case of Judd Gregg, et al. v. Danford L. Sawyer, et al.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

PUBLIC WORKS IMPROVEMENT ACT

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I next ask the minority leader if he is prepared to consider S. 1330 at this time.

Mr. BYRD. Yes, Mr. President.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the minority leader.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate turn to the consideration of Calendar Order No. 634, S. 1330.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be stated by title.

The bill clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 1330) to authorize the United States Army Corps of Engineers to provide grants to the several States to encourage and foster the construction of necessary public capital investment projects, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill which has been reported from the Committee on Environment and Public Works with an amendment to strike all after the enacting clause and insert:

That this Act shall be cited as the "Public Works Improvement Act of 1983".

TITLE I—NATIONAL COUNCIL

SEC. 101. (a) There is established a National Council on Public Works Improvement to be composed of:

(1) the Secretary of the Army, who shall be Chairman;

(2) the Secretary of Agriculture;

(3) the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development;

(4) the Secretary of Transportation;

(5) the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency;

(6) the Chairman of the National Governors Association;

(7) the President of the National Conference of State Legislatures;

(8) the President of the National Association of Counties;

(9) the President of the National Association of Regional Councils;

(10) the President of the National League of Cities;

(11) the President of the United States Conference of Mayors; and

(12) four individuals, appointed by the President, from among persons and organizations knowledgeable and experienced in public administration, planning, architecture, civil engineering, or public investment financing.

(b) Any vacancy in the Council shall not affect its powers, but shall be filled in the same manner in which the original appointment was made.

(c) Ten members of the Council shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business, but the Council may establish a lesser number as a quorum for the purpose of holding hearings, taking testimony, and receiving evidence.

SEC. 102. (a) Upon the request of the Chairman of the Council, Federal agencies shall detail a total of not more than thirty full-time employees of the Federal Government or their equivalent to work for the Council, and such agencies shall be reimbursed by the Council for the salaries of such employees.

(b) The Secretary of the Army, acting through the Chief of Engineers (hereinafter in this title referred to as the "Secretary"), shall assign a staff director to the Council, and shall also provide office space, supplies, equipment and other support services to the Council and its staff, such services to be reimbursable.

(c) The heads of all Federal agencies shall cooperate with the Council to the maximum extent practicable, and shall provide, on a timely basis, such information as the Council may request.

(d) The Council shall convene its first meeting no later than sixty days following enactment of this Act, whether or not by such time the members of the Council described in section 101(12) shall have been appointed by the President, and the Council shall be fully empowered to carry out its responsibility under this Act notwithstanding any delay in the appointment of the nongovernmental members.

(e) The Council or any member authorized by the Council may, for the purpose of carrying out this title, hold such hearings and sit and act at such times and places, take such testimony, have such printing and binding done, enter into such contracts and other arrangements (with or without consideration or bond, to such extent or in such amounts as are provided in appropriation Acts, and without regard to section 3709 of the Revised Statutes (41 U.S.C. 5)), make such expenditures, and take such other actions as the Council or such member may deem advisable. Any member of the Council may administer oaths or affirmations to witnesses appearing before the Council before such member.

(f)(1) From funds otherwise appropriated to the Secretary for the purposes of civil works, the Secretary is directed to transfer to the Council up to $500,000 in the fiscal year ending September 30, 1984.

(2) There is authorized to be appropriated to the Council the sum of $3,500,000 in each of the fiscal years ending September 30, 1985, and September 30, 1986, such sums to remain available until expended.

SEC. 103. (a) By September 30, 1985, the Council shall transmit to the Congress and the President a report containing an analysis of existing public works improvements by region, State, and major metropolitan areas of the United States and by type of facility. For the purposes of this subsection, the Council shall use existing data and sampling techniques to the maximum extent feasible, and shall include, but not be limited to, an analysis of the following—

(1) the age and condition of the facilities and trends in their conditions;

(2) means used to finance the construction, rehabilitation, and maintenance of facilities, including, but not limited to, general obligation and revenue bonds, use fees, excise taxes, direct governmental assistance (including Federal assistance), and private investment;

(3) trends in public expenditures and other means of financing facilities, including use fees; and

(4) the capacity of public works improvements to sustain current and anticipated economic development.

(b) By September 30, 1985, the Council shall develop and publish criteria and information on techniques for establishing inventories of existing and needed public works investments that will be consistent among Federal agencies, the several States, and units of local government.

SEC. 104. By September 30, 1986, the Council shall recommend specific revisions in Federal laws, regulations, and policies and further recommend alterations in the current responsibilities of Federal, State, and local governments that may be necessary to reverse the pattern of disinvestment in public works improvements; to eliminate duplication, waste, and delay; to encourage consideration of the lowest life-cycle costs in developing and maintaining such improvements; to reverse disincentives for rehabilitation of such improvements; and to correct regional imbalances. The Council shall include analyses and recommendations in accordance with the purposes of this Act concerning the need for and desirability of—

(a) changes in the imposition or allocation of excise taxes, use fees, other sources of public revenue, and borrowing authorities;

(b) statutory or regulatory revisions including changes, increases, or decreases in monetary allocations in existing grants-in-aid, direct construction, or subsidy programs;

(c) changes to increase the flexibility and cost-effectiveness of existing Federal public works improvements programs by redefining the scope of such programs, removing disincentives to maintenance, and streamlining administrative procedures;

(d) new block grant programs together with proposals for allocating such grants for the purpose of assisting State banks or revolving funds or for other purposes; and

(e) Federal assistance for research to improve the cost-effectiveness of construction, rehabilitation, and maintenance of public works improvements.

SEC. 105. (a) For the purpose of this Act, the term—

(1) "construction" means the design and erection of a new structure, including its initial equipment and acquisition of land for such project, and the reconstruction of a project at an existing site or adjacent to an existing site;

(2) "rehabilitation" means the correction of deficiencies in a facility or the modernization of equipment so as to extend the useful life or improve the effectiveness of such facility; and

(3) "maintenance" means regularly scheduled activities, including routine repairs, intended to keep a facility operating efficiently.

(b) For the purposes of this title, "public works improvements" means facilities owned or operated by the Federal Government, a State, local unit of government, or other public agency or authority organized pursuant to State or local law, including, but not limited to, highways, streets, and bridges, mass transit, resource recovery facilities, rail transportation, airports, water supply and distribution systems, sewers, dams, public buildings, docks and ports, waterways, and parks.

TITLE II—IDENTIFICATION OF CAPITAL INVESTMENTS

SEC. 201. Section 1105 of title 31, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"e. (1) The President shall submit with materials related to each budget transmitted under subsection (a) on or after January 1, 1985, an analysis for the ensuing fiscal year that shall identify requested appropriations or new obligational authority and outlays for each major program that may be classified as a public capital investment program and that shall contain summaries of the total amount of such appropriations or new obligational authority and outlays. In addition, the analysis under this paragraph shall contain—

"(A) an estimate of the current service levels of public capital investment and alternative high and low levels of such investments over a period of ten years in current dollars and over a period of five years in constant dollars;

"(B) the most recent assessment analysis and summary, in a standard format, of capital investment needs in each major program area over a period of ten years;

"(C) an identification and analysis of the principal policy issues that affect estimated capital investment needs for each major program; and

"(D) an identification and analysis of factors that affect estimated capital investment needs for each major program, including but not limited to the following factors:

"(i) economic assumptions;

"(ii) engineering standards;

"(iii) estimates of spending for operation and maintenance;

"(iv) estimates of expenditures for similar investments by State and local governments; and

"(v) estimates of demand for public services derived from such capital investments and estimates of the service capacity of such investments.

To the extent that any analysis required by this paragraph relates to any program for which Federal financial assistance is distributed under a formula prescribed by law, such analysis shall be organized by State and within each State by major metropolitan area if data is available.

"(2) For purposes of this section, any appropriation, new obligational authority, or outlay shall be classified as a public capital investment to the extent that such appropriation, authority, or outlay will be used for the construction or rehabilitation of any—

"(A) highway, street, or bridge,

"(B) airport or airway facility,

"(C) mass transit system,

"(D) rail transportation facility,

"(E) wastewater collection, treatment, or related facility,

"(F) water supply or distribution facility,

"(G) water resource project,

"(H) resource recovery facility,

"(I) dam,

"(J) waterway or port,

"(K) federally assisted housing,

"(L) Veterans' Administration hospital, or

"(M) other major Federal building or facility.".

AMENDMENT NO. 2709

(Purpose: To correct the date in the short title of the bill)

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment on behalf of the distinguished Senator from Vermont (Mr. STAFFORD).

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The bill clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Tennessee (Mr. BAKER), for Mr. Stafford, proposes an amendment numbered 2709.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 20, line 20, delete "1983" and insert in lieu thereof "1984".

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment (No. 2709) was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the committee amendment, as amended, is agreed to.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. President, I urge that the Senate pass S. 1330, the Public Works Improvement Act.

This bill represents an important step forward by the Committee on Environment and Public Works to improve this Nation's infrastructure. The bill requires the development of information on the Nation's capital investment in order to help the Congress and the President determine more appropriate ways to improve our highways, waterways, airports, parks, public buildings, and other public capital investments.

The bill accomplishes this purpose by establishing a National Council on Public Works Improvement to consolidate information on the condition of the Nation's infrastructure, then recommend appropriate Federal action.

In addition, S. 1330 requires the executive branch to improve its identification and analysis of capital spending programs as a part of the President's budget.

Mr. President, the Committee on Environment and Public Works began hearings on the broad issue of our Nation's infrastructure 1 year ago. There was a recognition at that time that the Nation's existing infrastructure systems were deteriorating and inadequate to accommodate future economic and population growth.

Seven days of hearings were held during the first session of this Congress. A variety of public and private witnesses testified, including mayors, Governors, corporate executives, and other experts on public capital investments. Although all these witnesses agreed that a severe problem existed, recommendations diverged.

During these hearings, our committee considered a variety of bills that addressed the challenge in different ways. Elements of some of these bills are incorporated in S. 1330. Proposals for more extensive programs, such as economic development grants or grant programs to assist States in setting up infrastructure banks, were also considered.

The committee, however, wishes to ensure that a Federal infrastructure program of whatever form will not merely substitute for existing programs but will encourage increased capital investments, improve the capital planning process, encourage prudent maintenance, and eliminate the need for perpetual Federal support.

At the time S. 1330 was reported, a commitment to a large new Federal infrastructure grant program appeared premature. Yet the committee will continue to explore Federal program options during this session of the 98th Congress. S. 2151, the Public Capital Investment Act of 1984, which I introduced at the end of the last session, would provide grants to the States to help establish State-operated capital investment funds.

The committee will continue to review this and other proposals for new programs and modifications referred to the committee during this session. When the committee determines that further action is required to address the infrastructure problem, additional legislation will be reported.

The committee-reported version of S. 1330 focuses on developing new information and consolidating existing data on public capital investments through two separate means.

First, the bill establishes a National Council on Public Works Improvement to analyze the condition of existing public works facilities and recommend appropriate Federal actions.

Title I of S. 1330 creates a 15-member National Council on Public Works Improvement. The Council will be composed of the heads of the five major agencies that administer Federal public works programs, the leaders of the major public interest representing other levels of government, and individuals who are expert in issues the Council will examine.

The Council is required to develop uniform criteria and methodologies for conducting public works inventories and provide an assessment of the condition of existing public works improvements to the President and the Congress by the end of fiscal year 1985.

The Council is also required to make recommendations for changes in existing Federal laws, regulations, and policies, and for alterations in the allocation of responsibilities among Federal, State, and local governments to improve the condition and capacity of the Nation's infrastructure by the end of fiscal year 1986.

Second, in title II, the bill mandates the development of information on public capital expenditures to be included in the President's annual budget. The Council's reports, as well as the information provided in the budget, should help our committee as well as others in Congress identify changes needed to improve the Federal Government's ability to finance and manage its substantial investment in public capital facilities.

As a result of this bill, both the quality of information and the level of detail on which expenditures are justified in the budget request should be improved. The reporting requirements specified in S. 1330 shall be contained in the budget transmitted next year and thereafter. For example, the President is required to submit multiyear spending projections for each major capital investment program, and specifically review the major policy issues affecting infrastructure programs addressed in the budget.

This bill does not change the basic budgeting procedures of the Federal Government or the congressional budget process. It does not establish a separate capital budget. It does not provide for separation of capital expenditures from operating costs.

Rather, it implements an alternative examined by the General Accounting Office in its own investigation of budgeting procedures and reviewed by the committee. This involves reformulation of the special analysis accompanying the annual budget submission. This change will expand the information available to the Congress on public facilities and improve our ability to make informed decisions on a long-term capital program that will truly meet the Nation's needs.

I believe that this legislation is a necessary first step toward improving the Federal Government's ability to finance and manage its substantial investment in public capital facilities.

Mr. President, I urge that other Senators join me in voting for the adoption of this bill.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I rise to express my support for S. 1330, the Public Works Improvement Act of 1983. This legislation is the product of extensive hearings and review by the Environment and Public Works Committee over the last year.

I consider this legislation to be an important first step in addressing the serious problem of our Nation's declining infrastructure. In the past two decades, as we have struggled to reduce Federal deficits, we have also reduced the share of Federal expenditures for nondefense capital investments. In 1960, 5.7 percent of all Federal outlays were directed toward nondefense physical capital investments; this percentage declined to 4.9 percent in 1970, and in the past fiscal year, declined even further to 3.6 percent.

As the Federal contribution for capital investments has declined, the condition of our infrastructure has deteriorated. Our estimated infrastructure needs through the remainder of this decade now far exceed available public resources.

S. 1330 begins to address this problem by putting in place a national commission to examine this serious situation and to make recommendations to the Congress on the best ways to stretch limited Federal funds to get the most for our money. The commission is composed of 15 members who have particular expertise in the area of public works investments. Specifically, its membership is charged with the responsibility of assessing the public works needs of this country, reviewing existing Federal programs that provide public works assistance, and recommending necessary statutory changes to more adequately address the problem.

Title II of S. 1330 requires the President to submit a more detailed identification of public works investments that are contained in the yearly budget in order to provide information on annual Federal expenditures for infrastructure. This is not an amendment to change the budget process, but is a requirement which will insure that Congress will receive adequate information on what level of Federal assistance is being provided each year for capital improvements.

Mr. President, I am pleased that this important legislation is receiving the support of the full Senate and that I was a part of the formulation of this critical legislation.

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, I am pleased that the Senate is considering today S. 1330, the Public Works Improvement Act. This bill requires the development of specific information on the Nation's capital investment needs in order to assist the Congress in evaluating the condition of the Nation's public infrastructure. The bill accomplishes this purpose by two means.

First, the bill requires improved identification and analysis of capital spending programs in the President's budget. The provisions in the bill mandating this improvement are similar to those contained in S. 1432—the Federal Capital Investment Program Information Act of 1983 which I introduced last June. The bill also establishes a National Council on Public Works Improvement to consolidate existing information on the condition of the Nation's infrastructure and recommend appropriate Federal responses.

During the last session, the Committee on Environment and Public Works held several hearings on the condition of public capital investments. A variety of public and private witnesses testified, including mayors, Governors, corporate executives, and other experts on public capital investments. All these witnesses agreed that the condition of the Nation's public capital systems was not adequate to support future economic growth.

The committee also found that much of the data compiled on the condition of the Nation's public civil works and the Nation's needs were dramatic, but anecdotal and often conflicting. For instance, a survey of over 800 municipalities carried out by the National League of Cities and U.S. Conference of Mayors in 1982-83 produced valuable findings, including data on the priorities cities set on various public works facilities, and on regional differentials in priorities and abilities to finance repair and replacement. However, it was not comprehensive. It did not cover special districts—such as public water authorities—nor did it seek information on the need for expansion of existing facilities. The authors of the survey themselves concluded that "considerable further research needed to be done."

In addition, we do not even know much about the status of Federal capital spending. Special analysis D of the fiscal year 1985 administration budget "Investment, Operating, and Other Federal Outlays," provides some information about Federal spending for physical structures. However, it does not cover all Federal investment-type spending. In addition, this spending is simply categorized as defense or nondefense spending.

The lack of information on Federal spending definitely hampers Federal capital planning. It effectively prevents systematic analysis of the optimum use of Federal capital resources because of the unavailability of comparative figures. While the Government's capital planning processes may be integrated into agency budget planning processes, Government-wide planning is not really done.

Consequently, this bill is designed to improve the budgetary information on the Nation's public capital programs available to the Congress and State and local governments. It requires the administration to expand the information on public capital investments transmitted with its budget. The administration is required to submit multiyear spending projections for each major capital investment program, and specifically review the major policy issues affecting these programs in the annual budget. The reporting requirements specified in S. 1330 are to be instituted in the budget transmitted after January 1, 1985; in other words, for fiscal year 1986.

As a result of this bill, both the quality of information and the level of detail on which expenditures are presented in the President's annual budget request will be improved.

I assure my colleagues that this bill does not change the budgeting procedure of the Federal Government or change the congressional budget process. It does not establish a separate capital budget, or provide for separation of capital expenditures from operating costs. Rather, reformulation of the special analysis accompanying the annual budget submission will expand the information available to the Congress on public facilities and improve our ability to make informed decisions on a long-term capital program that will truly meet the Nation's needs.

I believe that this legislation is a necessary first step toward improving the Federal Government's ability to finance and manage its substantial investment in public capital facilities. I urge other Senators to join me in voting for the adoption of this bill.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, the Committee on Environment and Public Works after much deliberation has reported to the Senate S. 1330, a bill dealing with the infrastructure and capital budgeting problems of this Nation. In recent years it has become abundantly clear that many communities in this country have infrastructure problems. Those items which have traditionally been referred to as the public works of our communities, both large and small, have been ignored when it comes to maintenance and rehabilitation.

The cities and towns have focused on spending available resources to match Federal funds for new construction, since most Federal assistance was directed in this manner.

Mr. President, estimates of the infrastructure problem today run into the several hundreds of billions of dollars. Items which need rehabilitation include streets, roads, waterlines, sewers, public buildings, and many other items. The committee, after looking at this need in light of all the budgetary problems facing this Nation, could not agree on a grant program to address this problem. No specific funding source appears to be available from which we could move at this time.

The committee, therefore, felt that it was more appropriate to establish a commission to examine the needs carefully and to recommend funding amounts and sources for this much needed activity.

Another important element in this legislation is the requirement for an informational-type capital budget to be submitted with the President's budget. One of the real shortcomings which the current Federal budget has is its lack of a capital budget as contained in most State budgets. While it is not possible at this time to require that a capital budget be included in the President's annual budget submission, we do believe that it is necessary to have this type of information brought together in the budget.

Mr. President, S. 1330, while not going as far as I would like, certainly begins to focus needed attention on our critical public works decline. I support this legislation and urge its passage.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, today, for the first time, the Senate considers legislation to address the problem of the Nation's deteriorating public works. I believe this legislation is noncontroversial, but no less important for it. It is timely; indeed, it is long past time that we begin to fashion a solution to the problem.

The bill before us bears marked resemblance to legislation I first proposed in September 1982. That earlier bill, the Rebuilding of America Act, proposed establishment of a commission to assess the condition of our public works and recommend a rational, well-planned recovery program. It also called for an experimental Federal capital budget analysis. Last year, in concert with Senator DODD, I reintroduced the bill incorporating his initiative to require preparation of a capital investment schedule within the unified Federal budget.

The bill we take up today, S. 1330, the Public Works Improvement Act of 1984, is a refinement of those earlier proposals. It takes into account testimony that we heard over the past year in the Environment and Public Works Committee. It represents the sensible approach of our distinguished chairman, the Senator from Vermont, Mr. STAFFORD, and our beloved ranking minority member and chairman emeritus, Mr. RANDOLPH, and of nearly all the members of our committee to a problem that has sometimes been cast in—may I say—overly dramatic terms.

We found out, during the course of our hearings last year, that the problem we face is manageable. Not inconsequential by any means, but not cataclysmic, either.

The Congressional Budget Office, in April of last year, estimated the overall requirement for critical public works spending between now and 1990 at somewhat less than $500 billion. The Federal share would be somewhat more than half of that. CBO calculates that, within existing program structures, the Federal Government would have to spend but an additional $4 billion a year to meet its share of the expenditure.

The editors of a National League of Cities-U.S. Conference of Mayors survey, after reviewing the cities' own estimates of their infrastructure problems, concluded that "a steady but manageable investment over a number of years could and would enable communities to start work on the capital assets ranked as highest priorities."

Encouraging as all this is, we still do not have the information we need to be confident of devising infrastructure programs that will be effective. For example, the CBO study points out that we may need to revise the focus of Federal assistance, a point that has been made in previous studies. To repeat only the most often stated point, Federal public works assistance for some time has favored new construction to the exclusion and detriment of maintenance of existing structures.

The league-conference survey admits to a critical flaw: The great majority of cities seem not to have regular, formal quality assessment and inventory procedures for their public capital facilities. Moreover, the survey concludes that "cities vary greatly in their ability to finance infrastructure needs, and have varying needs for Federal and State assistance."

Financing is central, of course. A grab bag of public, private, and public-private financing schemes have been proposed. Some may cause as many problems as they solve. The sale-leaseback arrangements to which cities are increasingly turning in their hunger for cash to pay for infrastructure repairs are, in the views of some in the Congress and the Treasury, eroding the Federal income tax base. There is a question, too, of diverting private capital from industrial to public works investment.

It is a fact, too, that different kinds of public works receive greatly varying degrees of Federal assistance. The CBO estimates current annual levels of Federal spending in seven different categories—six if one lumps together two having to do with air transportation. The category "municipal water supply" is the smallest of the six though it may need the most help.

Building the Nation's public works was one of the first tasks our National Government undertook. Somehow we lost our way. To a point, I might mention, that the Army Corps of Engineers, which in large measure built our transportation network in the early 19th century, is now overseeing more civil construction in Saudi Arabia than in the United States.

We have not yet seen our way clear to regaining our direction in these matters. But I am certain that passage of this legislation will result in our agreeing on a return to this most central of national purposes.

I believe that passage of this legislation will enable us to renew our national consensus on public works.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is open to further amendment. If there be no further amendment to be proposed, the question is on the engrossment and the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed as follows:

S. 1330

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act shall be cited as the "Public Works Improvement Act of 1984".

TITLE I—NATIONAL COUNCIL

SEC. 101. (a) There is established a National Council on Public Works Improvement to be composed of:

(1) the Secretary of the Army, who shall be Chairman;

(2) the Secretary of Agriculture;

(3) the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development;

(4) the Secretary of Transportation;

(5) the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency;

(6) the Chairman of the National Governors Association;

(7) the President of the National Conference of State Legislatures;

(8) the President of the National Association of Counties;

(9) the President of the National Association of Regional Councils;

(10) the President of the National League of Cities;

(11) the President of the United States Conference of Mayors; and

(12) four individuals, appointed by the President, from among persons and organizations knowledgeable and experienced in public administration, planning, architecture, civil engineering, or public investment financing.

(b) Any vacancy in the Council shall not affect its powers, but shall be filled in the same manner in which the original appointment was made.

(c) Ten members of the Council shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business, but the Council may establish a lesser number as a quorum for the purpose of holding hearings, taking testimony, and receiving evidence.

SEC. 102. (a) Upon the request of the Chairman of the Council, Federal agencies shall detail a total of not more than thirty full-time employees of the Federal Government or their equivalent to work for the Council, and such agencies shall be reimbursed by the Council for the salaries of such employees.

(b) The Secretary of the Army, acting through the Chief of Engineers (hereinafter in this title referred to as the "Secretary"), shall assign a staff director to the Council, and shall also provide office space, supplies, equipment, and other support services to the Council and its staff, such services to be reimbursable.

(c) The heads of all Federal agencies shall cooperate with the Council to the maximum extent practicable, and shall provide, on a timely basis, such information as the Council may request.

(d) The Council shall convene its first meeting no later than sixty days following enactment of this Act, whether or not by such time the members of the Council described in section 101(12) shall have been appointed by the President, and the Council shall be fully empowered to carry out its responsibilities under this Act notwithstanding any delay in the appointment of the nongovernmental members.

(e) The Council or any member authorized by the Council may, for the purpose of carrying out this title, hold such hearings and sit and act at such times and places, take such testimony, have such printing and binding done, enter into such contracts and other arrangements (with or without consideration or bond, to such extent or in such amounts as are provided in appropriation Acts, and without regard to section 3709 of the Revised Statutes (41 U.S.C. 5)), make such expenditures, and take such other actions as the Council or such member may deem advisable. Any member of the Council may administer oaths or affirmations to witnesses appearing before the Council or before such member.

(f)(1) From funds otherwise appropriated to the Secretary for the purposes of civil works, the Secretary is directed to transfer to the Council up to $500,000 in the fiscal year ending September 30, 1984.

(2) There is authorized to be appropriated to the Council the sum of $3,500,000 in each of the fiscal years ending September 30, 1985, and September 30, 1986, such sums to remain available until expended.

SEC. 103. (a) By September 30, 1985, the Council shall transmit to the Congress and the President a report containing an analysis of existing public works improvements by region, State, and major metropolitan areas of the United States and by type of facility. For the purposes of this subsection, the Council shall use existing data and sampling techniques to the maximum extent feasible, and shall include, but not be limited to, an analysis of the following—

(1) the age and condition of the facilities and trends in their conditions;

(2) means used to finance the construction, rehabilitation, and maintenance of facilities, including, but not limited, to general obligation and revenue bonds, use fees, excise taxes, direct governmental assistance (including Federal assistance), and private investment;

(3) trends in public expenditures and other means of financing facilities, including use fees; and

(4) the capacity of public works improvements to sustain current and anticipated economic development.

(b) By September 30, 1985, the Council shall develop and publish criteria and information on techniques for establishing inventories of existing and needed public works investments that will be consistent among Federal agencies, the several States, and units of local government.

SEC. 104. By September 30, 1986, the Council shall recommend specific revisions in Federal laws, regulations, and policies and further recommend alterations in the current responsibilities of Federal, State, and local governments that may be necessary to reverse the pattern of disinvestment in public works improvements; to eliminate duplication, waste, and delay; to encourage consideration of the lowest life-cycle costs in developing and maintaining such improvements; to reverse disincentives for rehabilitation of such improvements, and to correct regional imbalances. The Council shall include analyses and recommendations in accordance with the purposes of this Act concerning the need for and desirability of—

(a) changes in the imposition or allocation of excise taxes, use fees, other sources of public revenue, and borrowing authorities;

(b) statutory or regulatory revisions including changes, increases, or decreases in monetary allocations in existing grants-in-aid, direct construction, or subsidy programs;

(c) changes to increase the flexibility and cost-effectiveness of existing Federal public works improvements programs by redefining the scope of such programs, removing disincentives to maintenance, and streamlining administrative procedures;

(d) new block grant programs together with proposals for allocating such grants for the purpose of assisting State banks or revolving funds or for other purposes; and

(e) Federal assistance for research to improve the cost-effectiveness of construction, rehabilitation, and maintenance of public works improvements.

SEC. 105. (a) For the purpose of this Act, the term—

(1) "construction" means the design and erection of a new structure, including its initial equipment and acquisition of land for such project, and the reconstruction of a project at an existing site or adjacent to an existing site;

(2) "rehabilitation" means the correction of deficiencies in a facility or the modernization of equipment so as to extend the useful life or improve the effectiveness of such facility; and

(3) "maintenance" means regularly scheduled activities, including routine repairs, intended to keep a facility operating efficiently.

(b) For the purpose of this title, "public works improvements" means facilities owned or operated by the Federal Government, a State, local unit of government, or other public agency or authority organized pursuant to State or local law, including, but not limited to, highways, streets, and bridges, mass transit, resource recovery facilities, rail transportation, airports, water supply and distribution systems, sewers, dams, public buildings, docks and ports, waterways, and parks.

TITLE II—IDENTIFICATION OF CAPITAL INVESTMENTS

SEC. 201. Section 1105 of title 31, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"e. (1) The President shall submit with materials related to each budget transmitted under subsection (a) on or after January 1, 1985, an analysis for the ensuing fiscal year that shall identify requested appropriations or new obligational authority and outlays for each major program that may be classified as a public capital investment program and that shall contain summaries of the total amount of such appropriations or new obligational authority and outlays. In addition, the analysis under this paragraph shall contain—

"(A) an estimate of the current service levels of public capital investment and alternative high and low levels of such investments over a period of ten years in current dollars and over a period of five years in constant dollars;

"(B) the most recent assessment analysis and summary, in a standard format, of capital investment needs in each major program area over a period of ten years;

"(C) an identification and analysis of the principal policy issues that affect estimated capital investment needs for each major program; and

"(D) an identification and analysis of factors that affect estimated capital investment needs for each major program, including but not limited to the following factors:

"(i) economic assumptions;

"(ii) engineering standards;

"(iii) estimates of spending for operation and maintenance;

"(iv) estimates of expenditures for similar investments by State and local governments; and

"(v) estimates of demand for public services derived from such capital investments and estimates of the service capacity of such investments.

To the extent that any analysis required by this paragraph relates to any program for which Federal financial assistance is distributed under a formula prescribed by law, such analysis shall be organized by State and within each State by major metropolitan area if data is available.

"(2) For purposes of this section, any appropriation, new obligational authority, or outlay shall be classified as a public capital investment to the extent that such appropriation, authority, or outlay will be used for the construction or rehabilitation of any—

"(A) highway, street, or bridge,

"(B) airport or airway facility,

"(C) mass transit system,

"(D) rail transportation facility,

"(E) wastewater collection, treatment, or related facility,

"(F) water supply or distribution facility,

"(G) water resource project,

"(H) resource recovery facility,

"(I) dam,

"(J) waterway or port,

"(K) federally assisted housing,

"(L) Veterans' Administration hospital, or

"(M) other major Federal building or facility.".

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

SECONDARY MORTGAGE MARKET ENHANCEMENT ACT OF 1983—VITIATION OF ACTION

Mr. BAKER. Next, Mr. President, I am advised that final passage and third reading of S. 2040 has been had, and it is the desire of sponsors of that measure that third reading and passage of that measure be vitiated.

Could I inquire of the minority leader if there is objection to that?

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, there is no objection.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate turn to consideration of S. 2040, the secondary mortgage market bill, and that passage and third reading of that measure be vitiated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

AMENDMENT NO. 2710

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk on behalf of the distinguished chairman of the Senate Committee on Banking, Mr. GARN, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The bill clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Tennessee (Mr. BAKER), for Mr. GARN, proposes an amendment numbered 2710.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

Insert the following new sections after Section 101:

SEC. 101A. Section 3(a) of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 (15 U.S.C. 78c(a)) is amended by adding the following new paragraph at the end thereof:

"(41) The term 'mortgage related payment security' means a security that is rated in one of the four highest rating categories by at least one nationally recognized rating organization and either:

"(i) represents ownership of one or more promissory notes or certificates of interest or participations in such notes (including any rights designed to assure servicing of, or the receipt or timeliness of receipt by the holders of such notes, certificates, or participations of amounts payable under, such notes, certificates, or participations), which notes:

"(A) are directly secured by a first lien or a second lien on a single parcel of real estate, including stock allocated to a dwelling unit in a residential cooperative housing corporation, upon which is located a dwelling or other residential or commercial structure, or on a manufactured home, as defined in Section 603(6) of the National Manufactured Housing Construction and Safety Standards Act of 1974, which is used as a residence; and

"(B) were originated by a savings and loan association, savings bank, commercial bank, credit union, insurance company, or similar institution which is supervised and examined by a Federal or State authority, or by a mortgagee approved by the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development pursuant to Sections 203 and 211 of the National Housing Act; or

"(ii) is secured by one or more promissory notes or certificates of interest or participations in such notes (with or without recourse to the issuer thereof) and, by its terms, provides for payments of principal in relation to payments, or reasonable projections of payments, on notes meeting the requirements of subparagraphs (i) (A) and (B) or certificates of interest or participations in promissory notes meeting such requirements.".

SEC. 101B. Section 7 of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 (15 U.S.C. 78g) is amended by adding the following new subsection at the end thereof:

"(g) Subject to such rules and regulations as the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System may adopt in the public interest and for the protection of investors, no member of a national securities exchange or broker or dealer shall be deemed to have extended or maintained credit or arranged for the extension or maintenance of credit for the purpose of purchasing a security, within the meaning of this section, by reason of a bona fide agreement for delayed delivery of a mortgage payment related security against full payment of the purchase price thereof upon such delivery within 180 days after the purchase, or within such shorter period as the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System may prescribe by rule or regulation.".

SEC. 101C. Section 8(a) of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 (15 U.S.C. 78h(a)) is amended by adding the following new sentence at the end thereof: "Subject to such rules and regulations as the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System may adopt in the public interest and for the protection of investors, no person shall be deemed to have borrowed within the ordinary course of business, within the meaning of this subsection, by reason of a bona fide agreement for delayed delivery of a mortgage related payment security against full payment of the purchase price thereof upon such delivery within 180 days after the purchase, or within such shorter period as the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System may prescribe by rule or regulation.".

SEC. 101D. Section 11(d)(1) of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 (15 U.S.C. 78k(d)(1)) is amended by—

(a) inserting "(i)" between "of" and "any"; and

(b) inserting the following immediately after "thirty-five days after such purchase": "or (ii) any mortgage related payment security against full payment of the entire purchase price thereof upon such delivery within 180 days after such purchase, or within such shorter period as the Commission may prescribe by rule or regulation".

● Mr. GARN. Mr. President, in the last days of the first session, we acted on S. 2040, the Secondary Mortgage Market Enhancement Act of 1983. However, due to the hectic floor activity, the Senate passed S. 2040 without the successful attachment of an important amendment. Sponsored by Senators GARN, TOWER, PROXMIRE, and RIEGLE, this amendment relating to margin requirements, was not drafted in time for inclusion at our October markup in the Banking Committee. The language was drafted with assistance from and approved by both the Securities and Exchange Commission and the Federal Reserve Board. The intent of the committee to act on this amendment was included in our report filed with S. 2040.

Thus, Senators TOWER, PROXMIRE, RIEGLE, and I wish the Senate to turn its attention to this amendment and act on it favorably.

Mr. President, the proposed amendments of sections 7, 8, and 11(d) do not in any way lessen the obligation of self-regulatory organizations to insure that their rules, including their margin rules, adequately address forward trading by their members in mortgage-related securities. Indeed, the committee expects that the Securities and Exchange Commission will exercise its regulatory authority over self-regulatory organizations to insure that those organizations maintain margin rules for private mortgage-related securities that will adequately cover adverse price movements and serve to protect individual investors.

The committee also wishes to emphasize that the Commission retains authority to establish minimum net capital requirements that reflect a broker-dealer's exposure in the forward trading market. The committee expects that the Commission will exercise this authority to prevent repetition of problems that are considered to have arisen in the early market for GNMA securities.●

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment (No. 2710) was agreed to.

● Mr. GARN. Mr. President, in addition to the inclusion of the aforementioned amendment, Senator TOWER has requested that I clarify some report language in the committee report that accompanied S. 2040. The Securities and Exchange Commission, after careful review of the report, has concluded that a statement in the report is in error. On page 5 of the committee report 98-293 under the section, transactional regulation exemptions, the following sentence should be corrected to reflect the new language below:

The current language reads:

It should be noted, however, that any resales of such securities must be made pursuant to another exemption from registration, such as that provided by section 4(1) of the Securities Act in order to avoid the necessity for registration of the resale transaction.

The new language should read:

It should be noted, however, that any resales of such securities must separately qualify for an exemption from registration. Section 4(5), of course, could be relied upon for resale transactions that met its requirements.

Mr. President, on behalf of Senators TOWER, PROXMIRE, and RIEGLE, I thank the Senate for their indulgence in this matter.●

● Mr. TOWER. Mr. President, I thank my colleagues for prompt legislative action in the secondary mortgage market. Truly, it is an essential element of housing finance.

I was encouraged by the introduction of companion legislation, H.R. 4557, in the House, by the distinguished chairman of the House Banking Committee, Mr. ST GERMAIN. The leadership on the encouragement of the private sector's increased participation in the mortgage capital markets by the distinguished gentleman from Rhode Island, my friend from Texas, Mr. BARTLETT, and his colleagues is to be applauded. It is my understanding that hearings were scheduled for February 1, 1984, in the House Banking Committee's Subcommittee on Housing. Also, Mr. President, it is my understanding that H.R. 4557 has been referred to the House Energy and Commerce Committee and its Subcommittee on Telecommunications, Consumer Protection, and Finance.

With the need for mortgage capital projected to increase by approximately $200 billion per year over the next 10 years, it is critical, in my view, that this market have greater private sector participation. The private sector, together with the existing Government agencies of Ginnie Mae, Fannie Mae, and Freddie Mac, will work to provide the capital necessary for affordable housing.●

● Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I want to join the chairman of the Banking and Housing Committee in urging the Senate to approve S. 2040, the Secretary Mortgage Market Enhancement Act of 1983.

Recent hearings conducted by the committee clearly demonstrated that changes in the Nation's financial markets require us now to update and reform some of our banking, securities, and tax laws—if we are to assure American homebuyers an adequate supply of mortgage credit in the years immediately ahead.

Leaders of both our housing and housing finance industries testified that there is an urgent need to:

First, expand the secondary mortgage market, since this is where most of the money to finance home mortgages comes from today.

Second, expand private sector involvement in the secondary market, since private enterprise can help raise capital for housing, but has been discouraged by dominating institutions which have Government connections.

Third, expand use of mortgage-backed securities by encouraging private sector issues, since such securities are considered today to be the best means for attracting investment in housing.

S. 2040 is designed to achieve these objectives. It eliminates outdated rules which restrict mortgage-backed securities and other securities used in the housing market. It eliminates unnecessary rules which inhibit many investors, particularly the large institutional investors, from putting money into housing.

S. 2040 also encourages private enterprise in the secondary markets by making clear, through changes in the laws governing securities and banking, that it is welcome. The bill sends a clear message to Wall Street that the secondary mortgage market is open for competition. And, in the committee's view, more competition in the secondary mortgage market means more mortgage credit at lower cost to the home buyer.

Mr. President, S. 2040 was overwhelmingly approved by the Banking Committee. It is supported by all segments of the housing industry. I have not been informed of any real opposition. I, therefore, strongly recommend that Members of the Senate act promptly to pass S. 2040, the Secondary Mortgage Market Enhancement Act of 1983.●

● Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, I believe enactment of this bill is a valuable step which will help insure that an adequate supply of funds is provided for home mortgages while our country's housing finance industry is undergoing historic changes.

In my judgment, S. 2040, as reported by the Banking Committee, satisfies four important criteria that I have applied during consideration of his legislation.

First, it encourages private firms to enter the secondary mortgage market as issuers of mortgage-backed securities. I strongly support that objective. In the years ahead, an expanded and assured flow of funds must be attracted into mortgage lending from nontraditional sources. Leading housing analysts suggest that mortgage-backed securities will have to supply over 75 percent of all housing credit by 1990. Since American home buyers will benefit by having the secondary mortgage market as broad and deep as possible, Congress should do what is necessary to increase the number of firms in the market.

Second, the bill maintains the ability of Ginny Mae, Fannie Mae, and Freddie Mac to provide funds for home mortgages and to respond to changes in the market. These organizations form the foundation of our country's housing finance system. Witnesses from all sectors of the housing industry testified that these three institutions are making vital and innovative contributions to the Nation's housing in a very difficult time. Any effort to weaken these basic housing institutions would be irresponsible, particularly now that the demand for housing has finally begun to rebound from disastrously low levels.

Expert witnesses, who testified before the Banking Committee, agree that private companies will be unable to issue mortgage-related securities in the volume needed to produce an active and sufficient secondary market for at least another 5 to 10 years. In the meantime, we must be sure that the existing mortgage system remains vigorous.

I am encouraged by testimony indicating that private firms not only want to enter this market under today's conditions but also intend to remain as active participants through all periods of the business cycle. However, the Nation's housing finance system is far too complex and dynamic for anyone to forecast with certainty how changes would affect the system's performance under different economic conditions. Congress should encourage the entry of private firms, but we will have to observe how they perform throughout a business cycle. Since a reliable supply of mortgage funds is so important to home buyers and many sectors of the American economy, public policy in this area should be made only with great care.

I point out, in particular, that this bill rejects the radical suggestions of some members of the administration who want to quickly terminate or greatly reduce the Federal Government's role in housing finance.

Third, the bill amends existing law to help insure that housing finance is available at reasonable rates for modestly priced homes in all parts of the country. I am pleased that the committee added two amendments to help many Americans afford decent housing. The first amendment authorizes Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac to purchase second mortgages that are used to purchase or refinance a home. This would help bring interest costs down to affordable levels for many middle income families. The second amendment increases the mortgage limits for multifamily projects in high-cost areas. The current limits have proven to be unreasonably low in many areas and therefore have prevented many needed rental units from being built.

Fourth, the bill specifically includes certain safeguards to protect the interests of individual investors. This legislation exempts certain mortgage-backed securities from Federal or State securities laws. I reluctantly agreed to these exemptions, because I believe a compelling case was made for amending the laws that relate to mortgage-backed securities. In addition, I believe the committee limited these exemptions so that individual investors would not be exposed to undue risks. I will continue to watch this issue carefully, however, and will ask for oversight hearings after the legislation is enacted.

Mr. President, I had hoped that this bill in its entirety could have been included in this year's comprehensive housing authorization legislation. However, that does not now seem possible because the parliamentary situation for title I is rather complicated in the House of Representatives. I still believe that the appropriate course of action would be to include provisions of title II in a comprehensive housing bill that could be enacted during this session of Congress. I believe that the need for an adequate supply of mortgage credit in all parts of the country requires that Congress enact as much of S. 2040 as possible this year.

Mr. President, I believe that the Secondary Mortgage Market Enhancement Act of 1983 is prudent legislation and deserves the broad, bipartisan support of the Senate.●

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed, as follows:

S. 2040

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Secondary Mortgage Market Enhancement Act of 1983".

TITLE I—SECURITIES LAWS AMENDMENTS

REGISTRATION EXEMPTION

SEC. 101. Section 4(5) of the Securities Act of 1933 is amended to read as follows:

"(5) Transactions involving one or more promissory notes, participation interests in such notes, or mortgage related payment securities secured by such notes or participation interests, offered and sold subject to the following conditions:

"(A) The note or notes are directly secured by a first lien or a second lien on—

"(i) a single parcel of real estate (including stock allocated to a dwelling unit in a residential cooperative housing corporation) upon which is located a dwelling or other residential or commercial structure, or

"(ii) a manufactured home, as defined in section 603(6) of the National Manufactured Housing Construction and Safety Standards Act of 1974, which is used as a residence;

"(B) The note or notes were originated by a savings and loan association, savings bank, commercial bank, credit union, insurance company, or similar institution which is supervised and examined by a Federal or State authority or were originated by a mortgagee approved by the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development pursuant to sections 203 and 211 of the National Housing Act; and

"(C) The terms of the sale require that—

"(i) the minimum aggregate sales price to the purchaser be not less than $250,000,

"(ii) payment of the sales price by the purchaser be made with cash within one hundred twenty days of the date of sale, and

"(iii) each purchaser buy only for his own account.

For the purpose of this paragraph, the term 'mortgage related payment securities' means (I) any obligation (which may be with or without recourse to the issuer thereof) which, by its terms, provides for payments of principal in relation to payments, or reasonable projections of payments, on notes meeting the requirements of subparagraphs (A) and (B) or participations in such notes which are pledged as security for such obligation, and (II) any participation interest in a pool or pools of such notes and the proceeds thereof, and any related rights designed to assure servicing of, or the receipt or timeliness of receipt by holders of such mortgage related payment securities of amounts payable under, such mortgage notes if such obligation or participation interest is rated in one of the four highest rating categories by at least one nationally recognized rating organization.".

SEC. 102. Section 3(a) of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 (15 U.S.C. 78c(a)) is amended by adding the following new paragraph at the end thereof:

"(41) The term 'mortgage related payment security' means a security that is rated in one of the four highest rating categories by at least one nationally recognized rating organization and either:

"(i) represents ownership of one or more promissory notes or certificates of interest or participations in such notes (including any rights designated to assure servicing of, or the receipt or timeliness of receipt by the holders of such notes, certificates, or participations of amounts payable under, such notes, certificates, or participations), which notes:

"(A) are directly secured by a first lien or a second lien on a single parcel of real estate, including stock allocated to a dwelling unit in a residential cooperative housing corporation, upon which is located a dwelling or other residential or commercial structure, or on a manufactured home, as defined in section 603(6) of the National Manufactured Housing Construction and Safety Standards Act of 1974, which is used as a residence; and

"(B) were originated by a savings and loan association, savings bank, commercial bank, credit union, insurance company, or similar institution which is supervised and examined by a Federal or State authority, or by a mortgagee approved by the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development pursuant to sections 203 and 211 of the National Housing Act; or

"(ii) is secured by one or more promissory notes or certificates of interest or participations in such notes (with or without recourse to the issuer thereof) and, by its terms, provides for payments of principal in relation to payments, or reasonable projections of payments, on notes meeting the requirements of subparagraphs (i) (A) and (B) or certificates of interest or participations in promissory notes meeting such requirements.".

SEC. 103. Section 7 of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 (15 U.S.C. 78g) is amended by adding the following new subsection at the end thereof:

"(g) Subject to such rules and regulations as the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System may adopt in the public interest and for the protection of investors, no member of a national securities exchange or broker or dealer shall be deemed to have extended or maintained credit or arranged for the extension or maintenance of credit for the purpose of purchasing a security, within the meeting of this section, by reason of a bona fide agreement for delayed delivery of a mortgage payment related security against full payment of the purchase price thereof upon such delivery within 180 days after the purchase, or within such shorter period as the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System may prescribe by rule or regulation.".

SEC. 104. Section 8(a) of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 (15 U.S.C. 78h(a)) is amended by adding the following new sentence at the end thereof: "Subject to such rules and regulations as the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System may adopt in the public interest and for the protection of investors, no person shall be deemed to have borrowed within the ordinary course of business, within the meaning of this subsection, by reason of a bona fide agreement for delayed delivery of a mortgage related payment security against full payment of the purchase price thereof upon such delivery within one hundred eighty days after the purchase, or within such shorter period as the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System may prescribe by rule or regulation.".

SEC. 105. Section 11(d)(1) of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 (15 U.S.C. 78k(d)(1)) is amended by—

(a) inserting "(i)" between "of" and "any"; and

(b) inserting the following immediately after "thirty-five days after such purchase"; "or (ii) any mortgage related payment security against full payment of the entire purchase price thereof upon such delivery within one hundred and eighty days after such purchase, or within such shorter period as the Commission may prescribe by rule or regulation".

INVESTMENT BY DEPOSITORY INSTITUTIONS

SEC. 106. (a) Section 5(c)(1) of the Home Owner's Loan Act of 1933 (12 U.S.C. 1464(c)(1)) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"(S) MORTGAGE BACKED SECURITIES.—Investments in securities which are offered and sold pursuant to section 4(5) of the Securities Act of 1933 or which would be eligible to be offered and sold pursuant to section 4(5) of the Securities Act of 1933 except for the requirement of subparagraph (C)(i) of such section, subject to such regulations as the Board may prescribe.".

(b) Section 107 of the Federal Credit Union Act (12 U.S.C. 1757) is amended—

(1) by redesignating paragraph (15) as paragraph (16); and

(2) by inserting after paragraph (14) the following:

"(15) to invest in securities which are offered and sold pursuant to section 4(5) of the Securities Act of 1933 or which would be eligible to be offered or sold pursuant to section 4(5) of the Securities Act of 1933 except for the requirement of subparagraph (C)(i) of such section, subject to such regulations as the Board may prescribe.".

(c) Section 5136 of the Revised Statutes (12 U.S.C. 24) is amended by adding at the end of paragraph seventh the following: "The limitations and restrictions contained in this paragraph as to an association purchasing for its own account investment securities shall not apply to securities which are offered and sold pursuant to section 4(5) of the Securities Act of 1933 or which would be eligible to be offered and sold pursuant to section 4(5) of the Securities Act of 1933 except for the requirement of subparagraph (C)(i) of such section, subject to such limitations as the Comptroller of the Currency may prescribe.".

PREEMPTION OF STATE LAW

SEC. 107. (a) Any person, trust, corporation, partnership, association, business trust, or business entity created pursuant to or existing under the laws of the United States or any State shall be authorized to purchase, hold, and invest in securities which are offered and sold pursuant to section 4(5) of the Securities Act of 1933 or which would be eligible to be offered and sold pursuant to section 4(5) of the Securities Act of 1933 except for the requirement of subparagraph (C)(i) of such section if such securities are rated in one of the four highest rating categories by at least one nationally recognized statistical rating organization, and in securities issued or guaranteed by the Federal Home Loan Mortgage Corporation or the Federal National Mortgage Association, to the same extent that such person, trust, corporation, partnership, association, business trust, or business entity is authorized under any applicable law to purchase, hold or invest in obligations issued by or guaranteed as to principal and interest by the United States or any agency or instrumentality thereof. Where State law limits the purchase, holding, or investment in obligations issued by the United States by such a person, trust, corporation, partnership, association, business trust, or business entity, such securities which are offered and sold pursuant to section 4(5) of the Securities Act of 1933 or which would be eligible to be offered and sold pursuant to section 4(5) of the Securities Act of 1933 except for the requirement of subparagraph (C)(i) of such section if such securities are rated in one of the four highest rating categories by at least one nationally recognized statistical rating organization, or such Federal Home Loan Mortgage Corporation or Federal National Mortgage Association securities shall be considered to be obligations issued by the United States for purposes of the limitation.

(b) The provisions of subsection (a) shall not apply with respect to a particular person, trust, corporation, partnership, association, business trust, or business entity or class thereof in any State which, prior to the expiration of three years after the date of enactment of this Act, enacts a statute which specifically refers to this section and either prohibits or provides for a more limited authority to purchase, hold, or invest in such securities by any person, trust, corporation, partnership, association, business trust, or business entity or class thereof than is provided in subsection (a). The enactment by any State of any statute of the type described in the preceding sentence shall not affect the validity of any contractual commitment to purchase, hold, or invest which was made prior thereto and shall not require the sale or other disposition of any securities acquired prior thereto.

(c) Any securities which are offered and sold pursuant to section 4(5) of the Securities Act of 1933 or which would be eligible to be offered and sold pursuant to section 4(5) of the Securities Act of 1933 except for the requirement of subparagraph (C)(i) of such section if such securities are rated in one of the four highest rating categories by at least one nationally recognized statistical rating organization, shall be exempt from any law of any State with respect to or requiring registration or qualification of securities or real estate to the same extent as any obligation issued by or guaranteed as to principal and interest by the United States or any agency or instrumentality thereof. Any State may, prior to the expiration of three years after the date of enactment of this Act, enact a statute which specifically refers to this section and requires registration or qualification of any such security on terms which differ from those applicable to any obligation issued by the United States.

DELAYED OR CONTINUOUS REGISTRATION

SEC. 108. The Securities and Exchange Commission shall, by rule or regulation, provide for the registration pursuant to section 6 of the Securities Act of 1933 of one or more promissory notes, participation interests in such notes, or mortgage related payment securities secured by such notes or participation interests, which are to be offered and sold on a delayed or continuous basis in the future, where the notes or participation interests therein are directly secured by a first lien or a second lien on (1) a single parcel of real estate (including stock allocated to a dwelling unit in a residential cooperative housing corporation) upon which is located a dwelling or other residential or commercial structure, or (2) a manufactured home, as defined in section 603(6) of the National Manufactured Housing Construction and Safety Standards Act of 1974, which is used as a residence.

TITLE II—FEDERAL HOME LOAN MORTGAGE CORPORATION AND FEDERAL NATIONAL MORTGAGE ASSOCIATION AMENDMENTS

FEDERAL HOME LOAN MORTGAGE CORPORATION PREFERRED STOCK

SEC. 201. Section 306(f) of the Federal Home Loan Mortgage Corporation Act is amended—

(1) by inserting before the period at the end of the last sentence thereof the following: ", and shall not be entitled to vote with respect to the election of any member of the Board of Directors"; and

(2) by adding at the end thereof the following: "Such preferred stock, or any class thereof, may have such terms as would be required for listing of preferred stock on the New York Stock Exchange, except that this sentence does not apply to any preferred stock, or class thereof, the initial sale of which is made directly or indirectly by the Corporation exclusively to any Federal Home Loan Bank or Banks.".

FEDERAL NATIONAL MORTGAGE ASSOCIATION PREFERRED STOCK

SEC. 202. (a) The first sentence of section 303(a) of the National Housing Act is amended to read as follows: "The corporation shall have common stock, without par value, which shall be vested with voting rights, each share being entitled to one vote with rights of cumulative voting at all elections of directors.".

(b) Section 303 of such Act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"(h) Any preferred stock of the corporation may have such rights as are permitted by the rules of the New York Stock Exchange in the case of securities listed on such Exchange.".

(b) The penultimate sentence of section 305(a)(2) of the Federal Home Loan Mortgage Corporation Act is amended by inserting before the period at the end thereof the following: ", except that such limitations may be increased to not to exceed 240 per centum of the dollar amount limitations contained in section 207(c)(3) of the National Housing Act in any geographical area for which the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development determines under section 207(c)(3) that cost levels require any increase in dollar amount limitations under that section".

PURCHASE OF SECOND MORTGAGES BY FEDERAL NATIONAL MORTGAGE ASSOCIATION AND FEDERAL HOME LOAN MORTGAGE CORPORATION

SEC. 212. (a) Section 302(b) of the National Housing Act is amended by adding the following new paragraph at the end thereof:

"(5)(A) The corporation is authorized to purchase, service, sell, lend on the security of, and otherwise deal in conventional mortgages or advances of credit that are secured by a subordinate lien against a one- to four-family residence only if (i) the residence is the principal residence of the mortgagor, (ii) the proceeds of such loan were used to purchase or to refinance only the remaining balance of a loan the proceeds of which were used to purchase the residence, and (iii) the commitment to purchase the loan is issued prior to October 1, 1985, except as provided by paragraph (3). If the corporation, pursuant to paragraphs (1) through (4), shall have purchased, serviced, sold, or otherwise dealt with any other outstanding mortgage secured by the same residence, the aggregate original amount of such other mortgage and the mortgage authorized to be purchased, serviced, sold, or otherwise dealt with under this paragraph shall not exceed the applicable limitation set forth in paragraph (2).

"(B) The corporation shall establish limitations governing the maximum principal obligation of subordinate conventional mortgages described in subparagraph (A). Such limitations shall not exceed $50,000 in the case of a one-family residence and $60,000 in the case of a two- to four-family residence. In any case in which the corporation purchases a participation interest in such a mortgage, the limitation shall be calculated with respect to the total principal obligation of the mortgage and not merely with respect to the interest purchased by the corporation.

"(C) No subordinate mortgage shall be purchased by the corporation if the total outstanding indebtedness secured by the property as a result of such mortgage exceeds 80 per centum of the value of such property unless (i) that portion of such total outstanding indebtedness that exceeds such 80 per centum is guaranteed or insured by a qualified insurer as determined by the corporation (and not the corporation itself); (ii) the seller retains a participation of not less than 10 per centum in the mortgage; or (iii) for such period and under such circumstances as the corporation may require, the seller agrees to repurchase or replace the mortgage upon demand of the corporation in the event that the mortgage is in default. The corporation shall not issue a commitment to purchase a subordinate mortgage prior to the date the mortgage is originated, if such mortgage is eligible for purchase under the preceding sentence only by reason of compliance with the requirements of clause (ii) of such sentence.".

(b)(1) Section 302(h) of the Federal Home Loan Mortgage Corporation Act is amended—

(A) by striking out "The maximum principal obligation" and all that follows through "associations."; and

(B) by adding at the end thereof the following: "Until October 1, 1985, the term 'residential mortgage' shall also include purchase or refinancing loans or advances of credit that are secured by a surbordinate lien against a one- to four-family residence only if the residence is the principal residence of the borrower and the proceeds of such loan or advance of credit were used to purchase or to refinance only the remaining balance of a loan the proceeds of which were used to purchase such residence.".

(2) Section 305(a) of such Act is amended by adding the following new paragraph at the end thereof:

"(4)(A) With respect to the purchase by the Corporation of any purchase or refinancing residential mortgage secured by a subordinate lien against a one- to four-family residence as authorized by the last sentence of section 302(h), the Corporation shall establish limitations governing the maximum principal obligation of such mortgages. Such limitation shall not exceed $50,000 in the case of a one-family residence and $60,000 in the case of a two- to four-family residence. In any case in which the Corporation purchases a participation interest in such a mortgage, the limitation shall be calculated with respect to the total principal obligation of the mortgage and not merely with respect to the interest purchased by the Corporation. If the Corporation shall have purchased, serviced, sold, or otherwise dealt with any other outstanding mortgage secured by the same residence, the aggregate original amount of such other mortgage and the mortgage authorized to be purchased, serviced, sold, or otherwise dealt with under this paragraph shall not exceed the applicable limitation set forth in paragraph (2).

"(B) No subordinate mortgage shall be purchased by the Corporation if the total outstanding indebtedness secured by the property as a result of such mortgage exceeds 90 per centum of the value of such property unless (i) that portion of such total outstanding indebtedness that exceeds 80 per centum is guaranteed or insured by a qualified insurer as determined by the Corporation (and not the Corporation itself); (ii) the seller retains a participation of not less than 10 per centum in the mortgage; or (iii) for such period and under such circumstances as the Corporation may require, the seller agrees to repurchase or replace the mortgage upon demand of the Corporation in the event that the mortgage is in default. The Corporation shall not issue a commitment to purchase a subordinate mortgage prior to the date the mortgage is originated, if such mortgage is eligible for purchase under the preceding sentence only by reason of compliance with requirements of clause (ii) of such sentence.".

(c) The amendments made by this section do not apply to commitments issued prior to the date of enactment of this section.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. BYRD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

FAREWELL TO JIM RANGE

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, it is my sad but happy duty to advise the Senate that Jim Range of my staff, who has been counsel to the majority leader, is leaving the employ of the Senate and will be employed in private business in Washington. I take this opportunity to ask that the Senate turn to the consideration of a resolution commending James Davis Range for his extraordinary service to the U.S. Senate, if the minority leader has no objection.

Mr. BYRD. There is no objection, Mr. President.

Mr. BAKER. I send a resolution to the desk, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be stated by title.

The bill clerk read as follows:

A Senate resolution (S. Res. 347) commending James Davis Range for his extraordinary service to the United States Senate.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, today, the Senate loses one of its most dedicated and able servants, and I lose one of my most responsible and personable assistants. Jim Range, my counsel, is leaving the Senate after 11 years. He will be sorely missed.

Jim Range belongs to the outdoors, and he left it as it were, only to make it better. His love of the environment borders on the legendary: Oceans and mountains and parks are his stomping grounds: Dogs and birds and fish his constituents. I can remember a day when Jim brought me and my camera to a wildlife preserve to watch American eagles. Only his enthusiasm for, and knowledge of their existence compared with their splendor.

Several of my colleagues have joined in other travels with Jim, for his world is one to share, not hoard. With Jim, there always seemed to be an expedition in the works, there always seemed to be yet another venture on which to embark. If some take such pleasures for granted, such is not the case with the ranger.

He brought his vision and understanding of our surroundings to Congress with constructive determination, and any list of key individuals who helped shape environmental policy in the last decade has Jim Range's name on it.

I have a feeling, Mr. President, that come Monday, there will be a lot of puzzled faces in the Senate because Jim will not be there to straighten them out. His phone is one of the Hill's most popular. Staffers and Members alike knew they could count on him for reliable information and if he did not have the answers at the time, he would get them as soon as possible. Shakespeare once wrote, "I remember him well and I remember him worthy of praise." Such will be the sentiments worthy of Jim Range.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that 2 poems which express our sentiments about Jim, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the poems were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SKETCHES FROM A HUNTER'S ALBUM

(By Ivan Turgenev)

Little by little he felt his desire harden,
Drawing him back to the village and shady garden,
Where lindens stood in stately dark magnificence,
And lilies of the valley spread their virgin fragrance,
Where round-shouldered willows by the weir,
Bend in a row above the water clear,
Where a stout oak grows above the fat-eared wheat,
Where hemp and nettles make the air smell sweet . . .
He was drawn back to those broad fields so lush,
Where the earth like velvet is so black and plush,
So that, no matter where you may direct your eye,
Everywhere is a rustling of soft waves of rye,
And through transparent clouds, so round and white,
Fall heavy beams of sunshine golden light;
There it is good . . .

THE COUNSEL

There once was a Counsel named Ranger
Who kept the Republic in danger
For several years
Amid mounting fears
While his dog made the Senate his manger.

It was all due, of course, to H. Baker,
The thinking man's legislator
Who gave Ranger his job
But was then heard to sob
"A mistake, and I'm the mistaker."

He came to work in a truck
Which had frightened many a duck,
Which some people, as well,
Had advised him to sell,
But to all he replied, "What the heck."

Yes, his speech was as blue as the ocean,
Barnyard pearls were his deepest devotion.
Though he withered the ear,

He made himself clear
And he kept the Senate in motion.
His command of the Calendar was absolute.
If your bill was to pass, you had best salute,
For rank hath its pleasures
And legislative measures
Were as limp, without Ranger, as H. Greene's cheroot.
His personal causes were winsome—
Clean air, clean water, and then some.
But nothing engages
His heart more than Pages
When Alison and Kim, his twins, come.
With him we're all Captain and Chief,
For us it will be a relief
To be Tommy and Jim
And Dan once again.
Frank Moore must be thinking "Good Grief."
There isn't much more one can say.
The Counsel will simply not stay.
He's departing in haste
To help manage waste,
But who cares? We still have Mary Kay.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I would like to add my thoughts to those of the distinguished majority leader concerning the accomplishments of Jim Range. Jim has been an invaluable asset to all Senators and to their staffs. His dedication to duty and his understanding of the operations of this complex institution are greatly appreciated. He has been an effective conduit of the majority leader's wishes, and has always been willing to assist in situations both mundane and intricate.

The assistance he has lent to the Senate Budget Committee has been especially valuable to me and to our other members. The clock did not run when he gave his time and insight to what have sometimes been very difficult questions. His sense of humor has frequently kept us from taking ourselves too seriously, and his gentlemanly manner has earned him the respect of his political allies and foes alike.

We will all certainly miss his soft vowels and his hard work. I wish him every success and happiness in his future endeavors.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 347) was agreed to.

The preamble was agreed to.

The resolution, with its preamble, is as follows:

S. RES. 347

Whereas, James Davis Range has served as an exemplary Counsel to the Majority Leader of the Senate of the United States during the 98th Congress;

Whereas, James Davis Range has served his country in various positions, including service on the National Commission on Water Quality and service as a professional staff member to the United States Senate Committee on Environment and Public Works;

Whereas, James Davis Range has performed invaluable work on the Clean Water Act, the Resource Conservation Recovery Act, the Endangered Species Act, and the Environmental Research and Development Act;

Whereas, James Davis Range has served the Senate, the Senators of the Republican Majority, and the Majority Leader with competence, dedication, and loyalty;

Whereas, James Davis Range has persistently worked to achieve those goals that will improve our Nation;

Whereas, the ducks of this Nation are greatly in hope that James Davis Range's new job will keep him away from the blinds of the nation; now therefore be it

Resolved, That the Senate of the United States extends its appreciation and gratitude to James Davis Range for his devoted and superb service to his country and to the United States Senate.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Senate shall transmit a copy of this resolution to James Davis Range.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I am sure we need not move to reconsider the vote on this resolution. I am just as sure that all of us wish Jim Range well in his endeavor as do I. I think the accolade given him in this resolution just adopted is richly deserved.

EXECUTIVE CALENDAR

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, today's Executive Calendar has certain nominations that are cleared for action on this side. May I say to the minority leader that we have nominations beginning on page 1 under the African Development Foundation, all of those on page 2 and page 3, and pages 4, 5, and 6, as well as those nominations placed on the Secretary's desk in the Air Force, Army, Foreign Service, Marine Corps, and Navy on pages 7 and 8. All of those are cleared for action by unanimous consent on this side, Mr. President. If the minority leader is prepared to consider any or all of those nominations, I am prepared to consider them at this time.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, the minority is prepared to consider both nominations on page 1, all nominations on pages 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, page 7, and page 8 with the exception of the first nomination that appears on page 8. That first paragraph on page 8 is not just a nomination. That is a list of nominations.

Mr. BAKER. Do I understand correctly that the minority leader is not prepared to consider that list at this time?

Mr. BYRD. The majority leader is correct.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the minority leader.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed into executive session for the purpose of considering nominations as follows: Calendar No. 448 through No. 460, and the nominations placed on the Secretary's desk on pages 7 and 8, with the exception of those Foreign Service nominations described in the first paragraph on page 8.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The nominations will be stated.

AFRICAN DEVELOPMENT FOUNDATION

The bill clerk read the nomination of A. C. Arterbery, of California, to be a member of the Board of Directors.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The nomination is considered and confirmed.

INTERNATIONAL MONETARY FUND

The bill clerk read the nomination of Richard D. Erb, of Virginia, to be United States Executive Director.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The nomination is considered and confirmed.

The bill clerk read the nomination of Mary Kate Bush, of New York, to be United States Alternate Executive Director.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The nomination is considered and confirmed.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE

The bill clerk read the nominations of Walter Leon Cutler, of Maryland, a Career Member of the Senior Foreign Service, Class of Career Minister, to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The nomination is considered and confirmed.

The bill clerk read the nomination of Thomas W. M. Smith, of Maine, a Career Member of the Senior Foreign Service, Class of Minister-Counselor, to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to the Federal Republic of Nigeria.
